remaining on him, he is the one who baptizes with the Holy Ghost. And I saw, and bore record that this is the Son of God." ^{Joh 1.29-34} Again, when the disciples of John envied the happy success of Christ, and it grieved them to see their master John neglected as it were, in comparison to Christ, John said to his disciples: "You yourselves are witnesses that I said, I am not Christ, but I was sent before him. He that has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom, who stands and hears him, rejoices because of the bridegroom: therefore my joy is fulfilled. He must increase, but I must decrease. The Father loves the Son, and has given all things into his hand. He that believes in the Son has life everlasting: he that does not believe in the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abides on him." ¹

These testimonies are firm, clear, and evident enough, and might suffice for the confirmation of this cause. But let us yet pick out and add a few more from many which may declare that Christ is already exhibited to us. Therefore, our Lord himself, whom we believe to be Messiah, when he had a long while been greatly commended by the testimony of John, at length goes abroad and preaches the word of life. But it is not read that in any age, before or since, there was ever any who taught with so great a grace. And with this he showed almost incredible and wonderful miracles, which easily argue for who he was; and these were sufficient to win a man with whom no words might possibly prevail. He was loving and gentle to sinners, continually repeating and beating into their heads that he had come to save them, and call them to repentance. Therefore, when the disciples of John came to Christ once, and asked, "Are you the one that would come, or shall we look for another?" he answered, "Go and tell those things to John, which you see and hear: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised to life, and the glad tidings of the gospel are preached to the poor." ^{Mat 11.3-5} Now by these, — I mean by his doctrine, and his works or miracles — his mind was to show that he was exhibited to the world as the true Messiah, and no other is to be looked for. Moreover, in the synagogue at Nazareth, where he read and expounded Isaiah's prophecy of the coming of Messiah, he declared that this scripture was fulfilled in himself. And to this history is immediately annexed: "And all bore witness to him, and wondered at the gracious sayings that proceeded from his mouth." ^{Luk 4.16-22} Again, in the tenth chapter of St. John's gospel: "The Jews came around the Lord and said, How long will you make us doubt? If you are the Christ, tell us plainly. Jesus answered them, I told you, and you do not believe. The works that I do in my Father's name, bear witness of me. But you do not believe, because you are not of my sheep." ^{Joh 10.24-26} And shortly after he adds:

"You say that I blaspheme, because I said, I am the Son of God. If I do not do the works of my Father, then do not believe me. But if I do, and you do not believe me, believe my works — that you may know and believe that the Father is in me, and I in him." ^{Joh 10.36-38}

In the seventh chapter of John we read: "Those who believed in him said, Will Christ, when he comes, show more signs than this man has shown?" ^{Joh 7.31} That is to say, Even if we were to grant that there is another Christ to be looked for, this is most sure: that the other Messiah cannot do more and greater miracles than this man does. Let us therefore believe that this is the true Messiah. Before Caiaphas, the high priest, and the whole council of the peers of Israel, and also before Pontius Pilate in the judgment-hall of the Roman empire, our Lord Christ openly, and in express words, confessed that he is that true and looked-for Messiah.

As the prophets foretold of him, he truly and of his own accord died for sinners; the third day after that, he rose again from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sits on the right hand of God the Father. And the evangelists, reciting faithfully the words and deeds of Christ, always add to the most notable ones: "All this was done or said, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet." Thus it would not be worth the labour here to gather together the prophecies of the prophets, to examine the words and deeds of Christ by them, and by the manifest agreement between them, to conclude this: That God has performed for us that which he promised to our fathers, in giving to us his only-begotten Son Christ Jesus, who is the true and looked-for Messiah. For the evangelists have already done this, and with such great faith and diligence, that it cannot be bettered for its plainness. To this you may now refer all that I have said in my former sermons touching the signification, or mysteries, in the fulfilling and abrogating of the law.

And to content ourselves with a smaller number of testimonies, might not this one, in the fourth chapter of St. John, be used instead of several thousand confirmations? The woman of Samaria says to the Lord: "I know that the Messiah shall come, who is called Christ. Therefore, when he comes, he will tell us all things. Jesus answered her, I am he that speaks to you." ^{Joh 4.25-26} Look, what could be said more plainly?

"I am the Messiah," he says, even I, who even now speaks to you, and at first said, "If you knew the gift of God, and who it is that says to you, Give me a drink, you would have asked of him, and he would have given you the water of life. For whoever drinks of the water that I shall give him, shall never more thirst: but the water that I give him shall become a well of water in him, springing up into eternal life." ^{Joh 4.10, 14}

Those, therefore, are the most thirsty and unfortunate of all men, who long and look for another Messiah besides our Lord and Saviour Christ Jesus. The apostle St. Peter in an appropriately long oration, well-grounded and confirmed with scripture and strong reasons, in the second chapter of the Acts, shows that our Lord Jesus is that true Messiah. For he closes his sermon with this sentence: "Therefore let all the house of Israel surely know, that God has made this Jesus both Lord and Christ, whom you have crucified." To the same mark tends that large and learned oration of the first martyr St. Stephen, which may be seen in the seventh chapter of the Acts.¹ Out of Isaiah's prophecy, Philip declares to the eunuch of Ethiopia that Jesus is Christ. St. Paul, in all the Jewish synagogues, puts forth no other proposition to preach on but this: Jesus is Christ, that is, Jesus is the king, the bishop, and the Saviour of the faithful. And in the thirteenth chapter he at large declares and proves that proposition true.

So now, these most evident and clear testimonies of holy scripture cannot help but suffice for those heads who are not set to purposely cavil and wrangle. At present, I will not too busily and curiously dispute against the contrary Jews, who look for another Messiah, and deny that our Lord Jesus, the Son of God and the virgin Mary, is the true Messiah. The wretches feel it to be true, which the Lord foretold them in his gospel, saying: "When you see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place, let him who reads this understand. Then let those who are in Jerusalem flee to the mountains. But woe to those who are with suckling child in those days; for the affliction shall be great." ²

And again, speaking of the city of Jerusalem, he says: "The days shall come upon you, that your enemies shall compass you with a trench, and hem you in, and lay siege to you on every side, and make you even with the ground, and your sons that are within you; and they shall not leave in you one stone standing upon another; because you do know not the time of your visitation." ^{Luk 19.43-44} And again; "There shall be wrath upon this people; and they shall fall with the edge of the sword, and shall be led captive into all nations; and Jerusalem shall be trodden underfoot by the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled." ^{Luk 21.23-24} Now, since they feel these things are finished, ¹ as they were foretold in the gospel by Christ, why do the wretches not give God the glory, and believe the gospel in other things, acknowledging that Jesus Christ, the Son of God and the virgin Mary, our Lord and Saviour, is the true and looked-for Messiah? What do they have they to cloak their stubborn incredulity? Now for the span of more than a thousand and five hundred years, they have been without their country — I mean, the land of promise that flowed with milk and honey; they have lacked their prophets, and lacked their solemn service and ceremonial rites. For where is their temple? Where is the high priest? Where is the altar? Where are the holy instruments? Where are the sacrifices that ought to be offered according to the law?

All the glory of God's people is now translated to the Christians. They are the ones who now enjoy being called the sons of faithful Abraham; they enjoy the promises made to the fathers; they talk about and mention the fathers; they judge rightly about the law and covenant of the Lord; they have the holy scriptures, and have great dexterity in expounding them; they have the true temple, the true high priest, the true altar of incense and burnt-offerings, even Christ Jesus, the Lord and Saviour; they have the true worship which was only prefigured in those external ceremonies of old — as I have already declared to you in that place where I handled the Jewish ceremonies. The Gentiles are called out of every quarter of the world to Christ Jesus. All the promises touching the calling of the Gentiles have been most abundantly fulfilled up to now, even today.

Now we are the chosen flock,² according to the doctrine of St. Peter: "We are the royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; being called to it so that we should preach the power of Him who has called us out of darkness into his marvellous light." ^{1Pet 2.9} Therefore, let the unhappy Jews turn to Christ by faith, and together with us begin to worship him in whom their fathers hoped, and in whom alone is life and salvation — unless, perhaps, they would rather be entangled in greater errors, to be vexed daily with endless calamities, and so at last perish eternally.³ For, to conclude this place with the apostle's words, "God was made manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen by the angels, preached to the Gentiles, believed in the world, and received in glory." ^{1Tim 3.16} And everyone who believes in him shall live eternally, and never be confounded." ^{Rom 9.33}

Now remaining, we have the last part to expound — the contents of which, are that God the Father, who before was angry with the world, is now pleased in his only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ our Lord.

First of all, therefore, I have to show you that God was angry with the world, which is no hard matter to prove. For God is angry at sins. But the whole world is subject to sin; therefore, of necessity, it must be that the most just God is mightily angry with the whole world. Paul says: "The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men." ^{Rom 1.18} Again, the apostle says that "all men are subject to sin." ^{Rom 3.9} To confirm this, he cites these sentences from the holy scriptures, saying:

"There is none righteous, no, not one: there is none that understands, or seeks after God; they have all gone out of the way; they have all become unprofitable; there is none that does good, no, not one. Their throat is an open sepulchre; they have used their tongues to deceive; the poison of asps is under their lips; their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness; their feet are swift to shed blood. Heart's grief and misery are in their ways; and they have not known the way of peace. There is no fear of God before their eyes." ^{Rom 3.10-18}

Now, lest the Israelites answer that these things do not pertain to the people of God, but to the heathen and ungodly alone, he adds: "We know that whatever the law says, it says it to those who are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and that the whole world may be endangered ¹ to God." ^{Rom 3.19} No man is excepted here. For the apostle says to the Galatians: "He has shut up all under sin, that he may have mercy on all." ^{Gal 3.22} It follows, therefore, that the whole world was subject to the wrath or indignation of the most just and righteous God, as proved at large in the second, fourth, and fifth chapters to the Ephesians.

But the heavenly Father is appeased, or reconciled to this wicked world, through the only-begotten Son our Lord Jesus Christ. And I hope I will abundantly prove this only by the testimony of God himself. For the Father sent down a voice from heaven to earth upon Christ — first, after his baptism, as he newly ascended out of the water; and then again, at his transfiguration in the sight of his disciples. He significantly says: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am delighted, pleased, or reconciled; hear him." ^{Mat 17.5} This testimony was foreshown in the forty-second chapter of Isaiah's prophecy. And Peter the apostle repeats it in the first chapter of his second epistle. Paul also expounded this as it were, and said, "It pleased the Father that in the Son should dwell all fulness; and by him to reconcile all things to himself, since by him He has set at peace, through the blood of the cross, both the things on earth and the things in heaven." ^{Col 1.19-20} In heaven is God, and we men are here upon earth. Now Christ is the Mediator, who goes between us, and reconciles us to his Father, so that now we are the beloved of the Father in his beloved Son. For in the epistle to the Ephesians the same apostle says: "He has made us accepted in the beloved; in whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace." ^{Eph 1.6-7} All this shall be more fully understood by what follows.

For now I must prove that God the Father has given us in his Son, all things that are necessary to a happy life and eternal salvation. I name here two things: a happy life, and everlasting salvation.

By a happy life, I mean a holy and godly life, which we live and lead quietly and honestly in this present world. Eternal salvation is that felicity of the life to come, which with assured hope we truly look for.

Now, we have in Christ a most absolute doctrine of a happy life, taught to us by the gospel, in which we also comprehend the example of Christ, his own trade of life. Truly, our heavenly Father has made him our teacher in saying, "Hear him." And in the gospel of St. Matthew, he himself says: "Do not be called masters; for you have one master, even Christ;" ^{Mat 23.8} In the gospel of St. John, he is called "The light of the world." ^{Joh 8.12} In another place also, he testifies that his doctrine is contained in the holy scriptures, from which it comes that he refers his disciples to the diligent reading of the holy scriptures. Touching these scriptures, Paul, the teacher of the Gentiles and so the universal church of Christ, says: "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, reproof, correction, and instruction which is in righteousness — that the man of God may be perfect, instructed in all good works." ^{2Tim 3.16-17} This is why, even if the whole world were mad, and they were obstinate defenders of traditions rather than the scriptures, and they sharpen their teeth out of anger — yet, despite their heads, the word of the apostle abides most firm,² in which he testifies that the doctrine of the scriptures, otherwise called Christian doctrine, is in all points most absolute and thoroughly perfect. Touching this matter, because I have already spoken of it in the first sermons of the first Decade, I may therefore be a great deal briefer here.

Now concerning the eternal salvation fully purchased for us by Christ, you must think thus: eternal salvation is seeing and enjoying the eternal God. Consequently, it is an inseparable joining or knitting to him. For David says, "There is fulness of joys in your sight; and at your right hand are pleasures forevermore." ^{Psa 16.11}

And St. John says, "Now we are the sons of God, and yet it does not appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he appears, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." ^{1Joh 3:2} Moreover, the Lord says in the gospel, "Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God." ^{Mat 5.8} But all men are endued with impure hearts: therefore no man shall see God; because no uncleanness abides in consuming fire (and God is a consuming fire ¹). Therefore we cannot be partakers of salvation unless we are purely cleansed. But without the shedding of blood there is no cleansing or remission of sins: I do not mean the blood of rams or goats, but of the only-begotten Son of God, our Lord Christ Jesus. He ² therefore took on our flesh and blood; he came into the world, died willingly for us, and shed his blood for the remission of our sins; and by that means purged the faithful — so that now, being clean, they may be able to stand before the most holy God, who is a consuming fire. To this may be annexed the consideration of the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, his death, resurrection, and ascension into heaven, which I mentioned above in the definition of the gospel. For the whole mystery of our reconciliation consists in those points. Touching this, I will speak that much more briefly in this place, because in the exposition about the Apostles' Creed,³ I handled so much as concerns these points of doctrine. Whoever would know this, may look and find them there.

Now, that Christ alone is our most absolute life and salvation, it may be gathered from what has already been said. And yet, notwithstanding, I will here allege some further testimonies, to the end that the verity and sincerity of the evangelical truth may be firmer and more evident to all men. In Christ alone our life and salvation consists; so that without Christ, there is no life and salvation in any other creature. The Lord himself testifies of this ⁴ saying: "Truly, truly, I say to you, He that does not enter by the door into the sheepfold, but goes in some other way, is a thief and a robber. Truly, truly, I say to you, I am the door of the sheep: as many as came before me are thieves and robbers." ^{Joh 10.1, 7-8}

Look here, there is only one door through which the way to eternal life lies: and Christ is that door. Therefore, those who strive to come to life and salvation by other means than through Christ, are thieves and robbers; for they steal from Christ's honour and glory, considering that he both is and he abides as the only Saviour: and in so doing, they kill their own souls. The same Saviour in the gospel says: "I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man comes to the Father but by me." ^{Joh 14.6} In these few words, has he not rejected and utterly excluded all other means of salvation, making himself alone our life and salvation? This certain phrase of speech, "No man comes to the Father but by me," is the same as this: "Through Christ alone we come to the Father." Moreover, the Lord's apostles have laid Christ alone before our eyes in such a way that no man can help but understand that without Christ Jesus, there is no life to be found in any other creature. The holy apostle St. Peter says in the Acts: "There is in no other any salvation: for there is no other name under heaven given among men in which we must be saved." ^{Act 14.12} And St. Paul, in the fifth chapter to the Romans, repeats that "by the righteousness of one man, Jesus Christ, all the faithful are justified." ^{Rom 5.17} Again, Paul says: "Through him is preached to you the remission of sins; and through him, everyone who believes is justified from all the things, from which you could not be justified by Moses' law." ^{Act 13.38-39} He also has other testimonies like this in the second chapter of his epistle to the Galatians. ^{Gal 2.16} It is manifest, therefore, that through Christ alone the forgiveness of sins and life everlasting are freely bestowed upon all the faithful. These gifts, just as they are not without Christ at all, so are they not bestowed by any other means than through Christ alone. Concerning the remission of sins, which is the chief tidings of the gospel, I have already discoursed at large in the ninth sermon of the first Decade, and in other places.

Now for the proof that our Lord fully absolves from sins, fully remits sins, and fully saves repentant sinners,¹ so that nothing more can be desired or wished for; and consequently, the Lord himself is the most absolute fulness of all the faithful, without whom those who believe, neither do nor can wish for anything else unto life, salvation, and absolute felicity. In the gospel, He himself says again:

"Everyone that drinks of this water shall thirst again; but whoever drinks of the water which I shall give him, he shall live eternally." ^{Joh 4.13-14} And again: "I am the bread of life; he that comes to me shall not hunger, and he that believes in me shall never thirst." ^{Joh 6.35} The apostles therefore, after they had eaten this celestial bread — that is, once they had believed in Christ, when many departed and forsook Christ — being questioned whether they also would leave him, answered this: "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life. And we believe and know that you are Christ, the Son of the living God." ^{Joh 6.68-69} Look here, they neither will nor can forsake Christ, because there is no other to whom they may join themselves. For he alone is the life and salvation of those who believe; and that too, is so absolute and perfect, that in him alone they may content and stay themselves. The doctrine of the apostles fully agrees with the writings of the evangelists. For Paul says to the Colossians: "It pleased the Father that in the Son all fulness should dwell." ^{Col 1.19} And again: "In the Son dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; and you are fulfilled in him." ^{Col 2.9-10} And in the Epistle to the Hebrews, he affirms that the faithful have full remission of sins, because sacrifices for sin cease to be offered; ^{Heb 10.2} and God promises by the prophet Jeremiah, so absolute a remission of sins, that he will not so much as once remember or think on them afterward.² To this place belongs the whole epistle written to the Hebrews, and the conclusion of the eighth sermon in the first Decade, in which I recounted to you the treasures that God the Father gives to us in Christ his Son, our Lord and Saviour.

Upon this it now consequently follows that those who attribute to Christ Jesus our Lord, the true Messiah, either not exclusively, or else not fully, all things requisite to life and salvation, have not yet rightly understood the gospel of Christ, nor sincerely preached it.

It is a wicked and blasphemous thing to ascribe either to men, or to things inferior and worse than men, the glory and honour due to Christ. The principal exercises of Christian religion cannot, by derogating from the glory of Christ,³ claim anything for themselves. For sincere doctrine directly leads us to Christ. Prayer invokes, praises, and gives thanks in the name of Christ. The sacraments serve to seal and represent to us the mysteries of Christ. And the works of faith are done out of duty, although also of free accord; because we are created for good works. Yes, through Christ alone they please and are acceptable to God the Father; for Christ is the vine, we are the branches. So all glory is reserved untouched to Christ alone: which is the surest note to know the true gospel by.

Thus, up to here we have heard that God, the Father of mercies, according to his free mercy, taking pity upon mankind when it stuck fast and was drowned in the mire of hell, sent his only-begotten Son into the world, as he promised by the prophets, that he might draw us out of the mud, and fully give us all things requisite to life and salvation. For God the Father was reconciled to us in Christ, who for us and our salvation was incarnate, dead, raised from death to life, and taken up into heaven again.

By all this, it may be indifferently well gathered to whom that salvation belongs, and to whom that grace is rightly preached. And yet, the matter itself seems to require us to expressly show, in flat words, that Christ and the preaching of Christ's grace, declared in the gospel, belongs to all. For we must not imagine that two books are laid in heaven. In one of them, the names are written of those who are to be saved; and they will be saved of necessity, so that whatever they do against the word of Christ, and however committed to so heinous offences, they cannot possibly help but be saved. In the other book are contained the names of those who, whatever they can do, and however holily they live, they cannot avoid everlasting damnation.

Let us rather hold, that the holy gospel of Christ preaches generally to the whole world, the grace of God, the remission of sins, and life everlasting. And in this belief, we must confirm our minds with the word of God, by gathering together some evident places of the holy scriptures, which manifestly prove that it is so. Of this sort are the following sayings: "In your Seed, all the nations of the earth shall be blessed," Gen 22.18 "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord shall be saved," Joel 2.32 "We have all gone astray like sheep; and God has laid upon him the iniquity of us all," Isa 53.6 "Come to the waters, all you who thirst," Isa 55.1 There are countless places of this sort in the old Testament. Now, in the gospel the Lord says: "Everyone who asks receives; and he that seeks finds," etc. Mat 7.8 "Come to me, all you who labour and are heavy laden, and I will ease you of your burden," Mat 11.28 "Teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father," etc. Mat 28.19 "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures: whoever believes and is baptized, shall be saved," Mark 16.16 "God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that everyone who believes in him should not perish, but have eternal life," Joh 3.15 In the Acts of the Apostles, St. Peter says: "Of a truth, I perceive that there is no respect of persons with God; but in every nation, he that fears Him, and works righteousness, is acceptable to him," Act 10.35 Paul says in the third chapter to the Romans: "The righteousness of God by faith in Jesus Christ comes to all, and upon all those who believe." Rom 3.22 And in the tenth chapter he says: "The same Lord over all, is rich to all those who call upon him." Rom 10.12 In his Epistle to Titus he says: "There has appeared the grace of God, that is healthful to all men." Tit 2.11 And in first Timothy, the second chapter, he says: "God would have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth." 1Tim 2.4 These and similar are the manifest testimonies, upon which all the faithful firmly stay themselves.

But now. if you demand how it happens that all men are not saved, since the Lord would that all should be saved and come to the knowledge of the truth, the Lord himself answers you in the gospel, saying: "Many indeed are called, but few are chosen." Mat 20.16

In the fourteenth chapter of St. Luke's gospel, he more plainly expounds this sentence, where he shows in a parable the reasons why most mortal men do not obtain eternal salvation, preferring earthly and transitory things, before celestial or heavenly matters. For everyone had a separate excuse to cloak his disobedience with: one had bought a farm; another had five yoke of oxen to test; the third had newly married a wife. Luk 14.18-20 And in the gospel of St. John, the Lord says: "This is condemnation, because the light came into the world, and men loved darkness more than the light." ^{Joh 3.19} That saying of the apostle in 2Cor 4, agrees with this doctrine of the evangelists. And in first Timothy, the fourth chapter, he says: "God is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe." ^{1Tim 4.10} From this we gather that God, in the preaching of the gospel, requires faith in every one of us: and by faith it is manifest that we are made partakers of all the goodness and gifts of Christ. And truly there is a correlation between faith and the gospel; for in the gospel of St. Mark, the Lord annexed faith to the preaching of the gospel. ^{Mark 16.15-16} And Paul says, that "to him was committed the preaching of the gospel, unto the obedience of faith." ^{Rom 1.5-16} Again he says: "The gospel is the power of God unto salvation for all those who believe." ^{Rom 1.16} And in the tenth chapter to the Romans, he shows by gradation that the gospel is received by faith. ^{Rom 10.9} But, that faith may be rightly planted in the hearts of men, it is needful that the preaching of repentance first goes before. For this reason, in the latter end of the definition of the gospel, I added, "So that we, acknowledging our sins, may believe in Christ." That is to say, the Lord will be our Saviour and give us life everlasting, if we acknowledge our sins, and believe in him. And therefore, here may now be annexed the treatises about faith and repentance. Touching faith, I have already spoken largely in the fourth, fifth, and sixth sermons of the first Decade. I will later speak concerning repentance, in a separate sermon by itself. In this place, I will only summarily touch on those points of repentance ¹ which seem to demonstrate the gospel.

Our Lord Christ Jesus, in the preaching of the gospel, requires faith and repentance. Nor when he preached the gospel, did he himself proceed any other way. For Mark has: "Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God, and saying, The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe the gospel." ^{Mark 1.14-15} Nor did he otherwise instruct his disciples when he sent them to preach the gospel to all nations. For St. Luke says: "Christ said to his disciples, So it is written, and so it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise again the third day from the dead; and that in his name should be preached repentance and the forgiveness of sins to all nations." ^{Luk 24.46-47} St. Paul, like a good scholar following his master, says in the Acts of the Apostles: "You know that I have held back nothing that was profitable to you, but I have shown you, and taught you openly and throughout every house, witnessing both to the Jews, and also to the Greeks, the repentance that is toward God, and the faith that is toward our Lord Jesus Christ." ^{Act 20.20-21} In his Epistle to the Romans, where he compendiously ² handles the gospel, he takes occasion to begin preaching it at sin, convincing both Jews and Gentiles to be subject to it. Now he begins at sin to this end and purpose: that every one, looking into himself, may see and acknowledge that he has no righteousness in himself, but that by nature ³ he is the son of wrath, death, and damnation. It is not that such acknowledging of sins, of itself, makes us acceptable to God, or make us deserving of remission of sins and life everlasting; but in a way, it prepares a way in the minds of men to receive faith in Christ Jesus, and by that means, to embrace Christ Jesus himself, who is our only and absolute righteousness; for "the whole do not need the physician, but those who are sick and diseased." ^{Mat 9.12} Therefore, those who think they are clear without sins, and are righteous of themselves, utterly reject Christ, and make his death of no effect.⁴

But on the other side, are those who feel the diseases of the mind, and from the bottom of their hearts confess that they are sinners and unrighteous, not putting any trust in their own strength and merits, who even pant from the haste that they make to Christ. And when they do, then Christ offers himself in the gospel, promising them remission of sins and life everlasting, as he that came to heal the sick and to save repentant sinners. But the promise is received by faith, and not by works: therefore the gospel, and Christ in the gospel, are received by faith. For we must diligently distinguish between the precepts and the promises. The promises are received by faith: the precepts are accomplished by works.

Upon which Paul said: "If the inheritance is of the law, then is it not now of promise: but God gave Abraham the inheritance by promise." ^{Gal 3.18} The same apostle, comparing the law and the gospel, says to the Romans: "The righteousness which is of the law says, Whoever does these things shall live by them; but the righteousness of faith says, If you believe, you shall be saved." ^{Rom 10.5,6} The law therefore is grounded upon works, to which it seems to attribute righteousness: but because no man fulfils the law in works, no man is justified by works, or by the law. The gospel is not grounded upon works: for sinners acknowledge nothing in themselves but sin and wickedness; for they feel in themselves that they are wholly corrupted. And therefore, they flee to the mercy of God, in whose promises they put their trust, hoping truly that they will freely obtain remission of their sins, and that for Christ's sake, they are received into the number of the sons of God.

I would speak more in this place concerning faith in Jesus Christ, the remission of sins, and the inheritance of life everlasting, if I had not already declared them at large in the first Decade. Here you have to remember, by the way, that the gospel is not sincerely preached when you are taught that we are made partakers of the life of Christ for our own deserts and meritorious works. For we are freely saved¹ without respect to any works of ours, either first or last.

Although I have more than once handled this argument in these sermons of mine. Yet, because it is the hook on which the hinge of evangelical doctrine hangs (which is the door to Christ),² and this doctrine (namely, that Christ is received by faith, and not by works) is greatly resisted by many men — I will, for the declaration and confirmation of it, produce only two places here; but they are apparent and evident enough to prove and confirm it by. The one is out of the gospel of Christ our Lord, the other out of Paul's Epistles.

In the gospel of St. John, our Lord Jesus Christ was about to briefly teach Nicodemus the way to true salvation; that is, to preach the glad tidings of life. He first of all begins at repentance, and wholly takes Nicodemus away from himself, leaving him no merits of his own in which to put his trust. For utterly condemning the first birth of man, in which nothing is available to obtain eternal life, what does he leave Nicodemus, I beseech you, in which he may brag or make his boast? For he expressly says: "Truly, truly, I say to you, Unless a man is born from above,³ he cannot see the kingdom of God." If the first birth and its gifts⁴ were able to promote a man to the kingdom of God, then what need would he have to be born the second time? The second birth is wrought by the means of the Holy Ghost, which, being poured into our hearts from heaven, brings us to the knowledge of ourselves, so that we may easily perceive, assuredly know, and sensibly feel, that in our flesh there is no life, no integrity, nor righteousness at all; and consequently, no man is saved by his own strength or merits. What then? The Spirit in truth inwardly teaches us that which the sound of the gospel outwardly tells us: that we are saved by the merit of the Son of God.⁵ For the Lord says in the gospel: "No man ascends into heaven, except the one who descended from heaven, the Son of man that is in heaven." ^{Joh 3.13} For in another place he more plainly says: "No man comes to the Father but by me." ^{Joh 14.6} And again, he says to Nicodemus: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up; that everyone who believes in him should not perish, but have eternal life." ^{Joh 3.14-15}

Now Moses hung up the brazen serpent for the health and recovery of those who were poisoned ¹ by the serpents' bites. For those who were stung by the serpents quickly died, unless they immediately looked up to the brazen serpent; for at the very sight of it, the poisoned sting lost all force, and the envenomed person was restored and cured again out of hand. Nor was there any other medicine in the host of Israel except that alone; and whoever despised it, died without remedy. For the force of the poison was not expelled, and the life of the infected was not preserved, either by the power of prayers, or the multitude of sacrifices, or medicinal herbs, or any kind of medicine, or other means of man's invention.² If anyone would escape the peril of death, it behoved him to behold the brazen serpent aloft. Now, that brazen serpent was a type or figure of Christ our Lord, who being lifted up upon the cross, is ordained by God to be the only salvation. But now, to whom does that saving health befall? To those, in truth, who behold him being so lifted up. The Lord himself tells us what "to behold" signifies; and in its place he puts "to believe." Therefore, no works, no other means or merits of ours, save us from eternal death and from the force of sin — that is, from the poison with which we are all infected by the old serpent, our adversary Satan. Faith alone — by which we believe in Christ, who was lifted up for the remission of our sins, and in whom alone our life and sure salvation assuredly consists — is the only thing that quickens us, who are already dying by the envenomed sting of Satan, which is sin.³ Moreover, hear what the Lord adds, instructing Nicodemus yet more fully in the true faith, and making the only cause of our salvation to be the mere grace of God alone, which is received by faith in Christ.

"For God so loved the world, that he gave his only-begotten Son, that everyone who believes in him should not perish, but have eternal life. For God did not send his Son ⁴ to condemn the world; but that the world might be saved by him. He that believes in him is not condemned: but he that does not believe in him is already condemned, because he does not believe in the name of the only-begotten Son of God." ^{Joh 3.16-18}

Look, what could be spoken more plainly? By faith we are made partakers of Christ. By repeating faith so often, his meaning was to beat it into our heads, that no man should hereafter even once doubt so manifest and evident a piece of doctrine. But if here, you now set little by the authority of Christ, then whose authority will you esteem? But you will not, I know, reject his testimony. Yet even if his warrant is sufficient, give ear to that disciple whom the Lord loved, who in his epistle expounding the words of the Lord, and by way of exposition, repeating and beating them into all men's minds, strongly cries out:

"If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which he testified of his Son. He that believes in the Son has the testimony in himself. He that does not believe God, makes Him a liar, because he did not believe the record that God gave of his Son. And this is the record: that God has given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that has the Son has life; and he that does not have the Son of God, does not have life." ^{1Joh 5.11-12}

But what else does it mean to have the Son of God, than to believe in him? For this sense is gathered from what went before. It is so evident of itself, that for me to add anything to it, is to do nothing but, as it were, go about with a tallow-candle to help lighten the sun at its rising.

Now we have come to the place of St. Paul, which is seen in the third and fourth chapters of his epistle to the Romans. "The righteousness of God without the law," he says, "is made manifest, being witnessed by the testimony of the law and the prophets." ^{Rom 3.21} Paul in this place preaches the gospel most evidently; for I do not know any other place in which he does it more plainly. He teaches here how we are justified before God, what is true righteousness and the salvation of mankind, and by what means it comes to us. He says, that the righteousness of God, that is to say, the righteousness which God bestows, or which prevails before God, is revealed without the law.

That is to say, it comes to us without the help of the law, namely, without the aid and merits of the works of the law. For touching the testimony of the law and the prophets, they witness together that those who believe are justified by the righteousness of God. Now what that righteousness is, he immediately declares, saying: "The righteousness of God comes by the faith of Jesus Christ to all and upon all those who believe." ^{Rom 3.22} He says the righteousness of which we speak,¹ is not human or of mortal man, but altogether divine, or of God himself. For as God alone is just, so the righteousness of God is the true and only righteousness that saves us. God makes us partakers of this righteousness by that faith of Jesus Christ; namely, if we believe in Christ, and hope in him to be saved.² Neither is there any man excluded here from righteousness and salvation; for Paul plainly says, "to all and upon all who believe." This is why God reputes and esteems all those to be righteous, who believe in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord and Saviour. Now he presently annexes the reason why he attributes salvation to the righteousness of God, and not of man, or why the gospel commends the righteousness of God to us, saying: "For there is no difference; all have sinned and have need of the glory of God;" ^{Rom 3.22-23} This is because all men, of their own nature, are destitute of the glory of God; that is, they are without the true image of God, in whose likeness they were created in the beginning. Therefore, all men, truly, are unrighteous and sinners. From this it follows that there is no righteousness in them, and that they have nothing in which to boast before the righteous God. For what else, I beseech you, do sinners carry from the judgment-seat of God, but confusion and ignominy? And because all men are in that state, the apostle therefore wisely adds: "But they are justified freely by his grace through the redemption in Christ Jesus; whom God has set forth to be a propitiation, or reconciliation, through faith in his blood." ^{Rom 3.24-25}

This is the same as if he had said: Men are justified for Christ's sake by the mere grace or mercy of God, without any help or merit of their own, if they only believe that God has given his Son to the world, to shed his blood, and to reconcile the purified sinners to his Father in heaven. In these words, there are most fully and plainly declared the whole manner and order of sanctifying, purifying, and justifying sinners.

But it is good here to repeat the apostle's words, and to more closely examine and deeply consider them. "They are," he says, "freely justified." But why freely? Because, in truth, they are justified by the mere grace of God, without the help of their own works or merits. For all men are sinners; therefore, they have nothing of themselves to allege for their justification. It follows from this, that since some are justified, they are justified freely by the grace of God. For in the eleventh chapter to the Romans, the apostle says: "If we are saved by grace, then it is not now of works, for then grace is no longer grace: but if by works, then is it is not now grace." Rom 11.6

But there immediately follows in Paul, what makes that argument still more manifest, which is manifest already: "through the redemption," he says, "that is in Christ." Our righteousness and salvation is the work of mere grace, because we are redeemed. For in respect to ourselves, our works, and merits, we were the servants of death and the devil, insofar as we were sinners and subject to sin. But by sending his Son, God redeemed us when, still being his enemies, we were bound to the devil, his open adversary.¹ Therefore, he freely redeemed us — as Isaiah the prophet, in his fifty-second chapter, plainly foretold that it would come to pass. And true salvation is not in any other, whatever he may be, save in Christ alone, our true Lord and Saviour. For the heavenly Father, by his eternal counsel, set forth his Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, to be our propitiation; namely, that he might be our reconciliation, for whose sake alone the Father, being pacified, adopts us into the number of the sons of God. This is accomplished by no other way than through faith in his blood; that is, if we believe that the Son, being sent by the Father, shed his blood, to thereby set us before his heavenly Father, cleansed, justified, and sanctified. We see in this, again, that our salvation freely consists in faith in Jesus Christ.

These points being thus unfolded, the apostle proceeds to show how far the benefit of redemption and justification stretches. He immediately adds: "To declare his righteousness by the forgiveness of the sins that are past, which God suffered, to show his righteousness at this time." Rom 3.25 God, he says, has set forth Christ to be the only propitiation, that he might show that there is but one and the same righteousness in all ages: Christ himself, I say, who is the righteousness of all who believe. Now here he mentions two separate times: that ancient age of the fathers, and this present time in which we now live. The ancient age is that which went before the coming of Christ; this latter age of ours, is what begins at Christ, is now at this present time, and shall be extended to the end of the world. And God truly, by his long sufferance, bore with and suffered the sins of that old age for Christ's sake, by whom, and for whom, he has forgiven them. Nor does he set before us today any other righteousness, save Christ alone, to be received and embraced by faith.

For the apostle does not obscurely add afterward: "That he might be just, and the justifier of those who believe on Jesus." As if he had said, Now the meaning of all this, is that we should understand that all men are unrighteous and altogether sinners; God alone is righteous, without whom there is no righteousness at all: and he communicates his righteousness to all those who believe in Christ: namely, those who believe that for Christ's sake, the Father is pleased and reconciled to us, and we are reputed both just and holy, for him.

Two very wicked and blasphemous errors of certain fellows are notably refuted by these words of the apostle. The one is by those who say that our fathers were justified, not by faith in Christ, but by the law and their own merits; they assert that Christ suffered not for the fathers, but only for those who lived when he was on earth, and those who followed after his death.

The other error is by those who say that Christ offered up his body for the fathers, for original sin only, and not for us and all our sins; therefore, we must make satisfaction for our own sins. But the apostle Paul in this place condemns both these opinions. And the holy evangelist John, agreeing with Paul, says: "The blood of the Son of God cleanses us from all sin. For he is the propitiation for our sins; not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world." 1Joh 1.7; 2.2 Therefore, the merit of Christ's redemption extends to all the faithful of both the testaments.

The apostle Paul proceeds, and infers from what he said: "Where is the boasting? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? No, but by the law of faith." He gathers by the evangelical doctrine ¹ taught previously, that all the boasting of every man's own righteousness, and all the bragging of every one's merits, is utterly taken away, altogether exempted, and vanished. And this is not by the law of works — that is, not by the doctrine concerning works, which is prone for the most part to puff men up and make them swell — but by the law of faith, that is, by the doctrine concerning faith, which empties and leaves in us nothing but a humble confession and acknowledging of our own lack of merits, attributing all our help to grace in Christ Jesus. And at the last, gathering the chief proposition, he says: "We therefore hold that a man is justified ² without the works of the law."

This is the sum and breviary of the whole gospel: that we are justified — that is to say, we are absolved from sins, from the definitive sentence of death and damnation; and we are sanctified and adopted into the number of the sons of God — by faith, that is, by an assured confidence in the name of Christ, which is given by the Father to be our only Saviour. And here works are excluded, to the end that there should be given to us no occasion to entangle faith with works, or to attribute to works the glory and title due to faith alone — or rather to Christ, upon whom our faith is grounded and upheld.

Once this proposition is put forth, he quickly confirms with arguments, showing that this salvation is common to both the Jews and Gentiles, saying: "Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not also of the Gentiles? Yes, even also of the Gentiles: for it is one God who shall justify the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith." Rom 3.29-30 He fetches the confirmation of what he said, from the nature of God. There is but one God who, of his own nature, is both life and righteousness; and he is the God both of the Jews and the Gentiles; therefore he is the life and righteousness of both the people. He bestows this righteousness on them by faith: therefore faith justifies, or makes them both righteous.

This is declared by the example of Cornelius the centurion. For he is justified, or I should rather say, once being justified, he is declared acceptable to God, by sending down the Holy Ghost upon him in a visible form — when being neither circumcised, nor having kept the law, but having only heard the preaching of the gospel, he had believed in Jesus Christ. Now, God did not justify Cornelius alone this way, but He will also justify all other nations by faith; even as he will not justify the Jews by any other means than by faith alone.

It follows in Paul: "Do we then destroy the law through faith? God forbid! Rather, we maintain the law." Rom 3.31 For the defenders or the disputers in the defence of works, or rather justification by works, are prone to object: If faith alone in Christ justifies, then the law, or the doctrine of the law, is altogether unprofitable. For to what end are we commanded to do good works, if good works do not justify? The apostle answers that, The law is not abolished by faith, but rather it is maintained. For since faith directly tends to Christ, in whom alone it seeks and finds all fulness; and the law itself is the school-mistress for Christ, and shuts up all under sin, so that justification by faith is given to the faithful — it is most evident that the law is not destroyed or darkened, but confirmed and made light, by the doctrine of faith.

The apostle goes on in his confirmation, and says: "What then shall we say that Abraham our father found, as pertaining to the flesh? For if Abraham were justified by works, then he has something to boast in; but not before God. For what does the scripture say? Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness." Rom 4.1-3

There are truly many examples of the holy fathers: but among all the rest, the apostle chose ¹ to handle this one at large, out of Abraham. For in the scriptures he is called the father of those who believe. Rom 4.16 From which it is assuredly certain that the children shall be justified in the same way that their father was; as the apostle taught in express words at the latter part of the fourth chapter. Moreover, Abraham was famous for good works above all the rest of the holy fathers. Therefore, if any other could have been justified by his good works or merits, then Abraham even more so, above all the rest. But because he was justified by faith and not by works, it is therefore manifest that all the saints also have been, and are, justified by faith and not by works. Furthermore, Abraham lived 430 years before the law was revealed by Moses.² From this it follows that his works cannot be called the works of the law by those who deny justification by faith without the law. Therefore, the works that he did, he did by faith, and his works were the works of faith; and yet he was not justified by them, but by faith. Therefore, the glory of justification by faith remains sound, unspotted, and unmingled with anything else. "What shall we say that our father Abraham found concerning the flesh?" Namely, so far as he is a man, and we are also men from him? What, I say, shall we say that he deserved? ³ To this demand, this answer must be added: He found nothing, and by his works he deserved nothing. For the proof follows: If he deserved anything by his works, or was justified by his merits, then he has something in which to boast. But he has nothing in which to boast; therefore, he is not justified by his works. For God alone is righteous, and keeps this his glory to himself alone, without any partner or joint-possessor with him, freely justifying those who are of the faith of Jesus Christ, to the end that his grace may always be praised.

But Paul himself, by bringing in a passage of scripture, shows that Abraham had nothing in which to make his boast. "For what," he says, "does the scripture say? Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness." Rom 4.3

Look here, the scripture most plainly says that Abraham was justified by faith; or rather, that faith was imputed to him for righteousness; and therefore, for his faith, Abraham was counted righteous before the most just and righteous God.

But let us hear Paul, how he applies this passage of scripture to his purpose. It follows then: "To him that works, the reward is not reckoned of grace, but of duty. But to him that does not work, but believes in him that justifies the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness." These words, truly, may be briefly reduced into this kind of argument: whoever deserves anything with his works, the reward is given to him as a thing that is due out of duty, and not imputed freely as though it were not a debt. But faith is imputed to Abraham unto righteousness; therefore he received righteousness, not as a reward out of a duty owed to him, but as a gift that is not due, but is freely given to him. And again: "To him that does not work, but believes in him that justifies the ungodly, his faith is reckoned for righteousness." But for Abraham, faith was imputed unto righteousness; therefore he obtained righteousness by faith, and not by works.

Now, there is an emphasis in what he says, "But believes in him that justifies the ungodly." For thereby is signified that the one who is to be justified, brings nothing with him except the acknowledgement of his own misery and ungodliness, to seek mercy at the hand of the Lord. For he understands that he is destitute of good ⁴ works, and one who may abide the trial of God's just judgment. He therefore flees to the mercy of God, presuming certainly that the righteousness of faith is the aid or help of the sinner, who must be freely saved by the grace of God.

Here, by the way, you must note, that Christians' righteousness both is, and is said to be, imputative righteousness: this alone is able to break the neck of all our boasting; for imputation is the contrary to debt. God is not bound to us out of duty, either for our own sakes, or for our works' sakes; but only so far as he has bound himself to us by his free grace and goodness. And there are many things in us that hinder the perfection of righteousness in us.

Whereupon David cried: "Do not enter into judgment with your servant: for in your sight no man living shall be justified." ^{Psa 143.2} Therefore God freely imputes to us the righteousness of faith; that is, he repute us as righteous because we believe Him through his Son. So the Lord said, as we read in the evangelical parable, "But when the debtors were not able to pay, he forgave them both the debt." ^{Luk 7.42} For God also forgives us our debts or sins, not reputeing them to us, but counting us as righteous for Christ's sake. For the same apostle, most evidently testifying the same thing in the second epistle to the Corinthians, says: "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, by not imputing sins to men." ^{2Cor 5.19, 21} And after that, again: "Him who knew no sin, he made sin for us, that we might be the righteousness of God in him." What can you require that is more evident than this: we are counted righteous before God, because our sins are so purged by Christ's sacrifice, that afterward we should no longer be held with the guilt of them?

We now proceed to reckon up the other arguments of St. Paul, as firm and manifest as these were that have already been recited.

In the same chapter, therefore, it follows: "Even as David describes the blessedness of the man to whom the Lord imputes righteousness without works, saying, Blessed are they whose unrighteousnesses are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is that man, to whom the Lord will not impute sin." In the beginning, with clear and evident words, he expresses the thing that he intends to prove or confirm; namely, that God imputes righteousness to the saints without works. What could be said more plainly? And, to prove it is so, here he infers the testimony of David, which in a manner contains three different members or clauses: first, "Blessed," he says, "are those whose unrighteousnesses ¹ are forgiven;" then, "Blessed are those whose sins are covered;" and lastly, "Blessed is that man to whom the Lord will impute no sin." ^{Rom 4.7-8}

Now the force of the argument or demonstration consists in the words, Forgive, Cover, and Not impute. The creditor forgives the debtor what he has not paid him, whether he is able to pay it to him or not.

In respect to our sins, which are our debts, we are able to pay nothing to God. Forgiveness of those debts or sins of ours is therefore the gift of God's mere grace and liberality. For the creditor cannot forgive the thing that is already paid to him; for when he gives back the thing that he has received, in so doing he does not forgive, but gives; and that deed in the scriptures is called Donum, a gift, not Remissio, a forgiving. Whereupon St. Paul says, "God gave the inheritance to Abraham:" therefore Abraham did not merit it with his works. Secondly, some filthy thing that offends the eyes of men is usually covered; and yet notwithstanding, the filthy thing abides filthy still,² even though it does not appear outwardly to the eyes of men. And our merciful God has covered our sins, not that they should cease to be, but that they should not appear or come to judgment; which is the gift of grace, and not of merits. For the covering is nothing else than the blood of the Son of

God — because for his blood's sake, we sinners are not damned. Lastly, God might by right and justice impute sin to us; but of his grace he does not impute it. And all these laid together, confirm and prove that righteousness is freely imputed to us by faith, without works.

This very same passage from St. Paul, taken out of David, discusses and makes plain to us other points of doctrine also, about which there is some controversy. For we learn that justification is nothing else but sanctification,¹ forgiveness of sins, and adoption into the number of the children of God. We learn that St. Paul speaks not only of the ceremonial works of the law, but also of the saints' good works of every sort. Furthermore, we learn that both sins and iniquities, that is, all manner sins of the faithful, are freely pardoned and utterly forgiven. Moreover, we learn that sins are fully remitted — not only the fault, but also the punishment. This punishment, some say, is retained; but God does not impute sins. In another place He says that, " he will not have any remembrance of our sin at all." ² Lastly, we learn that man's invention of satisfactions for sin, is a most vain lie, and flatly opposite to the apostle's doctrine.

Up to here I have alleged two most evident places: the one out of the gospel of Christ, the other out of St. Paul's epistle written to the Romans. By these I meant to prove that Christ, being preached to us by the gospel, is received not by works but by faith; and I hope that by divine testimonies, I have so declared this matter of importance, that no man will afterward need either to doubt, or to waver in it. To all this I now add this note, which is still most necessary to observe: that all good and holy men in the church of Christ, must endeavour with all their power [to ensure] that this doctrine of the gospel may abide sincere and utterly uncorrupted. For they must in no case admit that justification is partly attributed to faith and the mercy of God, and partly to the works of faith and our own merits: for if that is admitted, then the gospel loses all force and virtue. I therefore think that all men must solely and incessantly urge this: That the faithful are justified, saved, or sanctified ³ by faith, without works, by the grace and mercy of God through Christ alone. And I suppose, truly, that this doctrine of the gospel must be kept sincere and uncorrupted in the church for very many reasons, but among all others, for these especially which follow.

First of all, the oft-repeated doctrine of the grace of God, which works justification in his only Son through faith alone, is manifest by so many divine testimonies, even from the beginning of the world, by so many demonstrations, and by so many determinations of unreprieveable councils, and it is so plainly declared and thoroughly inculcated — that the very consent of all ages in the truth revealed from heaven, and the authority of the most holy men in the whole world, sufficiently invite us to retain, maintain, and keep that doctrine uncorrupted. We have the justification of our blessed father Abraham briefly ⁴ expounded above by no obscure author, but by Paul, the teacher of the Gentiles and the elected vessel of God himself. We have the doctrine of justification that was taught by the most glorious king and prophet, ⁵ David, a man after God's heart's desire — the great grandsire of Christ our Lord — declared and expounded by the same apostle Paul.

Now Abraham and David were always men of chief account in the church of God. The whole company of the prophets wholly agree with these two. For the apostle Peter says, "All the prophets bore witness to Christ, that by his name everyone who believes in him should receive remission of his sins." ^{Act 10.43} And even now, by the mouth of Paul, we heard it said that by the testimonies of the law and the prophets, it is proved that the righteousness of God is freely bestowed by faith, without the law.

We also have the very Son of God, Jesus Christ, our Lord, whose authority, far excelling the whole world's beside, may confirm us well enough in this piece of doctrine.¹ For, as if it were in certain assembled councils, he determined and decreed what we in this place counsel all men to retain. For having gathered together his disciples at Caesarea Philippi, he demanded of them, what men thought of him. Now when they answered diversely, according to the diversity of the opinions that the common people had of him, he inquired what they themselves thought of him.² Then Peter, in the name of all the rest, said this: "You are that Christ, the Son of the living God." To whom the Lord replied: "Happy are you, Simon Bar-jona; for flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father which is in heaven." ^{Mat 16.16-17} In these words, he concludes two separate things: first, that true faith makes us happy. Nor is it to be doubted that "to make happy" is used here in that signification which you just heard from Paul, and in which David used it. Lastly, sanctifying³ faith is not the work of our own nature, but the heavenly gift of God. Then, upon that notable confession of true faith, Christ also takes occasion to give a new name to Simon Peter, to eternally commemorate it,⁴ and to imprint the signification of that mystery in all men's minds. Peter confessed that Christ was a stone, or rock; ^{1Pet 2.8} therefore Christ surnames Peter a Petra, that is, a stone. It is as if one were to call him a living stone laid upon a living stone, or of Christ a Christian.

Yes, and lest any man tie the thing universally belonging to the whole church, to Peter alone, the Lord himself applies it to the whole church, and says: "And upon this stone will I build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." It is as if he had said, That which now is done in you, Peter, shall afterward be done in all the faithful. By faith you are laid upon me, the stone, and are made a member of the church. I therefore ordain that whoever confesses me to be the stone, shall be a member of the church, sanctified,⁵ justified, and delivered from the devil and the power of death. Your confession (that I am Christ, the Son of God) shall be the foundation of the church; whoever is laid⁶ upon this foundation, shall be justified⁷ and freely saved. For Paul also said: "Another foundation cannot be laid than what is already laid, which is Christ Jesus." ^{1Cor 3.11} And the apostle John says: "This is the victory that has overcome the world, even your faith." ^{1Joh 5.4} Now, lest Peter and his fellow-disciples not know the way by which other men should be admitted into the fellowship of the church and received into the communion of Christ, he adds immediately: "And I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven; and whatever you loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven," etc., ^{Mat 16.19} He gave the keys when he sent the apostles to preach the gospel. Therefore, by the preaching of the gospel (which is the key of the kingdom of heaven), heaven is opened, and the way is pointed out how we, being grafted into Christ and the church, may be made the heirs of eternal life; namely, through faith in Christ, which we are taught by the gospel of Christ. This much touching the council of which Christ himself was president, held at Caesarea Philippi.⁸

There is found in John another council, held at Capernaum, ^{Joh 6.59} both famous and full of people. For in a great multitude of his disciples and other men, Christ establishes that eternal life is gotten by faith in him; and that there is no other way for us to come to life than this: "to eat My flesh, and drink My blood;" ^{Joh 6.54} that is, to believe in him. And when there was a schism among the audience because many revolted from Christ, he demanded of those who were his nearest disciples, whether they too would forsake him?

Then Peter in the name of all the rest answered: Since in you, Christ, there is life and salvation, if we depart from you we cannot be partakers of life; and therefore by faith we will firmly stick and cling close to you forever. ^{Joh 6.67-69}

Moreover, here are to be reckoned two other councils that were held by the apostles: the one which no man can deny was general or universal; for in it there were devout men of every nation under heaven. In that council Peter the apostle teaches in express words, that Christ is the Saviour of the world; whoever believes in him, shall have life everlasting. The place is known in the Acts of the Apostles, second chapter. Before the chief of the Jews, that same apostle declares that there is salvation in no other than Christ alone. The place is found in the Acts of the Apostles, the third chapter. He says the same to the first-fruits of the Gentiles, Cornelius and his household, in the tenth chapter. The second council, which was also famous and surpassingly adorned with all good gifts, is described in the fifteenth chapter of Acts. In this council, this proposition was allowed: that faith without works justifies freely. Touching this matter, I have spoken at large in another place.¹

Now, by all this I would have it proved that the doctrine of Faith that justifies without works, ought to be retained unmingled and uncorrupted in the church because, if I may say so, it is most catholic and altogether unreprouable. The apostle adds this curse or anathematism for its breach, saying: "If we, or an angel from heaven, preaches to you any other gospel than that which we have preached, let him be accursed." ^{Gal 1.8}

The second cause why it is expedient that this doctrine be kept sincere in the church, is because once it is put out of joint, the glory of Christ will be in danger of wrack,² and put in jeopardy. For the glory of Christ is darkened and corrupted in the minds of men (even though, of itself, it remains always sound and clear) if we begin to divide the righteousness by which we stand and appear before God, attributing it to our own merits and our own good works. For this is the glory of the Son of God, that "under heaven there is no other name given to men in which they must be saved." ^{Act 4.12}

Upon this Paul says: "Christ is made of no effect to you, whoever are justified by the law; you have fallen from grace." ^{Gal 5.4} Again: "I do not despise the grace of God; for if righteousness were of the law, then Christ died in vain." ^{Gal 2.21} If he died in vain, then the glory of Christ's cross has perished.

The third cause is the certain and assured reason of our salvation. Our salvation would be utterly uncertain if it depended on our works and merits. Because of our natural corruption, unless we are beside ourselves, we say or ought to say with Job: "If I have any righteousness, I will not answer, but humbly beseech my judge." ^{Job 9.15} Therefore Paul very rightly said: "If the inheritance is of the law, then faith is void, and the promise is made of no effect. Therefore, it is of faith, according to grace 3; that the promise may be firm to all the seed." ^{Rom 4.14, 16}

² Wrack: the destruction or collapse of something ("wrack and ruin").

The fourth cause is because, by this doctrine especially, there is repaired in us the image of God, the likeness of which we were created in at the first. For by faith, Christ dwells and lives in us; he is also delighted in our humility. But then the image of the devil is stirred up in us, once we begin to be proud in ourselves, and to usurp the glory of God. Undoubtedly, this is done as often as we attribute our righteousness and salvation to ourselves, as though we had deserved the kingdom of God by our own works or merits. The devil swells with pride, and endeavours to rob ¹ God of his glory. The saints know and acknowledge that they are saved by the true grace and mercy of God; and therefore they attribute to him all honour and glory, and to themselves confusion and ignominy. To this undoubtedly belongs the parable in the gospel, of the Pharisee boasting in his good works, and of the publican praying and saying, "God be merciful to me, a sinner." ^{Luk 18.9-14} Of these two, the publican is said to have gone down to his house ² justified, rather than the other.

The fifth cause is the value or estimation of the sin. For that seems to be no great fault, if it may be blotted out before God by men's works. But the holy scripture teaches that sins could be cleansed by no other means, than by the death and innocent blood of the Son of God. Now, every man that has any understanding, may easily gather by this, that sin in the sight of God is a most abominable and detestable thing. From this there arises in the faithful saints a careful and diligent watching against sin, and a continual bewailing of our miserable condition, with a surpassing humility and intense modesty.

I could yet add to these some more causes why all men ought to strive and endeavour to keep this doctrine sincere and uncorrupted in the church of Christ (e.g., that the catholic church is justified by the grace of God in his only-begotten Son, through faith, and not through works). But these I hope are sufficient for those who are not purposely set to quarrel against us. And yet, notwithstanding, there is no peril that good works would be neglected by this doctrine. I have spoken of this in a convenient place.³ But if there are any who do not cease to cavil on purpose against the manifest truth of the gospel, I use against them this saying of Paul: that neither we, nor the churches of God, stand to wrangle in so manifest a light. ^{1Cor 11.16}

To conclude, the sum of all that I have said up to here touching the gospel is this: That all men in the world who, of their own nature, are the servants of sin, the devil, and eternal death, cannot be loosed or set at liberty by any other means than the free grace of God, and the redemption which is in the only-begotten Son of God our Lord Christ Jesus. Only those who believe and trust in him, are made partakers of this redemption. For whoever receives Christ Jesus by true faith, through the preaching of the gospel, are thereby justified; that is, they are acquitted from their sins, sanctified, and made heirs of eternal life. But those who do not receive Christ, by their unbelief and hardness of heart, are given over to the eternal pains and bonds of hell; for "the wrath of God abides on them." ^{Joh 3.36}

Let us therefore give hearty thanks to God our Redeemer, and humbly beseech him to keep and increase us in the true faith, and at the last, to bring us to life everlasting. Amen.

4-2. THE SECOND SERMON: OF REPENTANCE.

OF REPENTANCE AND ITS CAUSES; OF CONFESSION AND REMISSION OF SINS; OF SATISFACTION AND INDULGENCES; OF THE OLD AND NEW MAN; OF THE POWER OR STRENGTH OF MEN, AND THE OTHER THINGS PERTAINING TO REPENTANCE.

I PROMISED in my last sermon about the gospel of Jesus Christ, to add a discourse about repentance; by the help of God and your good prayers I purpose to perform it in this sermon.

Among the Latins, those who are aggrieved at or ashamed by the thing that they have done, are said to repent. You have done a good turn, and think that the one for whom you have done it, is unworthy of it; and for that reason you are sorry to yourself. That sorrow of yours is repentance. We Germans call it Den reuen. The Greeks name it Metanaeam. Now, those who are skilful in that tongue say that metanoein signifies to think afterward: so that Metanaea is properly used where a man, once he has slipped by doing something foolish, at length comes to himself again, and truly purposes to correct his own error.¹ It therefore refers not only to the thought of the mind, but also to the deed that is done. For he that perceives that he has offended, devises for himself how to amend it. Now the thing begins to displease you, which pleased you before; so now you eschew the thing that you pursued before.² Moreover, the Hebrews call repentance Theschubah, that is, a conversion, or returning to the right way or right mind again.

The metaphor seems to be taken from those who once strayed from the right path, but at length return again into the way: this word is related to the mind, manners, and deeds of men.

But now this word is diversely used; for repentance signifies the changing of the purpose, or of any other thing, once it is conceived. For the Lord says by Jeremiah: "If they turn from evil, I will also repent of the evil which I meant to lay upon them." ^{Jer 18.8} Therefore, God repents when he changes his purpose: he does not repent when he does not alter it. Paul says: "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." ^{Rom 11.29} And David said: "The Lord has sworn, and will not repent." ^{Psa 110.4} Elsewhere, repentance is figuratively attributed to God, like the affection of mortal men; as when he says, "I repent that I have made man." ^{Gen 6.7} For God of his own nature does not repent as men do, so that he should be touched with grief, and that he should now disapprove of that which he approved before; rather, he barely alters what he has done. Among ecclesiastical writers, those are said to repent who, according to a prescribed manner of punishment, do penance for the sins they have committed. In another place, the scripture uses it for the whole effect and matter of the gospel. For in the Acts we read that God granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life. ^{Act 11.18} But, in this disputation of ours, we will use repentance for a converting or turning to the Lord; for acknowledging sins; for the grief conceived for sins committed; for mortification, and beginning to lead a new life; and finally, for the change, correction, and amendment of the life lived, from evil to better — that which we Germans call Bekehrung, Enderung oder Besseruny.³

And repentance is defined just as diversely by the ecclesiastical writers. Nevertheless, all agree that it is a conversion or turning to the Lord, and an alteration of the former life and opinion. We therefore say that repentance is an unfeigned turning to God, by which, being of a sincere fear of

God (once humbled), we acknowledge our sins; and so, by mortifying our old man, we are renewed afresh by the Spirit of God.

This definition consists in its parts which, being somewhat more largely opened and diligently expounded, will declare to us and lay before our eyes the whole nature of repentance.

First, we say that repentance is an unfeigned turning to God. For I will afterward show you that there are two sorts of repentance; namely, feigned and unfeigned. And the apostle Peter says: "Repent, and turn, that your sins may be blotted out;" ^{Act 3.19} — expounding, as it were, the first by the last, namely, repentance by returning; (he means) returning to Him from whom they had turned away. For there is a certain relation between turning to and turning fro. If you had never turned away, then you would have had no need to turn back again. But we have all turned away from the true, just, and good God, and from his holy will, to the devil and our own corrupt affections. And therefore, we must again turn from the devil, and from our old naughty life and will, to the living God and to his most holy will and pleasure. We say here, significantly, to God, and not to creatures or to any help of man. For the Lord says in Jeremiah, "If, Israel, you will return, return to me." Jer 4.1 Whoever therefore does not turn to God, nor make themselves conformable to his holy will, however they may turn to creatures and other means of man's invention, they are not ¹ esteemed or counted penitents.

Now, none is so blind as not to see that to stir us up to repentance, the preaching or doctrine of the truth is needful and requisite, to teach us what God is to whom we must be turned; what goodness and holiness are, to which we must be turned; who the devil is, and what the evil and wickedness are, from which we must be turned; and lastly, what the thing is that must be amended in our mind and life, and also how it must be altered and amended. Truly, the prophets and apostles of the Lord, in exhorting men to repentance, travail much and stay long in describing God's nature, goodness, righteousness, truth and mercy; in painting the laws and offices of the life of man; and in accusing and heaping up ² the sins of men.

To this they add the grievous and horrible tokens of God's just judgments: as very rifely found in every place of the prophets' writings. And therefore, there are some who bid us even now to preach the law to those men whom we would draw to repentance. I do not question this, but very well like it, so I admonish them that the preaching of the gospel also confronts men with their sins, and grievously accuses them. For the Lord says in the gospel: "When the Holy Ghost comes, it shall convict the world of sin, because they did not believe in me." ^{Joh 16.8} Whereupon St. Peter, in the Acts of the Apostles, upbraiding the Jews for the sins they committed, and preaching Christ to them, and faith in Christ, he exhorts them to repentance. The places are very well known, Acts 2 and 3. St. Paul, preparing to draw the Athenians to repentance, says: "God, who has up to now winked at the times of this ignorance, now preaches to all men everywhere, that they should repent because he has appointed a day in which he will judge the world with righteousness through Christ." ^{Act 17.30-31} Let those, therefore, to whom charge is given to draw men ³ to repentance, learn here to use much liberty and wisdom, so that all men may acknowledge their sin and the greatness of their iniquity. Moreover, God stirs men up to repentance, not by his word only, but also by diverse afflictions and various sorts of punishments. Yes, all the calamities that happen in the world are certain sermons, as it were, persuading and drawing us to repentance. That I may pass over in silence what is written in the prophets, did not our Lord himself in the gospel, when he heard tidings of the slaughter which Pontius Pilate had made upon the Galileans, and the death of the eighteen men upon whom the tower in Siloam fell, quickly say, "Do you think that they were greater sinners than the rest? No, truly; but unless you repent, you shall all likewise perish." ^{Luk 13.1-5} It is assuredly certain, therefore, that war, famine, and plagues always invite us to repentance; that is, they premonish us to be converted to God, by laying sin aside, and to give ourselves wholly to sincere integrity.

But repentance is preached to us in vain, unless by fear and trembling conceived in our minds, we reverently dread the wrath and judgment of Almighty God conceived against us because of our sins and wickednesses. Now, this fear is outwardly stirred in us by the external preaching or discipline of the minister,¹ as I told you before; but that external doctrine avails nothing, unless inwardly, that is, in our hearts, we are moved by the Holy Spirit of our heavenly Father. And therefore Jeremiah in his Lamentations cries: "Turn us, O Lord, and we shall be turned." ^{Lam 5.21} And in the thirty-first chapter: "Turn me, Lord, and I shall be turned; because you are the Lord my God. And after I was turned, it repented me of evil." ^{Jer 31.18-19} We read that St. Peter, being provoked by the words of the damsel who kept the door, and by the soldiers, ffully denied his master Christ. But being revoked² at the cock's crowing, he repented his fault or folly from the bottom of his heart. And yet it was not the crowing of the cock of itself alone, that stirred that motion in him; but that and the word of Christ together, who had said to him: "Truly I say to you, the cock shall not crow till you have denied me three times." Upon which St. Matthew says; "And Peter remembered the words of the Lord, who had said to him, Before the cock crows, you shall deny me three times," etc. ^{Mat 26.34, 75} With these is also joined a more secret touching of Peter's mind; for the good Lord touched the heart of Peter, as the evangelist testifies, saying: "And the Lord, turning himself about, looked upon Peter." ^{Luk 22.61} That looking back of the Lord made Peter's heart melt, and drew it from the destruction into which it was about to fall. Therefore, if our ears are pierced with the word of God, and our hearts touched with his Holy Spirit, then like true penitents, we will unfeignedly reverence and dread the Lord.

And with this, being humbled before the most just and holy God, whom with our sins we so much offend and provoke to wrath and indignation, we confess his judgment to be just against us, and freely acknowledge all the sins and iniquities that in the word of God are objected against us, crying out and saying with the prophets:

"You, truly, Lord, are righteous; you are true, and your judgments are just; but we are most unrighteous, liars, wicked, and wholly overwhelmed with detestable iniquities. There is nothing sound or sincere within us. All that we have is corrupt and miserable. We have sinned, we have been wicked, we have done unjustly, we have forsaken you. We have questioned your servants the prophets, we have not obeyed the words of your mouth. Righteousness belongs to you, therefore, God; and to us wretches, belong shame and confusion." ³

God requires of penitent sinners, this humiliation and free confession of sin. I will afterward say something more touching this; for now, I return to more fully expound the fear of the Lord.

At present I speak of the sincere fear of God: for we confess that the fear of God is of two sorts, sincere and insincere. The sincere fear of God is perceived in the faithful, and it is a godly reverence consisting in the love and honour of God. For the prophet brings in God saying: "The son honours the father, and the servant the master: therefore if I am a father, where is my honour?"

if a lord, where is my fear?" ^{Mal 1.6} And Paul says: "You have not received the spirit of bondage again unto fear; but you have received the spirit of adoption, by which we cry, Abba, Father." ^{Rom 8.15} Therefore, the sincere fear of God in those who repent is not the servile dread of punishment, but a careful study mixed with the love and honour of God. An honest wife fears her husband, and a gracious daughter fears her father;¹ and yet with that, each of them loves — the one her father, the other her husband; and each of them with a holy love endeavours to keep his favour, and fears lest at any time she should do anything to lose it. And therefore penitents, being taught by the Spirit of God, not only fear because they know they have committed sins for which they deserved to be forsaken by the Lord; but they also love Him as their merciful Father, and are therefore sorry with all their heart for the sins they have committed; and above all things, they most ardently require to be reconciled again to their merciful God and loving Father.

For with this sincere fear of God, is joined the grief or sorrow which is conceived by the Spirit of God for our sins that we commit. St. Paul mentions two sorts of sorrows. "The sorrow that is toward God," he says, "brings forth repentance, ² not to be repented of; but contrarily, the sorrow of the world brings death." ^{2Cor 7.10}

The king and prophet David sorrowed toward God, when he cried: "Your arrows stick fast in me, and your hand presses me sorely. No part in my flesh is whole because of your displeasure; there is no rest in my bones because of my sin;" ^{Psa 38.2} and so forth, as seen in the thirty-eighth Psalm. Although it was written about his grievous disease or sickness, yet, as if it were in a shadow, it shows us the great grief that is found in the saints for offending their good and gracious Father with their continual ³ sins. In St. Luke, the sinful woman was sorry toward God. Falling prostrate at the Lord's heels, she washed his feet with tears, and wiped them with her hair. ^{Luk 7.38} St. Peter was sorry toward God, and bitterly wept (as we read) for his offence. ^{Luk 22.62} The godly are greatly grieved because, so often, they so foully offend so good a God and gracious Father. No words, I think, can possibly express the grief and sorrow that they conceive. But the prophet Jeremiah, describing the contrary affection of impenitent sinners, says of them:

"Do men so fall, that they may not rise again? Does any man go so astray, that he may not turn back? How does it happen, then, that these people of Jerusalem are turned away so stubbornly? I gave ear and listened, but they did not speak rightly: none repented of his wickedness, so as to say, What have I done? Every one of them turned to his own course, like a fierce horse, headlong to the battle." ^{Jer 8.4-6}

Worldly grief is the sorrow of those men who do not know God, and are without faith and the true love of God; indeed, of those who yield under the burden of sorrow, adversities, and ⁴ sins. Like this also, in a way, is the consideration of the insincere fear of God. For the wicked, with their head, the devil, do not fear God as a father whom they are sorry to offend, and to whom they desire to be reconciled as a father; rather, they fear God as a tormentor, because they know that he will revenge their evil deeds. And therefore, with Judas, ⁵ they run ⁶ to the rope. ^{Mat 27.5} There is no love of God in them, no honour, no good-will, no reverence, but mere hatred,⁷ horror, and utter desperation.

⁴ adeoque et, Lat.; and so of their sins also.

But John the apostle and evangelist, denied that such fear is found in charity, saying that "perfect charity casts out all fear." ^{1Joh 4.18} I do not mean the fear of the Lord which is the beginning of wisdom, but that fear about which I have spoken all this while — the fear, I mean, that is in the devil, and wicked men who are his members. ¹

And now, by this we gather that faith in God, and the merit of Christ, is most of all and especially needful for penitents. It is in this sense, I think, that many have made faith a part of repentance. I do not greatly deny this. Yet I see that St. Paul made a distinction between faith and repentance when, in the twentieth chapter of the Acts, he says that "he witnessed to both the Jews and Gentiles, the repentance that is toward God, and the faith that is in Jesus Christ." Therefore, repentance and faith seem to be diverse. It is not that true repentance can exist without faith; but they must be distinguished, and not confounded. We all know that true faith is not without works — that of necessity, it produces good works. Yet we differentiate between faith and works, without separating them or rending the one from the other. And in like manner, we acknowledge that true faith and true repentance are undividedly knit together, and closely fastened one to the other. I will not argue whether faith is a part of repentance, or by any other means depends upon it. It seems to me a notable point of folly to go about tying matters of divinity to precepts of logic, for we do not learn that from the Lord's apostles. I admonished you in a previous sermon about the gospel ² (which I repeat here), that acknowledging sins does not, of itself, obtain grace or forgiveness of sins; even as the bare acknowledging of a disease is not the remedy for it. For even damned men acknowledge their sins, and yet they are not thereby healed. Acknowledging sin is a certain preparative to faith; just as acknowledging a disease provides an occasion to think about a remedy.

We add to this, at present, that it is not the very fear of God, however sincere it is; it is not the very sorrow conceived for our sins, however great it is; nor is it the very humiliation, however submissive it is, of themselves, that make us ³ acceptable to God. Rather, they prepare an entrance and make a way for us to the knowledge of Christ, and consequently, they lead us to Christ himself, being incarnate and crucified for us and our redemption; and they lay us upon Christ alone, to be quickened and purely cleansed by him. For one who is truly converted to God is utterly turned from himself and from all hope of worldly aid. Whoever truly fears God and is sorry indeed from the bottom of his heart, fears and is sorry for sins that he committed; and not for that alone, but because he finds himself wholly corrupted, and to have no soundness or integrity in himself. Indeed, because he reverences God as his Father, he discloses his wounds to Him, as he would to a surgeon, desiring to be instantly reconciled to Him as to his loving Father. True godliness cries that no man can be reconciled to God the Father except by the only-begotten Son. And here, the penitent lays hold on the Son by faith, and so he seeks the means of his reconciliation.⁴ Faith is grounded on the only grace or mercy of God exhibited to us in Christ Jesus, and the penitent believes that he is accepted by God for Christ's sake alone. Therefore, he makes his supplications to God, committing himself wholly to His mercy, as we read that David did, and the prodigal son in the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke's gospel. To this place might be annexed the doctrine of the gospel, of faith in Jesus Christ, and of the remission of sins. I have already spoken touching these things.

And here, I think it is not amiss to say that the minds of penitents must by all means be confirmed with many and evident places of scripture, plainly uttered, concerning the full remission of sins. This is to the end that from then on, there is no scruple of conscience to cause us to despair or doubt in our temptations. Notwithstanding, I repeat again and again this note, which is to be thoroughly marked for the confirmation of the glory of the only-begotten Son of God, our Lord Christ Jesus: that penitent sinners have their sins remitted, not for their repentance, in the respect that it is their work or action; but in the respect that it comprehends the renewing of man by the Holy Ghost, and true faith which delivers us to Christ our physician, that he may heal all our diseases and bind up all our griefs.¹

This treatise properly belongs in the common place of faith and the gospel, which I have already discussed as briefly as I could. Yet, notwithstanding, I will here recite some evident sentences touching the grace of God, and free remission of our sins. David says in the hundred and third psalm:

"Praise the Lord, my soul, and do not forget the things that he has done for you; who forgives all your sins, and heals all your infirmities; who saves your life from destruction, and crowns you with mercy and loving-kindness. He has not dealt with us according to our sins, nor rewarded us according to our wickedness. For look how high the heaven is in comparison to the earth; so great is his mercy toward those who fear him. And look how far the east is from the west; so far has he set our sins from us. Yes, like a father pities his own children, so the Lord is merciful to those who fear him. For he knows that we are frail (prone to sin), and He remembers that we are but dust." Psa 103.1-14

Isaiah in the first chapter of his prophecy says: "Thus says the Lord, Though your sins are red as scarlet, they shall be made whiter than snow; and though they are red as purple, they shall be made like undyed ² wool." Isa 1.18 Again, in the forty-third chapter he brings in the Lord saying: "I am He that blots out your transgressions — and that is for My own sake, and I will not remember your sins." Isa 43.25

The Lord says in the thirty-first chapter of Jeremiah,^{31.24} which is also alleged by Paul in the eighth and tenth chapters to the Hebrews: "This is my covenant that I will make with them after these days; I will be merciful to their iniquities, and not remember their sins any more." Heb 8.12

In the thirty-sixth chapter of Ezekiel, the Lord says: "I will sprinkle clean water on you, and you shall be cleansed from all your uncleanness. A new heart I will also give you, and a new spirit I will put within you; as for that stony heart, I will take it out of your flesh, and give you a fleshy heart. I will deliver you from all your uncleanness. But I will not do this for your sakes, says the Lord; be sure of that," etc. Eze 36.26f

Daniel, in his ninth chapter, leaves us a manifest example of a confession of sins. He says in express words that by the Messiah, our sins are forgiven, our iniquity is purged, and instead of it, everlasting righteousness is brought in.³ So the prophet Zechariah affirms in his third chapter, that the iniquity of the earth is purged by the only sacrifice of Christ Jesus.

In the gospel of St. Matthew, The Lord says: "The healthy do not need the physician, but those who are sick. Nor did I come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." Mat 9.12-13 And therefore he is called Jesus, that is, a Saviour: for the angel said, "He shall save his people from their sins." ^{Mat 1.21} And St. Paul says to Timothy: "It is a sure saying, and by all means worthy to be received, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners." ^{1Tim 1.15}

In the same gospel, the Lord says: "Every sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven men; but blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven men. And whoever says a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whoever speaks a word against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, nor in the world to come." ^{Mat 12.31-32} Concerning sin against the Holy Ghost, I have already spoken in another place.¹ Now to this place belong all the examples of that most liberal kind of forgiveness which is expressed in the gospel — for example, of the sinful woman, Luke 7.39f; also [the woman at the well], John 4.5f and [the demon-possessed man], Matthew 8.28f; of Zacchaeus, ^{Luk 19.2f} St. Peter, ^{Luk 22.32f} and the thief on the cross. ^{Luk 23.39f} But who is able to briefly reckon them all? To this also pertain the three parables in the gospel according to the evangelist, St. Luke.²

In the gospel of St. John, the forerunner of the Lord cries out, saying: "Behold the Lamb of God, that takes away the sins of the world." ^{Joh 1.29} And the Lord himself said to his disciples: "Whoever's sins you forgive, they are forgiven." ^{Joh 20.23}

The apostle Peter cries out in Acts, saying: "All the prophets bear witness to Christ, that whoever believes in him, would receive remission of sins by his name." ^{Act 10.43} The apostle says again in his Epistle: "Christ himself bore our sins in his body upon the cross, that we, being dead to sin, might live to righteousness, by whose stripes you are healed." ^{1Pet 2.24}

The apostle Paul, in the fifth chapter of his second epistle to the Corinthians says: "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their sins to them. For he that knew not sin, was made sin for us; that through him we might be made the righteousness of God." ^{2Cor 5.19} And in the tenth chapter to the Hebrews he has: "Christ, having offered one sacrifice for sin, has sat down at the right hand of God forever; from then tarrying till his foes are made his footstool. For with one offering has he made perfect forever those who are sanctified." ^{Heb 10.12-14}

Moreover, the blessed apostle and evangelist John testifies no less truly than evidently, saying: "The blood of Jesus Christ the Son of God cleanses us from all sin." ^{1Joh 1.7} And again: "And he is the propitiation for our sins; not only for ours, but also for the sins of the whole world." ^{1Joh 2.2}

But now, the Novatians and Anabaptists are the most vain and the very messengers of Satan himself, who pretend that by baptism we are purged into an angelical life, which is not polluted with any spots at all. But if it is polluted, then the one who is so defiled can look for no pardon at all.³ For (passing over many other places of holy scripture), was not St. Peter consecrated to God in baptism? Had he not tasted of God's good grace? ⁴ After that notable confession which he made, the Lord said to him: "Happy are you, Simon Bar-Jona; flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father which is in heaven." ^{Mat 16.17} Again, when the Lord demanded of his disciples, saying, "Will you depart also?" then Peter in the name of them all answered; "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life; and we believe and know that you are Christ, the Son of the living God." ^{Joh 6.67}

And yet this very same Peter, after his baptism and tasting of the grace of God, sinned notwithstanding — and that too was not lightly,¹ in denying and forswearing his Lord and Master. Now, was he altogether unpardonable for this sin of his? Was his return to God again stopped up by his stumbling? No, truly. For when he heard the cock crow, he quickly remembered the words of the Lord, descended into himself, considered what he had done, wept bitterly, and mourned lamentably. And yet he was not long tormented in that grief without consolation. For the third day after, the angels said to the women who came to the Lord's sepulchre, "Tell his disciples, and Peter, that he is risen, and goes before you into Galilee." Look here, the Lord would have it known to Peter, by name, that he was risen. And why to Peter by name? Because, in truth, he had sinned more grievously than the others. Not that the Lord liked Peter's sin; but because he would thereby declare to us, that penitents obtain forgiveness of their sins, so often as they turn to the heavenly grace of God again. Not many days after, he restored Peter to the ministry again, commending to him the charge of his sheep. Joh 21.15-17

Moreover, in Jeremiah the Lord speaks to the people of Israel, saying: "If any man puts away his wife, and she ² marries another man, will her first husband return to her? But is this land not defiled? Have you not committed fornication with many? Yet return to me, says the Lord." Jer 3.1 And the Galatians, having been rightly instructed by the apostle Paul, but afterward seduced by false apostles, revolted from the truth and the preaching of the gospel. Yet, notwithstanding, they obtained pardon. The Corinthians also, after they had received grace, wittingly and willingly sinned in many things. Yet, upon repentance, the apostle Paul promised them forgiveness of their sins at the hands of the Lord.

And what is more manifest than this, that all the saints pray daily, in earnest and truly, not hypocritically or falsely, saying, "Forgive us our trespasses?" Those who thus pray, plainly confess that they are sinners; and the Lord promises to hear those who pray with faith. Therefore, even those sins are forgiven at the prayers of penitents, which are committed after the grace of God is known and obtained.

Now the places in the epistle to the Hebrews, which the Novatians allege to confirm their opinion, I have so thoroughly discussed in another place,³ that I need not busily stay here too long upon them.

But now, to gather a sum of those things which I have said up to here concerning repentance; let us hold, that repentance is a turning to God which, even though he stirs it up in us by his word and other means, is so wrought in us, notwithstanding, especially by the Holy Ghost, that with fear we love, and with love we fear our just God and merciful Lord, from whom we were turned back, being sorry now with all our hearts that with our sins, we ever offended so gracious a Father. For being humbled before his eternal and most sacred majesty, we acknowledge the sins that are objected against us by the word of God. Yes, we acknowledge that there is no integrity or soundness in us; but we heartily desire to be reconciled with God again: and since that reconciliation cannot be made otherwise than by the only Mediator, the Lord Christ Jesus, we lay hold on him by faith, by whom we, being acquitted from all our sins, are reputed by God to be righteous and holy. Whoever sincerely acknowledges this benefit, cannot help but hate sin, and mortify the old man.

I would therefore now add other members belonging to this treatise of repentance; namely, the mortification of the old man, and the renewing of the spirit, were it not that the very matter itself requires to have something said touching the confession of sins and satisfaction for it. For there are some who, when they speak of repentance, say some things that are contrary to the truth. Therefore, dearly beloved, to the end that you not be ignorant of what to think about these points according to the truth, I will not hesitate to stay awhile in the exposition of them. And I hope that, out of my words, you will gather such fruit that you will not afterwards repent of it.

To confess, or a confession, is diversely used in the holy scriptures. For it signifies to praise the Lord, and to give him thanks for the benefits that we receive from his hands; and therefore confession is used for praise and thanksgiving. For the prophet says: "O praise the Lord; for he is good, and his mercy endures forever." Paul says in his epistle to Titus, speaking of hypocrites, "In words they confess that they know God, but in their deeds they deny him." ^{Tit 1.16} Here, confess signifies to say, profess, or boast. In another place it is taken for trust, to stay upon God's goodness, and to testify of that confidence, by words as well as deeds. And St. John used it in that sense in the fourth chapter of his epistle, and Paul in the tenth chapter to the Romans. Moreover, to confess is to give glory to God, and freely acknowledge your sin and the judgment which is objected against you for your sin. Solomon in the twenty-eighth chapter of his Proverbs says: "Whoever hides his iniquities" (or as it were, defends them), "nothing shall go well with him: but whoever confesses and forsakes them, mercy shall be shown to him." ^{Pro 28.13} The Hebrew tongue uses the word Jadah for what we call "confess." Now Jadah signifies to let slack, or loose, as when a bent bow is unbent again. And Modeh, which comes from Jadah,¹ is as if one were to say, confessing, yielding, or granting to be vanquished.² For God accuses us, and pleads us guilty of sin and endangered³ to punishment: which our flesh does not quickly acknowledge, but remains stiff like a bent bow, until at length, when that stiffness is unbent, it acknowledges everything that God objects against us. The acknowledging is called Modeh, that is, a confession.

And we Germans say, Es hat gelassen, Er hat geschnell,⁴ when we mean something has yielded, or a man has at last confessed what before he either flatly denied or else dissembled.

But now, confession of sins is of more than one sort; for the one is divine, the other human. I will first speak of the divine confession, then of the human.

We call it a divine confession, for which there are evident testimonies or examples in the holy scriptures, and which is instituted by God himself. It is a free acknowledging and flat confession of the sin which God objects against us, by which we attribute all glory to God, and all shame and confusion to ourselves; and with this, we crave pardon of God, and of our neighbour, against whom we have sinned. Now, sin is objected against us by God himself, who pleads us guilty of sin, and endangered to punishment, doing this outwardly by the word or the ministry of men, and sometimes by signs and wonders; and inwardly by the secret operation of his Holy Spirit — thus requiring from us a free and voluntary confession of our sins. For He likes a free and voluntary confession, not a feigned or extorted one.⁵ Truly, the citizens of Jerusalem and people of the Jewish religion of their own accord came to the baptism of John, confessing their sins, which John had objected against them in his preaching. And after the ascension of Christ into heaven, St. Peter accused of the Jews of their sins; and immediately upon the accusation it follows in the history: "When they heard this, they were pricked in their hearts, and said to Peter and the other apostles, Men and brethren, what shall we do?" and so forth, as follows in the second chapter of the Acts. Likewise also, the keeper of the prison at Philippi,¹ feeling the earthquake, sprang out, and being instructed with the apostle's words, confessed his sins and was baptized.² And the men of Ephesus who were given to magical arts, when they heard the calamity which the devil brought upon the sons of Sceva, their fellows and practisers in magic and sorcery, exceedingly feared, and came and confessed their sins. The confession of sins especially arises upon these causes, for the most part.

Again, there are two sorts of confession instituted by God, one of which is made to God, and the other to our neighbour. That which is made to God is either private or public.

We make our confession to GOD privately, when we disburden our hearts before God, open the secrets of our hearts to him alone, and, in acknowledging the sins that are in us, we earnestly beseech him to have mercy upon us. This confession is necessary to obtain pardon for our sins. For unless we acknowledge our own corruption and unrighteousness, we will never by true faith lay hold on Christ, by whom alone we are to be justified. Here we do not think that penitents must hasten to confess their sins to any other confessor but God alone; for He alone forgives and blots out the offences of penitents.³ He is the physician, to whom alone we must reveal and open our wounds. He is the one that is offended by us, and therefore we must desire forgiveness⁴ and reconciliation from Him. He alone looks into our hearts and searches our reins;⁵ to Him alone we must therefore disclose our hearts. He alone calls sinners to him. Let us therefore make haste to him, prostrate ourselves before him, confess our faults to him, and crave pardon from Him. This confession, if it is made of a zealous mind toward God, even if it cannot be made by word of mouth because of some impediment or lack of the tongue,⁶ it is notwithstanding acceptable to God,⁷ who does not so much respect the mouth, as the mind of man. On the other side, if we make confession with the mouth, and are not thoroughly bent in heart to it, even though we make that confession to God or to the high-priest, yet the Lord does not regard so vain a confession.

I have already spoken concerning that true confession to God, though in the definition of repentance, I said that penitents acknowledge their sins. The scripture in many places speaks of this substantially.

David confesses in the Psalms, "Have mercy upon me, God, according to the greatness of your mercy. For I acknowledge my sins, and my sin is ever before me. To you alone have I sinned, and done evil in your sight." ^{Psa 51.1} And so forth. And in another Psalm,^{32.5} "I have made my fault known to you, and I have not hidden my unrighteousness. I said, I will confess my unrighteousness to you⁸ against myself, and you have forgiven the wickedness of my sin." In the gospel, the Lord teaches us to pray, and to confess in prayer, saying, "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors." And, when we pray so, he bids us to go aside into our chamber, ^{Mat 6.6} that our heart and the devotion of our hearts may there appear to our heavenly Father alone. The prodigal son in the field, where none but swine were to be seen, privately makes and offers the confession of his sin to his father.¹ And the publican in the gospel, which is compared with the Pharisee, beats his breast, and confesses with a lamentable voice, "Lord, be merciful to me, a sinner." ^{Luk 18.13} Let us now also hear John, the holy apostle and evangelist, comprehending all that may be truly spoken touching this confession, in this one saying: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all iniquity." ^{1Joh 1.8-9} To this private confession, which is made to God, is always joined that voluntary confession which is made before men. For penitents are humbled as often as the matter, the glory of God, and the safeguard of our neighbour requires, and they openly testify before men that they have sinned against God. For so David, when Nathan the prophet told him of his sin, cried out, saying: "I have sinned against the Lord." ^{2Sam 12.13} So also Zacchaeus, understanding that the Lord was upbraided for receiving him,² openly confesses his sin, and promises amendment. ^{Luk 19.8}

Truly, we publicly make our confession to God, as I told you a little earlier; but so much the better when, after the hearing the word of truth in that public or solemn manner, we either in the church, or otherwise in some congregation or holy assembly,³ recite our sins that we have committed, and cry to God for mercy and pardon of it. Truly, the Lord appointed in our forefathers' days, that the priest should lead the people with words premeditated for the purpose, and the whole people should follow him word for word, and openly confess their sins in the temple.⁴ From this, undoubtedly, it is received today in the church of the Christians, that with the pastor or doctor of the church leading in conceived words at the end of the exposition of the scriptures, and before the assembly is dismissed, all the people should openly in the temple confess all their sins against God, and heartily desire that He forgive them, of His mercy.⁵ The public confessions of sins are notably known, which were made by Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. And I say plainly ⁶ that it was a public confession of sins, which St. Matthew in his third chapter says that the Jews made. For all Jewry came out to John, the forerunner of the Lord, "and were baptized by him in the Jordan, confessing their sins." ^{Mat 3.6} For when they publicly received baptism, they thereby declared and openly confessed their sins. For baptism is the sign of the cleansing of sins. Therefore, those who are baptized confess that they are sinners.

Those who were not baptized, thought they were otherwise purged and did not need any sanctification. The Ephesians publicly confessed their sins when, gathering their books of witchcraft together, they burned them in the fire. For by burning those books, they confessed that they had committed wickedness that was to be purged with fire.

Now, the confession that is made to our NEIGHBOUR is of this sort: You have offended your brother, or perhaps he has done you injury, for which you are both at discord, and hate one another. In this case, truly, you must think of reconciliation. Let the one therefore go to the other and confess, and ask pardon for the fault committed; and let the one that is innocent in the matter ¹ freely forgive the one who confesses his fault, and so become his friend again. The apostle James spoke of this confession, saying: "Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that you may be healed." ^{Jas 5.16} And our Lord and Saviour, before James taught us, said: "If you offer your gift at the altar" (for he speaks to those among whom at that time the sacrifices of the law were still in use), "and remember there that your brother has anything against you, leave your gift there before the altar, and go your way; first be reconciled to your brother, and then you may come and offer your gift." ^{Mat 5.23-24} To this also belongs that parable which the Lord puts forth and expounds in the eighteenth chapter of St. Matthew, about the one who was cast into perpetual prison because, when he had found favour at his Lord's hand, he was overly cruel to his fellow-servant, to whom he would not forgive so much as a farthing. For in the sixth chapter of St. Matthew, the Lord says: "If you forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if you do not forgive men their trespasses, no more will your Father forgive you your trespasses." ^{Mat 6.14-15} It is not that by forgiving others, our sins are forgiven us; for then forgiveness of our sins would not be free, but would come by our merits, and as the recompense of our deserts. But when our sins are freely forgiven through faith, truly that unreconcilable and hard heart is an assured argument that there is no faith in a hard, stubborn, and unappeasable man.

And where there is no faith, there is no remission. Therefore, voluntary forgiveness in a man towards his neighbour is not that for which we are forgiven by God our Father. Rather, it is an evident sign and natural fruit of true faith, and of the grace of God in us.

To these two kinds of confession some men add that consultation by which those who are oppressed in conscience with any grievous sin, consult or ask counsel either of the pastor of the Lord's flock, or else of some other who is expert and skilful in the laws of God. But that is rather to be termed a consultation than a confession; and it is not commanded or forbidden in any place [of Scripture], and therefore it is left free to every man's choice. Therefore, no man ought to be compelled to this consultation. But if any brother demands counsel either of the minister of the church, or of any other private brother, then charity commands you to satisfy him, if you can. Indeed, if he does not demand, and you see your brother in danger, charity again commands you to admonish the one who is thus in danger, and to handle him as a brother. For Paul says to the Galatians: "Brethren, if a man is prevented in any fault, you who are spiritual should restore such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering yourself, lest you also be tempted. Bear one another's burden, and so fulfil the law of Christ." ^{Gal 6.1} But this does not belong to confession at all; therefore we return to our purpose again.

We have said this much up to here touching the confession of sins which God has instituted. Now we will annex something touching the confession of sins that men have ordained. That confession also is of two sorts: the one is public ritual or ceremonial, which for the most part they call exomologesis; the other is private or secret and is called auricular.

I call the public confession ritual, not so much because it is the acknowledging or confession of sin, as because it is the penitential action for the sin committed.

For Isidore the bishop, in Libro Etymol. ² vi. cap. 18, says: Exomologesis "is the discipline of prostrating and humbling men in habit, in living, to lie in sack and ashes, to deface the body with filth, to mourn and lament with a sorrowful mind, and through sorrow to amend that in which they sinned before." ¹ I would not have recited these words of bishop Isidore to you, dearly beloved, who is not a very famous author, unless I had seen the same words in the book which Tertullian wrote about repentance;² and unless I had found an example of it in Eusebius, who in the fifth book and last chapter of his Ecclesiastical History says:

"Natalis the martyr,³ being seduced by heretics, and at length understanding his error, rises up in the morning, and puts on a sack cloth, sprinkling himself with ashes, and with many tears bewailing his error. He casts himself prostrate at the feet of Zephyrinus the bishop and all others — not only clerics, but laymen also — with great lamentation and exceeding sorrow. He provoked all the congregation with earnest and continual prayers, to request of Christ Jesus, to pardon his offence." ⁴

I will speak later touching the rites of repentance. Now, this ritual or ceremonial repentance, as it was used among those of old, appears not to have been commanded by God, such that whoever today commits any sin, should be compelled to quickly confess it openly in this same way that they were in the habit of doing.

For where is it read that such penance was enjoined of the sinful or adulterous woman that is mentioned in the gospel? ⁵ Many other sinners are received by Christ into the grace of God without such outward penance. For it is very well known how Christ dealt with Matthew, with Zacchaeus, with Peter who denied him, and with many others. Therefore, we do not amiss believe that the old bishops and priests invented that public kind of penance for discipline's sake, and that of their times, they might have less liberty to sin. Truly Hermius Sozomenus Salaminius,⁶ that notable writer of the Ecclesiastical History, in his seventh book, sixteenth chapter, says: "In the beginning, it pleased the priests that, as if it were in a theatre, all the congregation might bear witness of the sins of offenders being openly punished." Look here, he says, "It pleased the priests." He also adds that there was a priest appointed, to whom those who sinned would come and confess their sins, and hear from him the penance, namely, what they should do, or how they should compensate ⁷ for their transgression. Immediately after, he describes the manner of penance used in the Romish church. And to that, he again adds that,

"in the church at Constantinople, there was a priest appointed to hear penitents; this office remained till at length, a certain gentlewoman, who for the sins that she had confessed, was enjoined by such a penitentiary to fast, and to pray to God. Thereby, having occasion to be long in the church, she was at last exposed to have played the whore with a deacon. For this reason, the priests were spoken evil of. But Nectareus the bishop, devising how it would be best to deal with such a grievous crime, deprived the deacon who had committed the sin, of his deaconship. And because some persuaded them to leave it free to everyone, according to his own conscience and confidence, to come to the communion of the mysteries, he quite removed the office of that penitentiary priesthood. And ever since that time, that counsel given to Nectareus has prevailed, and endures even to this day." And so forth.

His source was largely the writings of Socrates Scholasticus. But he went back to the principal sources, often including more than Socrates did. He also used the writings of Eusebius, Athanasius, Rufinus, Sabinus and Olympiodorus of Thebes, as well as oral tradition. CCEL.

In the beginning of the chapter, [Hermias] says: "Nectareus, the bishop of Constantinople, first removed from the church the priest who was appointed to hear the confession of penitents, whom all the other bishops in a manner followed."¹

But the bishop Nectareus would not have abrogated that exomologesis (being so holy a man as indeed he was), if he had understood that it had been instituted by God himself: nor would it have been lawful for him to have abrogated it. Therefore he knew, even as Sozomen also confesses, that by the counsel of the bishops, that order of penance was usurped in the church. Nor do we read that John Chrysostom, who succeeded Nectareus,² and was a very diligent and severe bishop, ever restored that ritual penance which his predecessor had abrogated before him. For in the thirty-first homily on St. Paul's Epistle to the Hebrews, he writes:

"I bid you not to betray yourself openly, nor yet accuse yourself to others; but I would have you obey the holy prophet, who says, Open your way to the Lord. Therefore confess your sins before God, the true and upright Judge, with prayers for the injury committed:³ not with your tongue, but with the memory of your conscience. And then at length believe that you may obtain mercy, if you have it⁴ in your mind continually,"⁵ and so forth.

Again, on the fiftieth Psalm: "If you are ashamed to tell your sins to any man because you have sinned, yet say them daily in your own heart. I bid you not to confess them to your fellow, that he should upbraid you: tell them to your God who regards them. If you do not tell them, God is not ignorant of them; for He was at hand when you did them."⁶ And again in another place he says: "I do not bring you forth into the theatre of your companions. I do not compel you to reveal your sins to mortal men. Repeat your conscience before God, and declare it to him. Show your wounds to the Lord, your best physician, and ask from him a salve for them."⁷ Again: "Take heed that you not tell a man of your sins, lest he betray you and upbraid you for them. For you need not confess them to your companion, that he should repeat them abroad, but to the Lord who has the care of you, who also is a gentle physician. Therefore, you shall show your wounds to him."⁸ Moreover, he brings in the Lord saying: "I do not compel you to come into the open theatre, and to make many privy to your sins: tell your sin privately to me alone, that I may heal your sore."⁹ This much out of Chrysostom. Now, all this manifestly argues that this ceremonial penance (as it was once used in the church), was not instituted by God; it was taken out of the church without any injury; and it was not restored again by the bishops who succeeded.

They do not altogether in vain tell us that some relics of that ritual repentance still abided in the Roman church.¹⁰ But what have we to do with what every church has taken to itself, either to keep or else to lay away? Rather, we ought to inquire what Christ has delivered to us, and what his apostles have taught us — whose doctrine I think I have spoken enough about already.

The private or secret confession of sins was customarily made when none was nearby but the priests alone. For one goes secretly, and whispers his sins in the ear of the priest who was appointed to hear those secret confessions; and being absolved by him, the penitent thinks that by the recital of a few ordinary words, he is purged from all his sins. Therefore, I call it auricular confession. This was unknown in the apostles' times. And although it is now a good many years since it first took root, yet notwithstanding, it was free from the beginning. At last, we read that it was commanded and roughly extorted by the bishop of Rome, when the state of the church was most corrupted, about the year of grace 1215. And yet it was about eighty years or more in controversy, before it was laid upon all men's necks by decree, "whether it was enough for a man to confess himself to God alone, or else to a priest also, for the purging of his sins?" Hugo, in his book about the church's power to bind and loose, says: "I dare boldly say, if before the priest's absolution any man comes to the communion of the body and blood of the Lord, that he assuredly eats and drinks his own damnation, however much he repents, and ever so greatly laments his offences." ¹ Hugo said this boldly, without God's warrant, unless the word of God instructs us falsely.

He lived about the year of our Lord 1130. A little while after him arose Peter Lombard, commonly called the Master of Sentences, because he gathered together the sentences of the fathers, and laid out their doctrine in summary form. I do not mean to give here my judgment about his work. It is thought that he flourished about the year of Christ 1150.² He first shows by the authority of the fathers, Sententiarum, Lib. iv. Dist. 17, and 18, that it suffices to make the confession of sins to God alone. Then he annexes other sentences which teach the contrary; and lastly he concludes, of himself, "By these it is undoubtedly proved, that we must offer our confession first to God, then to the priest, and that otherwise we cannot enter into paradise, if we may [i.e., unless we have a priest]." Again: "It is certified that it is not sufficient to confess to God without a priest; nor is someone truly humble and penitent, who does not desire the judgment of a priest." ³ Gratian, who gathered the decretals together,⁴ was somewhat more honest than Peter Lombard; he lived and flourished at the same time with Lombard. He determines nothing definitively; but showing sentences for either side — both that we must confess our sins to the priest, and not confess them — he leaves it indifferently to the reader's judgment.

For thus he concludes: "We have briefly declared here, on what authority and reasons both the opinions of confession and satisfaction are grounded. But as to which of these we should rather stick, that is reserved for the reader to choose; for both parts have wise and religious men as their patrons and defenders." ¹ Gratian says this about the end of the first distinction of penance.

But the title of the following section is, Quod non sufficit soli Deo confiteri, si tempus adsit, si tamen homini possit; and then Lombard concludes in the words quoted by Bullinger: Ex his aliisque pluribus indubitanter ostenditur, oportere Deo primum, et deinde sacerdoti offerri confessionem, nec aliter posse perveniri ad ingressum paradisi, si adsit facultas; p. 341: and in the next section, e. p. 342, Certificatum est, quod non sufficit confiteri Deo sine sacerdote: nee est vere humilis et poenitens, si non desiderat et requirit sacerdotis iudicium.

About fifty years later, followed Lotharius Levita,² a doctor of Paris, the scholar and earnest follower of Peter Lombard. Once he had been made bishop of Rome and named Innocent the Third, he called together at Rome a general council called Lateranense,³ in which he made a law, which Gregory the Ninth recites in his decretal of penance and remission, Lib v. chap. 12, almost in these very words:

"Let every person of either sex, after they have come to the years of discretion, faithfully confess alone, at least once a year, their sins to their own proper priest, and endeavour with their own strength to do the penance that is enjoined of them; receiving reverently at Easter at least the sacrament of the Eucharist, unless perhaps by the counsel of their own priest, for some reasonable cause, they think it good to abstain for a time from receiving it. Otherwise, in this life let them be prohibited from entering into the church; and when they are dead, from being buried in Christian burial." ⁴

This is that new law which contains many absurd and wicked blasphemies. And, to let pass many other absurdities, I will recite to you only one or two of the foulest of them. Is it not a wicked thing, to send a sinner to I know not what kind of priest of his own, when Christ has given only ministers and preachers to his church, still being himself the universal priest, and the proper priest to everyone in the church, even until the end of the world — to whom alone all the faithful ministers send sinners from themselves, to confess their sins to him? For John said: "I am not Christ, but have been sent before him to bear record of him." ^{Joh 3.28} What may be said to this, moreover: that it is a detestable blasphemy to attribute the remission of sins to our own confession and the priest's absolution, as to the works of mortal men? And who, I pray you, is able to reckon up all his sins to the priest? Does not Jeremiah cry, "The heart of man is evil and unsearchable?" ^{Jer 17.9} Does not David say, "Who knows his sins? Cleanse me from my hidden faults." ^{Psa 19.12} It is impossible for a man to confess all his sins. Therefore, while a man is compelled by the law, and he considers these reasons and ponders them in himself, he cannot help but be drowned in the bottomless depth of desperation. So great a burden is laid upon the free necks of Christ's faithful people, as a thing so necessary that without it, they cannot obtain eternal salvation — and yet it is directly contrary to the apostles' decree seen in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts. And lastly I ask, what is a sinner able to do by his own strength? What power, I ask, do we silly wretches ⁵ have to do good, of ourselves?

It grieves me, and I am ashamed of these men's impudence, to see that they would have this auricular confession be instituted by God, and that they go around upholding and confirming it by the scriptures.

They guilefully ¹ twist that place in the gospel where the Lord says to the leper, "Go your way, show yourself to the priest." ^{Mat 8.4} Now they do not impudently twist this place alone, contrary to its true sense; but they also corrupt all the other testimonies of holy scriptures which they are prone to cite. Among all the rest, I will tell you of this one. Bonaventura,² in his Commentaries, Ad Sententias Magistri, Lib. iv. Dist. xvii. Quaest. 3, imagines two things to be in confession: the one formal, namely, absolution, or the power to heal; and this he says was instituted by the Lord at giving the keys. The other is material, namely, disclosing the sin; and this he says the Lord himself did not institute, but only insinuated. For immediately after he adds these words:

"And therefore, confession was insinuated by the Lord, instituted by the apostles, and openly proclaimed by James the bishop of Jerusalem. For as he proclaimed the decree of not keeping the ceremonial laws, Acts 15; so he also published and laid upon all those who sin, the necessity of confession, saying, Confess your sins one to another."

This much Bonaventura has.³ Who would not wonder at the blindness of that age? This writer acknowledged that auricular confession was not instituted by the Lord, but says obscurely ⁴ (as it were, by conjectures about the consequents), that the apostles expounded the mind of Christ and instituted it; and that St. James in the name of all the apostles, openly proclaimed it by a decree. He adds that the words of the proclamation were, "Confess your sins one to another." ^{Jas 5.16} Now what else is it, to twist the scriptures, if this is not to twist them?

Even the blindest easily sees that these champions are unweapened in this combat. ⁵ They produce a spear made of a wrapped-up wisp of hay,⁶ which they shake and make a noise with,⁷ as if it were the lance-staff of Hector or Achilles. It is most evident that the apostle does not speak not of secret and auricular confession, but of that confession which by a certain reciprocation is made by those who have mutually offended one another. And now, freely confessing to one to another, they are mutually reconciled, and pray for one another again. I already said something about this a little earlier. They do not see that there are two things in the apostle's words, which being diligently considered, make them mere laughing-stocks to those who perceive them. For first, the apostle uses the word αλληλους (allelous) in that place, which signifies mutually, one another, one for one, or reciprocally. Thus we may infer this: If according to the apostle's precept, we must confess ourselves to one another, and allelous signifies mutually or reciprocally — that is, that we must confess ourselves by turns, first I to him and then he to me, as it indeed signifies — then it must be that after the laymen have confessed themselves to the priests, the priests should confess themselves back to the laymen; for that is what it means to make confession one to another. For we say, φιλοουσιν αλληλους (philousin allelous) that is, they love one another mutually: he loves him, and that one loves him back. But if this troubles the priests,⁸ to have their confessions heard by laymen,⁹ then let them then acknowledge that this place of the apostle does nothing [to support] their secret and auricular confession, which they have devised for their own commodity. Then the apostle adds: "And pray for one another, that you may be healed." He therefore associates, and joins under one yoke as it were, both confession and prayer. And from that we again gather that, if we must confess to none but priests, then must we pray for none but priests.¹ But we must not pray for priests alone; ergo, we must not confess to priests alone, but each one to one another.

That place in James must not be understood to speak of secret and auricular confession, but of that open or public confession by which they return to charity again, by mutually confessing their faults which had previously offended each other, causing mutual injuries. And now being reconciled again, they pray for one another, that they may be saved. We therefore leave this as an undoubted truth: that those who argue for auricular confession have neither proved, nor can prove, that it was instituted and ordained by God.

But when they see that this confession will lead to wrack,² they go around with weak props, God knows, to shore it up and say that such confession is to still be retained in the church, if for nothing else than discipline's sake, to make men blush when their sins come to light, as a reason for men to sin less often. And they also say that it is to be retained for private absolution, and for particular or singular consolation of the godly. But if auricular confession is so needful and profitable for the church as they would to have it, then how did it chance that for the span of a thousand years³ after the apostles' times, the church was utterly without it? It is marvel, then, that the apostles in no place either used it or commanded it. And again, it is manifest that in the times before the coming of Christ, this confession was not once dreamed of. Nor did the apostles leave the church of God destitute of anything necessary to salvation. Now, the abominable deeds and wicked acts that ensued after it was planted in the church of God, plainly declare what discipline this auricular confession is. For both he that confesses, and he that heard the confession, learned horrible wickedness by the examination and beating out of the circumstances of the sins committed. By that means, causes and occasions for whoredoms and adulteries were given and taken. Under the pretence of those confessions, the chastity of matrons and virgins has been assaulted and corrupted, more often and in more ways than it is decent to name.⁴

Those confessors fished out the secrets of every man's conscience, which availed greatly to establish their tyranny. By those confessions, the confessors could cunningly spoil and rob their shrift-children,⁵ as they called them, of their goods and substance — because they knew what riches each one had, and how he came by them. And when the peers⁶ of every commonwealth knew that the priests were privy to their faults, they could not help but fear the priests. And so it came to pass that they did not, as strongly as they might, set themselves against the extreme corruption and lust of the priests, which was otherwise not to be suffered. They have been heard to say: "I have learned by confessions, and know at my fingers' ends, what kind of men, women, and maidens are in this city. I know how to handle each one according to his disposition. They all fear and stand in awe of me, because they know that I am privy to their most secret deeds, and thoughts of their minds." The secrets told in confession are many times foolishly babbled abroad with the peril of the silly soul that first confessed them. By means of confessions, no small and many treasons are hatched and put in practice. And surely it is a weighty matter when, by means of one man (as some term him, our "spiritual father"), we cease to sin for fear or carnal blushing — rather than ceasing for the sincere fear that we have of God; when indeed, we do not blush at all to think that God shall be a witness against our conscience, nor fear the severity of his judgment that will alight upon us. What may be said to this moreover: that by this auricular confession, once established in the church, nothing else is wrought, but that the word of God would be the less regarded through our traditions, and we would be made all the more slack to confess our sins to Him, to whom we ought to confess them by right? For as often as we remember our sins, we earnestly ¹ put them away until the time of confession comes again. And when it has come, then who, I ask, goes to it with a cheerful mind? Let wise men therefore judge what kind of discipline this is, and how well it pleases God. ²

That which they allege of private absolution is a mere device of man's invention, which has not in the sacred scriptures any precept or example to back itself with. For indeed, none absolves us from sin, blame, and punishment, but God alone, to whom alone that glory does belong. The minister, by the preaching and consolation of the gospel, pronounces and testifies to the faithful, that their sins are forgiven. Therefore, this preaching of forgiveness, being fetched from the mouth or word of God, is the absolution with which the minister absolves. Nor is that absolution made any whit more effectual, if the minister privately whispers it into the sinner's ear. The public preaching of the gospel, as it is instituted by Christ our Lord, satisfies a faithful mind, which does not so much respect the demeanour of the minister, as it regards the truth of Him in whose name the minister does it. But if a sinner, they say, privately hears said to him, "I absolve you from your sins," and that is by the virtue of the keys, then he far better understands that his sins are remitted than when forgiveness of sins is generally preached and publicly pronounced. But in this case, we set against them the apostle's example, whom when the men of Jerusalem had heard him preach, they were pricked in the heart, and said: "Men and brethren, what shall we do? Peter answered them, Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Christ Jesus for the remission of your sins, etc. And there were added to the church that same day about three thousand souls." Acts 2.37-41

Now, who does not understand that baptism was at once bestowed upon so great a multitude, and the remission of sins was universally preached to them all? Each one did not have this saying or the like whispered separately into his ear: Brother, your sins are forgiven you? And truly, a godly-minded man may learn true faith in Jesus Christ (through which his sins are forgiven) by the public preaching of the gospel, as well as by the private whisperings of privy penitentiaries and absolving confessors — since public preaching contains the commandments of God, while those whisperings do not.

And finally, the public preaching of the gospel applies the grace of God to everyone, and the sacraments testify of the remission of sins and the heavenly gifts prepared for all those who ³ believe in Jesus Christ. And yet, I do not say this because I think it amiss if the minister privately preaches the gospel of our Lord to one or two, when occasion serves to do so; or in the words of Christ, he promises remission of sins to someone who believes. But here I argue against those who suppose that public and general preaching, as it was used by the apostles — declaring to all and every man, the remission of sins — is not sufficient, unless the sinner, going to the priest, confesses his sins, and privately asks and receives private or particular absolution from him. For they think that, for private absolution's sake, this private or auricular confession must be retained in the church.

But we would not have, they say, that all and every peculiar sin with its circumstances should be reckoned up or repeated. What of that then? Who, I pray you, commanded us to whisper any sins at all into the priest's ear? The primitive church was used to confessing to the priests, neither few nor many sins, nor any sins at all. Bonaventura recorded that, before pope Innocent the Third, they were not considered heretics, who affirmed that confession made to God alone, without any priest, is sufficient for those who faithfully believe. But after he published the decree that confession was to be made by every man to his own priest, they were judged heretics who taught men to confess to God only;¹ as though it lay in pope Innocent to make a new article of faith, which the church had been without for more than twelve hundred years after Christ.

Therefore, if all those who lived before Innocent were without suspicion of heresy in that point; and since we read that Nectarius and the church of Constantinople was not condemned for heresy by abrogating and casting out of the church their exomologesis (which seems to be far better than this auricular confession) — no godly man undoubtedly will condemn us, who maintain that the confession instituted by God, ought to be made to God and our neighbour; but only reject and hiss at that secret and auricular confession which brings more discommodity than honest profit to the church of God.

Because I have said this much up to here about secret or auricular confession, on which the treatise about satisfaction depends, of necessity I should say something here about satisfaction. But I have sufficiently spoken of it in my other sermons from this work — such as in the sixth and ninth sermons of the first Decade, and in the third Decade, where I treat the saints' affliction; in the tenth sermon of that Decade, and also in this fourth Decade, where I spoke about the gospel. The priests and monks teach that repentance of the sin committed, and faith in Christ, are not sufficient for purging sins without the satisfaction of our own works and merits; which they make to be the wearing of sackcloth, fasting, tears, prayers, alms-deeds,² offerings, sundry afflictions of the body, pilgrimages, and many other odd knacks³ like these. For they affirm that by these means, the penalty due to sins (the guilt of which, they say, is only pardoned) is washed away, as with a shower of water poured down on it.⁴ But we have already taught out of the canonical scriptures, that God not only forgives freely the guilt, but also the penalty of our sins. We have already taught that men are not justified by their own works and merits, but by the mere grace of God through the faith of Christ Jesus. For otherwise, he would have taken our flesh upon himself in vain, and Christ would have given himself to the most bitter and reproachful death of the cross in vain. Now we add, If we are not justified by works, then we do not make satisfaction for our sins with our works.

For in effect. both justification and satisfaction come to one end (although I acknowledge that there is a difference between them, and I do not confound them). By the justification of Christ we are absolved: by the satisfaction of Christ, or rather for his satisfaction's sake, we are also absolved. Christ is our righteousness, and therefore he is also our satisfaction. The price of our redemption is in Christ, not in ourselves. If we make satisfaction for ourselves, then the price of our redemption is in ourselves. And therefore are we both Christ and Saviour to ourselves: this flatly makes Christ of no effect, and therefore is it extreme blasphemy. Moses in his law, with little or no effort, dissolves all the arguments for satisfaction wrought by our works. For where he describes the manner of cleansing sins, he places no jot of it in the works of men, but shows that it all consists in the ceremonial sacrifices. Now, we all agree and jointly confess that in those sacrifices, the sole sacrifice of Christ was plainly prefigured. And to this is added, that the only preaching and promise of the new testament is this: "I will be appeased for their unrighteousness and sins, and I will remember their iniquities no more." ^{Jer 31-34} Now, where there is such a remission, there is no oblation or satisfaction for sin. And in the creed, truly, we believe the forgiveness of sins. But if the debtor makes satisfaction to the creditor, then what, I ask, does the creditor forgive? Therefore, this article of our faith, the principal promise and preaching of the new testament, is utterly subverted if we admit the doctrine of the satisfaction of our works for sin.

We acknowledge that tears, fastings, wearing sack-cloth, alms-deeds, and the other works of piety, humiliation, and charity, have a place in repentance; and I will speak about them in a convenient place. But we deny that we make satisfaction for our sins with them, lest we make the price of Christ's redemption of no effect. We acknowledge that sometimes the Lord has whipped those whose sins he has forgiven, as he did to our parents, Adam and Eve, and to king David after his adultery, and his murder of Uriah.

But I have already shown you ¹ that those afflictions were not satisfactions for the sins which God had pardoned, but exercises of God's discipline and humiliation. By those means, He keeps his servants in their dutiful obedience, and declares to all men how heartily He hates sins, even though he freely forgives and pardons them. Therefore, lest we be more inclined and prone to sin because of that free forgiveness, he punishes those whom he makes examples for us to take heed by.

Nor do we read that the saints simply attributed the benefit of justification or satisfaction to their afflictions. I confess that Daniel the prophet gave counsel to the most mighty king Nebuchadnezzar, and said: "Let your sins be redeemed in righteousness, and your iniquities in showing pity to the poor." ² But in these words, the king was taught how to lead the rest of his life that still remained, and how to rule the state of his kingdom. The king had up till then oppressed many nations, and sinned in merciless cruelty. Whereupon Daniel persuades him to change his old kind of life, to embrace justice, and to deal well with all men. Therefore, Daniel does not speak of the satisfaction of Nebuchadnezzar's sins before God, but before men. For there is salvation in no other than in Christ alone. But if any man stubbornly sticks to the letter, we say that the righteousness of Christians is faith, by which their sins are properly cleansed. And that faith is not without good works and charity, to which justification is improperly ascribed. I spoke of this matter in the treatise that I made about good works. ³

Therefore, when St. Peter cites that place in Solomon, "Charity covers a multitude of sins;" the word "covers" is not used there for purging; for only by the blood of Christ are all sins purged and wiped away. But it is taken for turning away. For just as self-love, in a way, is the root of all sins, so charity is thought to drive away all mischiefs; for "love does no ill to his neighbour." ⁴

Now, they object to that sentence of the gospel, where the Lord says, "Many sins are forgiven her, because she loved much."¹

But they miss in this, because they do not understand that the word oti, which is commonly rendered because, or, for that, is here a note inferring something; and no other sense is gathered than this: "Many sins are forgiven her, therefore she loved much; or, from which it comes, that she loves much." Nor do we twist here the words of the gospel, to maintain a wrong opinion. For in the history, there goes before, first, "When they were not able to pay, he forgave them both." If he forgave them, and if they were not able to pay, then he did not forgive them for their love; for if they had been able to pay, he would not have forgiven them. Secondly, there goes before it, "Which of these will love him more?" Simon says, "He to whom he forgave more." Therefore, the Lord's answer could, in its effect, be nothing else but this: "I have forgiven her very much, therefore she has loved much." So then, I say, love is from forgiveness, and not forgiveness from love. And then it follows immediately: "And he said to the woman, your faith has saved you, go in peace." We therefore conclude that there is but one satisfaction alone for the sins of the whole world: namely, Christ once offered up for us who are made partakers of him, by faith.

But now, because we do not acknowledge or admit the satisfactions pushed on us in the doctrine of the priests and monks, so by all means we detest the indulgences of the bishops of Rome. They called these indulgences a beneficial pardoning of crimes, or a remission of the punishment, or of the guilt, or both; namely, by the power of the keys bestowed by the Lord; and for the merit of the martyrs' blood (so they say) granted or given to those who are rightly contrite in heart, and confess their sins. For these fathers of indulgences are prone with their indulgences, to remit the rigour and severity of the satisfaction, which lies in them to order at their discretion. Truly, as one said, "The fathers' gentle indulgence makes the children nothing;"² so their indulgences have utterly corrupted true repentance.

But nowhere can you read that such power³ was given to the popes, as they feigned. We read that the keys were given to the apostles by the Lord. But those keys were nothing more than the ministry of preaching the gospel, as I will show you in a convenient place. Now, the gospel promises us remission of both the guilt and the penalty, for Christ's sake, and faith in Christ. And it admonishes us that in the latter times, men will come who will say, We are Christs; Mat 24:5 that is, who attribute to themselves the things that properly belong to Christ alone, especially the forgiveness of sins. But it commands us to flee from them, and by all means to beware of them, as wicked seducers.

The same evangelical truth teaches that the faithful are cleansed by the only blood of the Son of God. Their indulgences promise men the cleansing of their sins through the blood of St. Peter, St. Paul, and other holy martyrs. And for that cause, they are the profanation of the blood of the Son of God. The saints wash their garments in the blood of the Lamb, not in the pardoning bull, or box of indulgences, nor in the martyrs' blood. Yes, Paul himself denies that either he, or Peter, or any other of the saints, was crucified for the church of God. Yet these indulgences were so presented, as though God were pleased with us for the blood of the martyrs. Therefore, their indulgences are flatly contrary to the apostles' doctrine. I admonished you in my sermon about good works⁴ in these words of Paul, "I fulfil that which remains of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh, for his body's sake, which is the church;" that fulfilling does not refer to the work of the purging or propitiation of Christ, which is finished; unless Christ testified falsely at his death, saying, "It is finished." Joh 19.30 Rather, it refers to those afflictions with which the members of Christ, that is, the faithful, are exercised by the cross, so long as they live in this frail flesh. Truly, the Lord takes account of the afflictions laid upon the faithful, as his own. For he said to Paul, "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" Moreover, when he says, "For the church," he does not mean for the expiation of the church, but for the edification and profit of it.¹

And Paul sustained grievous afflictions at the hands of the Jews, because he preached the gospel to the Gentiles. It was expedient that in him, the church would be shown an example of patience so rare that it could not lightly be found again. Yes, others have often objected against these indulgence-defenders. Take this godly saying of the holy man, pope Leo, in his eighty-first epistle: "Although the death of many saints is precious in the sight of the Lord, yet the slaughter of no man subject to sin, is the propitiation for the sins of the world." Again, "The righteous have received, not given, crowns of glory. And from the manful constancy of the martyrs have sprung examples of patience, not the gifts of righteousness. For their deaths were singular; nor did anyone by dying, pay the debt of another, since there is one Lord Jesus Christ, in whom they are all crucified, dead, buried and raised up again." ² This much out of pope Leo.

We have therefore, by divine and human testimonies, evidently proved that the indulgences given to sinners by the merit or treasure of the martyrs' blood, are mere blasphemies against God, and open injuries against his holy martyrs.

I have up to here spoken of those indulgences which were freely bestowed of old by the popes of Rome, although today they are few in number and also curtailed. Now, therefore, I will say something about their indulgences which, for the most part, they sell and traffic in. To sell indulgences in the church of God is a sin so detestable that it is hard to name any one more horrible. And yet it is and has been a common practice and merchandise ³ these many years with the bishops of Rome and their factors,⁴ whom they call apostolics, not having any word in the scripture with which to cloak that wicked invention.

And now, I slip past and will not show how indulgences are nothing but a bare name without any stuff or matter; and that under that vain name, miserable men and silly souls are foully deceived. Yet, note that Christ, the chief and only high priest of his catholic and holy church, in the days of his flesh drove the buyers and sellers (like impudent dogs) out of the church ⁵ of God with a whip. He did this twice; once at the beginning of his preaching, and another time a little before his passion. The first time he added: "Away with these things from here, and do not make my Father's house a house of merchandise." Joh 2.13-16 The latter time he said: "It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer; but you have made it a den of thieves." Mat 21.12-13. And Simon Magus also, in the Acts of the Apostles, seeing that the Holy Ghost was given at the laying on of the apostles' hands, offered them money, saying: "Give me this power also, that on whomever I lay my hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost." But note how Peter accepts his petition. "Your money (he said) perish with you; because you thought that the gift of God may be obtained with money.

⁵ e templo, Lat.

You have neither part nor fellowship in this business; for your heart is not right in the sight of God." ^{Act 8.18-21} Look, the gifts of God are not gotten with money. Look, their heart is not right who make merchandise of religion. Look, they have no part or fellowship in the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven, or in the preaching of the glad tidings. Therefore, what shall we now say about the indulgences which the pope's apostolics sell for money? What shall we say about the indulgence dealers, and the pope himself, whose hirelings they are? We must confess, truly, that they are the fellows of Simon Magus. For by the just sentence of God, Peter cursed such merchants: "Your money (he says) perish together with you." This is a heavy and terrible, yet a most just judgment of the most just God. Foreseeing that there would be many such merchants in the church, Peter says in his last epistle:

"There were false prophets among the people, even as there will be false teachers among you, who secretly bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord who has bought them, bringing upon themselves swift damnation. And many will follow their damnable ways, by whom the way of truth shall be spoken evil of. And with covetousness, through feigned words, they will make merchandise of you." ^{2Pet 2.1-3}

For what is it, "with feigned words through covetousness, to make merchandise of the miserable idiots," if not this: saying they will give full remission of sins to all those who are contrite, and confess their sins? For if any man acknowledges his sins, and with a true faith converts himself to God through Christ, even without their indulgences he obtains plenary remission of all his sins. Those foxes therefore make money from smoke, deceiving simple souls,¹ and selling for coin the thing which they never had, nor can possibly be purchased with money.

This much up to here about bought and sold indulgences, about which other writers have made very long discourses. I suppose that by this little, any man may easily understand how to judge them rightly.

We have now at length come past those rocks and shelves toward which we purposely sailed, so that when we had viewed the most perilous places, we might admonish the unskilful passengers to take heed lest they crash on them and make shipwreck of their souls, by thinking that in these indulgences lies the true force of sufficient repentance. There is nothing in this, but the utter displeasing of God's most holy majesty. Therefore, letting that alone as it is, we now return to declare the last members of repentance, by which we said that penitents mortify the old man, and are renewed spiritually.

First of all, therefore, it seems good to tell, What the old man is, What the new or regenerated man is, and What the power or strength of man is. For by demonstrating these, we will better understand what it means to mortify the old man, and to be renewed in the spirit.

We say that the old man is all that which we have by nature, or from our first parents — namely, not only the body or the flesh (meaning the grosser and substantial part of the body); but even the very soul, with its strength, power, and faculties. Therefore, though in some places of the holy scriptures the flesh is put for man, we must not understand it as only the massy substance and grosser part of the body; but the very flesh together with the soul and all its faculties — that is, the whole man not yet regenerate. For the Lord says in the gospel: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the spirit is spirit." ^{Joh 3.6} And this he says concerning regeneration, which is not according to the flesh (as Nicodemus falsely imagined), but according to the spirit.

The word "flesh" therefore imports ¹ the natural power and faculties ² of man. I mean, all that which we have or take from our first grandsire, Adam. The new man is said to be one who is regenerate by the Spirit of God in Christ, or is renewed according to the image of Christ, with all the gifts and virtues of the Holy Ghost. And because the flesh is usually put for the old man, so the spirit, by an antithesis, is commonly used and taken for the new man.

Now, here the very place requires me to discourse somewhat about the power and virtues of man. Although I have discussed this elsewhere already, as in the sermon about freedom and bondage, and the one about sin,³ yet I will again touch those points which I think will suffice for this present argument.

There are two parts or faculties of our soul: UNDERSTANDING and WILL. Understanding discerns what to receive or what to refuse in objects. It is the light and guide of the soul as it were. The Will chooses, for in it lies both to will and to nill.⁴ These are again impelled by other powers and faculties. Now, the UNDERSTANDING is of two sorts; for we understand either earthly or heavenly things. I call those earthly things, which do not pertain to the life to come, but to the present life: this refers to all liberal arts and handicrafts, governing public weals, and ruling private houses.

By heavenly things I understand God himself, eternal felicity, and life everlasting, the knowledge of God and all kinds of virtues: faith, hope, charity, righteousness, holiness, and innocence of life.

Now let us see what this UNDERSTANDING of man is able to do, and what power it has. The judgment and understanding of man about earthly things is not altogether nothing: yet, God knows, it is weak and very small. The understanding that is in man, therefore comes from God. But as it is small and weak, that comes from man's own fault and corruption. But the bountiful Lord augments in men those gifts of His, by which it comes that man's wit brings wonderful things to pass. For this cause, we read in the holy scriptures that the arts and wits of men are in the hands of God. But in the knowledge or understanding of heavenly matters, there is not one small spark of light in man. His wit, of itself, is nothing but darkness, which at the beginning was created by God to be most sharp and lightsome. But afterwards, by man's corruption, it was utterly rebated ⁵ and darkened again. This is why Christ said in the gospel: "No man comes to me, unless my Father draws him." Joh 6.44 And it is written in the Prophets: "All shall be taught by God." And Paul says: "The natural man does not perceive the things that are of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness to him; nor can he know, because they are spiritually discerned." 1Cor 2.14 The natural man (that is, that old man which is not yet regenerate by the Holy Ghost) is not altogether a block, without any sense or feeling. For if he were utterly without any of the discourses of reason, then how would the preaching of the gospel seem foolishness to him? By the gift of God, he therefore hears and understands the words and sense of the holy scripture; but because of his natural corruption, he is not touched by them, and he does not rightly judge about them. They seem mere folly to him. Nor does he perceive that they must be discerned spiritually, because he is not regenerate; he is yet without the true light of God's most holy Spirit. For in another place the apostle says: "We are not able of ourselves to think any good, but all our ability is of God." 2Cor 3.5

And thus it is, that we so often find in the scriptures, mention of enlightening or illumination. These would be expressed or named without cause, if man's understanding were clear, and of itself not dark and misty. There is therefore born with all men, a blindness of heart and mind, a doubting in the promises of God, and an unbelief and perverse judgment in all heavenly things. For even if man had received understanding at God's hand, yet because of his own corruption, ignorance is a particular and proper heritage belonging to man. For he is then in his kingdom, when he is blind, when he errs, when he doubts, when he does not believe, nor rightly use as he should the gifts that God has given him, that is, to his own salvation and the glory of his Maker.

Let us now see what the will of the old man is able to do. Therefore, since this will follows a blind guide (God knows), that is to say, a corrupt affection, it is unknown to no man what foolish choices it makes, and what it tends toward. And however true and good the understanding is, yet the will is like a ship tossed to and fro with stormy tempests, that is, by affections. For it wallows up and down with hope, fear, lust, sorrow, and anger, so that it chooses and follows nothing but evil. For the holy apostle, speaking of himself, says: "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, there dwells no good thing. For to will is present with me, but I find no means to perform what is good. For the good that I would, I do not: but the evil which I would not do, that do I do." ^{Rom 7.18-19} But now, since the apostle said this about himself when he was regenerate, what, I ask, will we say about the will of the old man? The old man wills all things which God does not will, and breaking into all kind of wickedness, he foully fulfils his filthy lusts. That is to say, the old man gives his members as servants to uncleanness and wickedness, from one iniquity to another. We have very many examples of this exhibited to us, both by the holy scriptures and by daily experience.

Let us now oppose or set against this, the new man; that is, the man who is regenerate by the Spirit of God through the faith of Jesus Christ.

Now regeneration is the renewing of the man, by which through the faith of ¹ Jesus Christ, we who were the sons of Adam and of wrath, are born again as the sons of God, and therefore put off ² the old man, and put on the new, which both in understanding and will, freely serves the Lord. This regeneration is the renewing of the mind, not of the body: as we heard in another place, out of the third chapter of St. John's gospel.³ The author of this regeneration is the Holy Ghost, who is given to man from heaven, I mean, given to a faithful man. For the gift of the Holy Ghost is given for Christ's sake, and to none but those who believe in Christ. This Spirit of God testifies with our spirit that we are the sons of God, and therefore the heirs of his kingdom. ^{Rom 7.16-17} We are therefore a new creature, now repaired according to the image of God, and endued with a new nature or disposition. By this it comes to pass that we daily put off that old man, and put on the new. This is done when we walk, not in concupiscence according to the carnal inclination of the flesh, but in newness of sense, according to the working of the Holy Ghost by whom we are regenerate. The same substance and form of the body still abides; the mind is changed, the understanding and will are renewed. For by the Spirit of God, the understanding is illuminated, our faith and the understanding of God and heavenly things are plenteously bestowed, and by the Spirit, unbelief and ignorance, that is, the darkness of the old man, are utterly expelled. This is according to that saying of the apostle, "Through Christ you are made rich in all things, in all speech and knowledge." Again, "We have not received the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God, to know what things are given to us by Christ." And again, "We have (or know the spirit or) ⁴ the mind of Christ." ¹ And again, "You have no need for any man to teach you: but as the very anointing instructs you about all things, and is true, abide in it." ²

And in this regeneration of man the will also receives a heavenly virtue, to do the good which the understanding perceived by the Holy Ghost. So that it wills, chooses, and works the good that the Lord has shown it; and on the other side, it kills, hates, and repels the evil that the Lord has forbidden it. For Paul says: "I know how to be humble, and I know how to exceed. I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me." ³ And again, he says to the Philippians: "To you it is given for Christ, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for him." And again he yet more plainly says: "It is God that works in you both to will and to perform, according to the good purpose of the mind." ⁴ But now note this: that whatever they do, who are regenerate by the Spirit of God, they do it freely, not by compulsion, nor against their wills. For just as God requires a cheerful giver, so "where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is free liberty and hearty good-will." ⁵ And Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, said: "That we, being delivered from the hands of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life." ^{Luk 1.74} Yes, and our Lord himself says in the gospel: "If you abide in my sayings, you shall be my disciples indeed, and you shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." And again: "If the Son sets you at liberty, or makes you free, then shall you be free indeed." ^{Joh 8.31-36} Touching this liberty of the sons of God, I have already discoursed about it in the ninth sermon of my third Decade.

This liberty of the sons of God we willingly acknowledge and freely confess. But we utterly reject and flatly deny the arrogant disputations of some blasphemous praters ⁶ concerning free-will, as though it were in our power of ourselves to do any heavenly thing. And yet we do not make man subject to fatal necessity, nor turn upon God the blame for iniquity, as we have elsewhere declared more at large.⁷ And St. Augustine in his controversy with the Pelagians so tempered his disputation, that he attributed the good to the grace of God, and the evil to our nature. So that, the sense being sound, uncorrupted, and well-weighed, he attributes free-will (which he grants is in us), to the grace that works in us, indeed, to the regeneration of the Spirit, rather than to ourselves or our own power.

I will here recite and repeat to you, dearly beloved, only this one testimony out of all his writings, seen in the first chapter of his book, De Correptione et Gratia, where he says:

"We must confess that we have free-will to do both evil and good: but in doing evil, everyone is free from righteousness, and bound to sin; but no man can be free in doing good, unless he is made free by the one who said, 'If the Son makes you free, then shall you be free indeed.' And yet this is not so that, when everyone is set free from the condemnation of sin, he should then stand no more in need of his deliverer's aid. Rather, where he hears his deliverer say, 'Without me you can do nothing,' he should quickly say back to him, 'Be my helper; O do not forsake me.' And truly, I am glad that I found this faith in our brother Florus, which, without a doubt, is the true, prophetic, and apostolic faith. For here must be understood the grace of God through Jesus Christ our Lord. By this grace alone, we men are delivered from evil; and without it, we do no good, either in thought, will, love, or deed. Not that by the showing or teaching of grace, men should know no more than what is to be done; but also that by the very working and performing of grace, they should with love do the thing that they know." ¹ And so forth.

Up to here I have repeated St. Augustine's opinion touching free-will. This is sufficient for an incidental note. Now I return to my purpose again.

We have heard what the old man is, what the new man is, and how we are renewed by the Holy Spirit. Now therefore, when we say that penitents mortify the old man, and are renewed by the Spirit (or spiritually), we are only saying that to all penitents, the affections, senses, or lusts of the flesh (I mean, even the very understanding which we have from the old Adam, together with the will) are not only suspected, but also convicted of impiety. And therefore, in all their thoughts, words, and deeds, they never admit their affections into their counsel, but resist them by all means, and continually study to break the neck of them. And on the other side, in all our counsels, words, and deeds, we admit and receive — and yes, call to ourselves with prayers — that heavenly guide, the Spirit of Christ. By His conduct and leading, we may perceive, judge, speak, and work — that is to say, either omit or do — that which we have learned in our grand pattern, Christ. We must be reformed according to his likeness, that from now on we may apply ourselves to holiness, righteousness, and good works toward God.

But we will understand all this more rightly and plainly by the words of the apostle, where he says:

"This I say and testify in the Lord, that from now on, you walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their minds, darkened in cogitation, being alienated from the life of God by the ignorance that is in them, and by the blindness of their hearts. Being past feeling, they have given themselves over to wantonness, to work all uncleanness with greediness. But you have not so learned Christ, if you have heard him, and have been taught in him, as the truth is in Jesus: to lay down the old man, according to its former conversation, which is corrupt according to the lusts of error, and to be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and to put on that new man, which is shaped according to God, in righteousness and holiness of truth." Eph 4.17-24

And so forth, as it follows in the fourth chapter to the Ephesians.²

In the third chapter to the Colossians, the apostle says:

"Mortify your members which are on the earth: fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection,³ evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry; for these things the wrath of God comes upon the children of disobedience, among whom you also walked once, when you lived in them. But now, also put off all these things: wrath, fierceness, maliciousness, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth. Do not lie to one another, seeing that you have put off the old man with his works, and have put on the new man, which is renewed into the knowledge and image of Him that made him. Put on therefore — as the elect of God, holy and beloved — bowels of mercy, kindness, modesty, meekness, long-suffering; forbearing one another, and forgiving one another if any man has a quarrel against anyone;" and so forth. Col 3.5-13

If you add to this what the apostle has about the same matter in the sixth chapter to the Romans, every point will be more express and plain to the hearer.

³ mollitiem, Lat. and Erasmus; unnatural lust, Tyndale 1534, and Cranmer 1539.

Now these words of the apostle not only teach us what the old man is, what the new man is, what it means to mortify the old man, and how penitents are renewed in the newness of the spirit, or of the mind; but they also show what the fruits are that are worthy of repentance — namely, those recited virtues, or those offices of life, toward God and our neighbour. We owe God our fear and reverence, humbleness of mind, the knowledge of ourselves, faith, hope, the hatred of sin, the love of righteousness; charity towards our neighbour,¹ well-doing towards all men,² and innocence in all things. The holy man, John the Baptist, required these kinds of fruits from the Jewish nation, when he said: "Bring forth fruits that become repentance." ^{Luk 3.16f} For in St. Luke, being demanded by the people, by the publicans, and by the mercenary or garrison soldiers,³ what things they should do that are worthy of repentance, he prescribes none other than what we just now recited. For the Lord himself, by Isaiah in the fifth chapter of his prophecy, recited no other fruits than those.

And in the revelation ⁴ that was made to St. John, speaking to the minister of the church of Ephesus, he says: "Remember from where you have fallen, and repent, and do the first works." The words of St. Paul agree with this, speaking to Agrippa, and saying: "I have preached to the Jews and Gentiles, exhorting them to repent, and turn to God, and do those works which become those who repent." ^{Act 26.20} And again, in the seventh chapter of second Corinthians, he says: "Sorrow toward God causes repentance unto salvation not to be repented of. For behold, this same thing that made you sorry toward God, how much carefulness it has wrought in you; indeed, what clearing of yourselves; indeed, what indignation; what fear; what vehement desire; what zeal; yes, what punishment!" Now this carefulness is an intentional diligence to correct what is amiss. Truly, out of careless looseness arises an inured habit to commit sin, and negligent security. Penitents do not stand in defence of their sins, but make their supplicant apology to God, to have them remitted. Hypocrites excuse themselves, and seek out shifts and loopholes, not confessing freely their sins and offences, nor praying to God to have them forgiven. He that repents truly and indeed, is angry with himself because of his wicked manners, and a life already lewdly spent. The punishment which he exercises on himself prevents and turns away the revenging and imminent wrath of God. Moreover, with fear he takes heed how he sins any more; for the contempt of God is the origin of mischiefs, and the bond of an impenitent life. Furthermore, he that truly repents, is ravished with the surpassing vehement desire or love of God and heavenly things. He burns with zeal by which it comes to pass that he neither foads ⁵ off from day to day, nor coldly and slackly goes about what he has learned by the word of God, is required to be done and performed by his hand. Briefly, whatever he does, he does it with all his mind, even from the very bottom and root of his heart.

For thus says the great prophet of God, the holy man Moses: "If you will turn to the Lord your God, and hearken to his voice with all your heart, and with all your soul; the Lord your God shall also return you from captivity, and show pity on you in the bowels of mercy." ^{Deu 30.2-3} This much touching the fruits of repentance.

Now, from all these premises we infer this consequent: that repentance (whose only scope to which it tends, is the renovation by the Spirit of Christ, of the image of God, which was defiled by Adam's fall of old) is not a work of a day or two, or of a prescribed number of years, but a continual observance of our whole life; and so, consequently, it is a daily putting off and renewing of the old man forever. For those who are regenerate by the Holy Spirit of God, are never so purged that they feel no motions of the flesh, of sin, and of carnal affections. There is always objected to the eyes of the faithful, this sentence of St. Paul, that cannot by any means be plucked out of their minds: "I know that in me, that is, in my flesh, there dwells no good thing. For to will is present with me, but I find no means to perform that which is good. For the good, that I would do, I do not do; but the evil, that I would not do, that I do." ^{Rom 7.18-19} For we bear about the relics of the flesh throughout our life. From this it comes that there is a perpetual and very sharp battle in the saints. For they partly obey the spirit, and are partly weakened by the flesh. By the spirit they are lifted up to the contemplation and desire of heavenly things; but by the flesh they are thrust down to earthly things, and troubled with the allurements of this naughty world. For even the apostle, feeling that combat in himself, said: "The flesh lusts contrary to the spirit, and the spirit contrary to the flesh. For they are so at enmity between themselves, that what you would, you cannot do." ^{Gal 5.17} And in another place he says: "Even I, myself, serve the law of God in the mind, but in the flesh, I serve the law of sin." ^{Rom 7.25} And to help the matter forward, there lacks no deceit, no craft, and a thousand temptations, by the subtle crafts-master, our enemy the devil. Therefore, the labour and peril of the true penitent, that is, of a Christian man, is far greater than our prayers are, comparable to it.

But now, who does not perceive here how great the watching, what needful things abstinence, constancy, fortitude, and patience are in penitents, in those who repent? What great need they have of earnest and continual prayers? In this sharp conflict, let us lay before our eyes the instruction of that valiant champion, the apostle Paul; for what he says may be used instead of a large and ample commentary. For in few words, he will surpassingly instruct us how to behave ourselves in this troublesome combat, how to vanquish, and how to triumph when the victory is gotten. In his epistle to the Ephesians, he says thus:

"Brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. Put on all the armour of God, that you may stand against the assaults of the devil. For we do not wrestle against flesh and blood only, but against rulers, against powers, against worldly governors of the darkness of this world, against spiritual subtleties in heavenly things. Therefore take to yourself the whole armour of God, that you may be able to resist in the evil day, and having finished all things, to stand fast. Stand therefore, having your loins girded with the truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and your feet shod in the preparation of the gospel of peace. Above all, take the shield of faith, with which you may quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God; praying always in all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching for this with all urgency." ^{Eph 6.10-18} And so forth, as follows in the sixth chapter to the Ephesians.

Here also are to be repeated the outward exercises of repentance, or rites of penance, with which the saints exercise themselves, partly to tame and keep under the motions of the flesh, and partly to testify of their repentance to the congregation. Those exercises are carelessness for the flesh, tears, sighs, sackcloth, fastings, weeping, lamenting, neglecting and hatred of a diet of delicacies, trimming of the body and also of allowable pleasures. If these are done, and yet do not proceed from the very heart and from true faith, they will avail nothing for the one who uses them. But it is best here to learn, as if it were on a painted table, to behold them pictured in the word of God. The prophet Joel says:

"Turn to me, says the Lord, with all your hearts, with fasting, with weeping, and with mourning. Rend your hearts, and not your garments, and turn to the Lord your God; for He is gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great goodness, and he will repent of the evil. Who knows whether the Lord will turn and take compassion, and leave behind a blessing? Blow a trumpet in Zion, proclaim a fast, call an assembly, sanctify the congregation, gather the people, gather the elders, assemble the children and suckling babes. Let the bridegroom come out of his chamber, and the bride out of her closet. Let the priests, the Lord's ministers, weep between the porch and the altar, and let them say: Spare your people, O Lord, and do not give over your heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them. For which those among the heathen would say, Where is their God?" Joel 2.12-17

To these divine and evident precepts, let us annex that notable example of the truly repentant Ninevites out of the holy scriptures; of whom the holy prophet Jonah has left this in writing: "The men of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth from the greatest of them to the least. And word came to the king of Nineveh, who arose from his throne, and put off his robe, and covered himself in sackcloth, and sat down in ashes." Jon 3.5-10 Moreover, by the king's commandment, a proclamation was made throughout the city, saying: "Let neither man nor beast taste anything; neither eat, nor yet drink water. But let both man and beast put on sackcloth, and cry mightily to God; indeed, let every man turn from his evil way, and from the wickedness that is in his hands. Who can tell whether God will turn, and be moved with repentance, and turn from his fierce wrath, so that we do not perish?" And now it is good to hear how effectual true repentance is in the sight of the Lord. Therefore, it follows in the same chapter: "And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil ways, and He repented of the evil which he said he would do to them, and did not do it."

And here also, dearly beloved, you must note that repentance is of two sorts: namely, private or secret, and public or manifest. Each one repents to himself privately, when he has sinned against God, descends into himself, and with the candle of God's word, searches all the corners of his heart, and confesses to God all his offences. Being grieved that he has offended Him, he yet turns to God, believing truly that he will be reconciled to him in Christ his Saviour; and for his sake he utterly hates sin, and entirely loves righteousness and innocence, in following them as near as he can. Public or solemn repentance is used in great calamities, in dearth, pestilence, and war. It is of that repentance that the prophet Joel speaks, whose words you heard a little before. And yet, private repentance is in many points the same as public. For Peter weeps bitterly; and private penitents fast privately, and abstain severely even from all allowed pleasures, much more then from the allurements and baits of the world.¹ But those who truly repent, either publicly or privately, do hate and must specially hate, coloured hypocrisy and vain ostentation. Moreover, both kinds of repentance are free and voluntary, not extorted or coerced, but proceed from a willing mind. The pastor of the church and teacher of the truth, I confess, severely calls upon all sinners without delay to repent themselves truly for the sins they committed. Yet by express law, he lays upon no man's neck any precise order, prescribing the time, manner, place, or number to be confessed; but he leaves it free to each one's choice, so that they do the decent thing, according to the prescribed rule in the word of God. But public repentance is usually proclaimed for the most part, and openly received by the whole congregation, so often as piety requires it, and necessity compels it; and out of the word of God is declared what and how all things must be done and decently ordered.

Again, it is manifest that there are two sorts of repentance more: for there is true repentance and false repentance. True repentance is that which someone exercises who is regenerate by the Spirit of God;¹ and is without any colour and craft, containing in it all those things that I previously told you about.

The scriptures contained in the old and new Testaments, minister to us many examples of true repentance, which I have presented to you at large in what I have already spoken. Those examples are excellent, which we find of our parents Adam and Eve, of the people of Israel often repenting, in the thirty-third chapter of Exodus, in the book of Judges, and the books of Kings. Yet more excellent than the rest, is that of David in the twelfth chapter of second Samuel, 13, 16, and 21; and that of Manasseh, 2Chr 33, and Josiah, 2Chr 34. In the gospel, we also have the examples of Matthew, Zacchaeus, the sinful woman, and Peter, besides others that for shortness' sake, I wittingly pass over here.

But false or counterfeit repentance proceeds from a feigned heart: and though at a blush it seems to have the circumstances of true repentance, yet because it lacks a turning to God and a sound confidence in him, it is insincere and utterly false. For of all others, it is most certain that the repentance of Judas Iscariot was false and counterfeit: and yet he confessed his sin, he bore record to the truth, and with much anger and sorrow he restored to the priests the price which he took for the innocent blood. But because he did not wholly turn to Christ and put his whole confidence in his mercy and goodness, all his repentance was without any fruit. And without any profit, hypocrites and those who are without the faith of the gospel, torment themselves, and make a show of outward repentance.

But those are most happy and in a heavenly case, who with all their hearts truly repent with unfeigned faith. For they receive infinite goodness from their most bountiful and liberal God, who is at one again with penitents. He now loves those who, before, he most heartily and yet most justly hated and abhorred for their sins. The punishments also, which he determined to lay upon them, he turns into benefits. For he fills and loads penitents with all manner of good things, both temporal and eternal. Now, you understand, dearly beloved, by my former sermons, that God bestows such great benefits upon us, not for our works of repentance, but for Christ's sake, in whom alone the saints trust, not putting any confidence in their own works of repentance, however holy and commendable they may be.

For insomuch as the Father loves Christ, and we are grafted into him by faith, God therefore loves us, and our works please him. These works of ours, when he recompenses, he does not crown our works as our own works, but crowns in us the grace which He himself has given us.

Again, it must be that unrepentants are most unhappy. They hear with what sins and transgressions they have offended God, and provoked his just vengeance against themselves. But with this, they do not think how to prevent the wrath of God being ready and imminent to take vengeance on them, nor how to obtain his favour again. Therefore, what else remains behind for them, but a most certain and just destruction of both body and soul, of all their goods, and whatever else they most esteem in this transitory life. It is good to call to mind here, that notable sentence of the Lord Jesus in the gospel, saying:

"Woe to you, Chorazin; woe to you, Bethsaida: for if the wonders that have been done in you had been done in the cities of Tyre and Sidon, they would have repented long before this, in sackcloth and ashes. But I say to you, it shall be easier for Tyre, Sidon, and Sodom in the day of judgment, than for you." ^{Mat 11.21f}

The parable of the unfruitful fig-tree is known to all men, mention of which is made in the gospel. It was withered by the judgment of God as an example to teach and terrify all impenitent sinners. ^{Mat 21.19f} What will fall on the men of these days, may we think, who so boldly despise the repentance so plainly preached to them for so many years now, and beaten into their heads? There are some who outwardly, and for show's sake, seem to be desirous of the evangelical truth. Others are utter enemies, contemners, and persecutors of the gospel. And you will find an infinite rabble of Lucianists,¹ Epicures,² Nullifidians,³ and Atheists.

Now, since all these equally, in a way, sweetly deride or rather scoffingly mock at this hearty repentance, we cannot do otherwise than expect and look for the terrible judgment of God's mighty arm to fall upon such unrepentant sinners. Let those who wish well to themselves, speedily turn to the Lord, and consider continually and earnestly how great the damage is to keep the transitory joys of this present life, and thus lose the eternal joys of the kingdom of heaven. Let each one make haste to do what he perceives can be done that much better, and that much sooner, once it is taken in hand.

And yet I would not have any man despair in his sins, if he does not stubbornly despise the remedy of repentance; nor maliciously, by way of contempt, defer repentance till the very end, because of the facility and gentleness of his heavenly Father. Nor would I have any man fall into desperation if he is hindered by the flesh, the world, and the devil, so that repentance is late, or before he applies his mind to it.

Now, because I have drawn out this discourse about repentance somewhat longer than I had intended, and that at last I may make an end of my sermon here, instead of a conclusion I will recite to you these golden words of the holy martyr St. Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, where he writes against Demetrian to this effect which follows:

"Believe and live; and you who now persecute us for a time, will rejoice with us forever. Once you are out of this life, there is then no place for repentance, nor any effect of satisfaction. [Eternal] life is either won or lost in this world. In this world, eternal salvation is provided for by the unfeigned worshipping of God, and the fruits of true faith. Let no man, either by his sins or years, be held back from coming to lay hold of salvation. So long as a man is yet in this world, no late repentance comes out of season. The entry is open to God's indulgence, and the path to pardon is surpassingly plain to those who seek and understand the truth. Even at the very end and last gasp of this temporal life, ask pardon for your sins at the hands of Him who is the true and only God; call to Him for the confession and faith of His knowledge. Pardon is granted to him that confesses; and salvation is given to him that believes; and even he, upon his departure, immediately passes to immortality.

Christ communicates this grace. He attributes this gift to his own mercy, by making death subject to the triumph of the cross, by redeeming the one who believes, with the price of his blood, by reconciling man to God the Father, by quickening the mortal by the heavenly regeneration. Let us all, if it is possible, follow him. Let us all profess his sign and sacrament. He opens the way of life to us. He brings us to paradise again. He leads us to the kingdom of heaven. We shall always live with him; and being made the sons of God by him, we shall always rejoice with him, being restored by the shedding of his blood. We shall be Christians glorified together with Christ, blessed in God, rejoicing with perpetual pleasure, always in the sight of God, and evermore giving thanks to God. 4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

OF GOD; OF THE TRUE KNOWLEDGE OF GOD, AND OF THE DIVERSE WAYS HOW TO KNOW HIM; THAT GOD IS ONE IN SUBSTANCE, AND THREE IN PERSONS.

I HAVE up to here, in thirty-two sermons, discoursed upon the word of God, and the lawful exposition of it; upon Christian faith, the love of God and our neighbour. I have also spoken of the law of nature, of man's law, and God's law, and of the parts of God's law, namely, the moral, the ceremonial, and the judicial laws; of the use of the law, and of the fulfilling and abrogation of it; of the likeness and difference between the two testaments and people, the old and the new; of Christian liberty; of offences; of the effect and merits of good works; of sin, and the various sorts of it: and also of the grace of God, or the gospel of Jesus Christ, in whom our heavenly Father has given us all things belonging to life and eternal salvation. Finally, I have treated repentance, and of the things that especially seem to belong to it. Our purpose is to argue discreetly upon the principal points of Christian religion.

And in the premises, we have often heard mention of God, of the knowledge and worship of God, of Jesus Christ, of the Holy Ghost, of good and evil spirits, of the church, of prayer, of the sacraments, and similar holy things. Since we have now come to an end of those former points, necessity itself requires that we now say something here about all and every one of these latter principles according to the holy scripture, so far as the Lord gives me grace and the ability to do that.

Concerning God, there were many erroneous opinions of old, not only among the ruder sort of people, but even in the whole pack of philosophers, and the conventicles of false Christians. Touching philosophers, that ancient and learned writer, Tertullian, was prone to say that philosophers are the patriarchs of heretics.¹ and touching false Christians, the apostle John said, "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would have remained with us."^{1Joh 2.19} Nor do I see what gain you would get by it, if I were to proceed to reckon up for you all their opinions. It is good, perhaps, to know in what they erred, lest we also strike upon the same rock that they did. Therefore, if any that have a desire for it, wish to see the opinions of the heathens and heretics concerning God, let them search Plutarch in his Placitis Philoso. lib. i. chap. 7, or in other heathen writers; or in Cyril's first book Contra Julianum; and in the 4th chapter of *Dogmatum vel definitionum Ecclesiast.*² I will not at this time trouble the attentive ears and minds of the godly hearers with that burden. That diversity of opinions is derived from no other fountain than from the boldness and unskilfulness of men who are not ashamed, out of their own device and brain, to add and apply to God the things from which he is furthest and free.

And now, that I may not stay long here in declaring the narrow straitness and misty darkness of man's wit, I ask you, Who is able with his understanding, to conceive the being of God, when indeed no man ever fully understood what fashion the soul of man is, of what sort many other things are that are in man's body, and what manner of substance the sun and moon are made of?

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

There are many reasons given by natural philosophy; but the work of God still abides greater and more wonderful than the wit or speech of man is able to comprehend or express.

Therefore, let no man who goes about to know any certainty about God, descend into himself to search Him out with thoughts of his own;¹ nor let him ground his opinion on men's determinations and weak definitions. For otherwise he will always worship the invention of his own heart, mere folly, trifles, and foolish fantasies. But on the other side again, the man cannot help but think rightly, judge truly, and speak well of God, who attributes nothing to himself, devises nothing by his own brain, nor follows the toys of other men's inventing; but in all things, he gives ear to the word of God, and always follows His holy revelation. Therefore, let this stand as if it were for a continual rule: that God cannot be rightly known except by his word; and God is to be received and believed to be such a one as he reveals himself to us in his holy word. For truly, no creature can better tell what, and what kind of one God is, than God himself.

Now, since this God in his word, by the workmanship of the world, by the holy scriptures, and by his oracles, uttered by the mouth of the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles — indeed, and the very minds and consciences of men — testifies that He exists, the kingly prophet David therefore says: "The fool has said in his heart, There is no God." ^{Psa 14.1} For he must be an ass or a fool, who denies the thing that is evident to all men in the world, who are not out of their wits, namely, that there is a God. Consider that even Cicero, a heathen author, in his book de Natura Deorum, says, "It is bred and born together with men, and grafted in their hearts, to think that there is a God." ² Truly, those who deny God, deny the one they nevertheless fear; and therefore, they confess by that fear that he exists, and by that means they convict themselves of lying and falsehood.

Again, this is to be noted: that in demanding who and what God is, even though that question is made and arises by beating out and discussing the scriptures, yet a measure is to be kept, and in any case observed.

To go about over-curiously inquiring after, searching out, and seeking the very eternal being of God, is both perilous and also flatly forbidden. Solomon cries, "As it is not good to eat much honey; so an over-curious ³ searcher of God's majesty shall be confounded by His glory." ⁴ Before that singular and notable communication, in which our God talked with the whole people of Israel at mount Sinai, it is said to Moses: "Set bounds for the people round about the mountain, and say to them, Take heed to yourselves that you do not go up into the mount, or touch the border of it. Whoever touches the mount, let him die the death," etc. ^{Exo 19.12} Look here, it was quick death to pass the limits or bounds prescribed. Therefore our studies are and ought to be definite, not infinite.⁵ Truly, we read in many places of the holy scriptures that the most entire and excellent friends of God stood amazed and trembling, whenever God in any outward show of his own accord, offered himself to their eyes. I need not busy myself too much in reckoning up examples. You know how Abraham behaved himself in the talk which he had with God, in Genesis 18. You know what the parents of Gideon said in the book of Judges;⁶ and what Elijah spoke, in 1Kings 19. Peter, after the miraculous taking of the great draught of fishes, understood that Christ was more than a man. He cried out, saying: "Go away from me, Lord, for I am a sinful man." Therefore, if this is so in any other matters belonging to God, then especially in this, the saints are to be humble, modest, and religious — understanding that His eternal and incomprehensible power and unspeakable majesty are altogether uncircumscribable,¹ and cannot be comprehended in any name whatsoever.

Tertullian, in his book De Trinitate, says very eloquently, truly, and godly:

"The proper name of God cannot be uttered, because it cannot be conceived. For what is called by a name, is conceived by the condition of its own nature.

For a name is the significant noting of that thing which may be conceived by the name. But when the thing which is handled is of such a sort that it cannot be rightly conceived by our very senses and understanding, then how will it be rightly named by an apt term and fit nomination? While it is beyond understanding, it must also be above the significance of the term by which it is named. So that when God, for certain causes or occasions, annexes or declares His name to us in words, we may think and know that the actual property of the name is not expressed so much in words, as a certain significance is set down by it. Men may run to this name while in prayers, that they may be able to call upon God and obtain His mercy." ²

And again he says:

"Concerning God and those things that are of him and in him, the mind of man is not able to conceive what they are, how great they are, or of what fashion they are; nor does the eloquence of man's mouth utter in speech, words that in any point correlate to this majesty. As to thinking upon and uttering his majesty, all eloquence is mute and dumb, and the whole mind is too little, for it is greater than the mind; nor can it be conceived how great it is. This is because, if it could be conceived, then it must be less than man's mind in which it may be comprehended. It is also greater than all speech and cannot be spoken; because if it may be spoken, then it is less than man's speech by which, if it is spoken, it may be compassed and made to be understood. But whatever may be thought of Him, will still be less than he is. And whatever is shown of Him in speech, compared with Him, will be much less than He is.

For in silence, to ourselves, we may partly perceive him. But to express him in words, as He is, is altogether impossible. For if you call him Light, then you name a creature of his rather than him, but him you do not express. Or if you call him Virtue, then you name his power rather than him, but him you do not declare. Or if you call him Majesty, then you name his honour rather than him, but him you do not describe. And why should I prolong the time, in running through every individual title? I will declare it all at once. Say everything you can about Him, whatever it is, and you still name some thing of his, rather than himself. For what can you fitly say or think of him, that is greater than all your words and senses? Unless it is in this one way: that as we can, and as our capacity will serve, and as our understanding will let us — we will conceive in our mind what God is, only if we think that he is that which cannot be understood, nor can possibly come into our thoughts, whatever kind of thing, and however great. For just as our eyes so dazzle and dim at seeing the brightness of the sun, that our sight cannot behold the very circle of it because it is overcome by the brightness of the beams that are opposed against it — even so, it fares with the sight of our mind in all our thoughts of God; and however much more she settles herself to consider God, by that much more she is blinded in the light of her cogitation.

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

For (to repeat the same thing again) what can you fitly think about Him that is above all loftiness, higher than all height, deeper than all depth, lighter than all light, clearer than all clearness, brighter than all brightness, stronger than all strength, more virtuous than all virtue, fairer than all fairness, truer than all truth, greater than all greatness, mightier than all might, richer than all riches, wiser than all wisdom, more liberal than all liberality, better than all goodness, juster than all justice, and gentler than all gentleness? For all kinds of virtues must be less than He that is the Father and God of all virtues: so that God may truly be said to be such a being that nothing may be compared to Him. For he is above all that may be spoken." ¹

Now, although these things are so, and no tongue either of angels or of men can fully express what, who, and of what manner God is, seeing that his majesty is incomprehensible and unspeakable; yet the scripture, which is the word of God, tempering itself to our imbecility, ministers to us some means, forms, and phrases of speech, to bring us by them to some such knowledge of God as may at least suffice us while we live in this world.

Yet notwithstanding, we should still think that the thing which is incomprehensible cannot be defined, but that by those phrases only an occasion is given by which we are brought to greater things through the illumination of the Spirit; and in this disputation we should still have before the eyes of our mind, that true and assured sentence of the eternal God to his servant Moses, saying: "You can not see my face; for no man shall see me and live." ^{Exo 33.20} For once we have departed out of this life, and are unburdened of this mortality and mortal frailty, then we shall see the majesty of God; for the apostle St. John said: "We know that when he appears, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is." ^{1Joh 3.2} And let us annex to these, the words of the apostle Paul, where he says: "Now we see in a glass, even in a dark riddle;² but then we shall see face to face." ^{1Cor 13.12} Therefore, let no man go beyond the limited bounds, or prevent the time appointed, nor yet presume by wicked boldness and curiosity in this life to behold the face, that is, the very essence or being of God. Let that revelation of God suffice everyone whom God himself grants in his word to open to us: namely, so much as of his goodness he thinks necessary and profitable for us to know. And I here with warrant say this: that wisdom is the true wisdom, which will not in this matter go about to know or savour more than the eternal wisdom teaches us to know.

The FIRST and chief way to know God is derived from the very names of God attributed to him in the holy scripture. Those names are many and of sundry sorts, because his virtue, his wisdom — by which I mean his goodness, justice, and power — are altogether infinite. I will reckon up and expound to you the most excellent and usual among the rest, according to my skill.

Among all the names of God, that is the most excellent which they call Tetragrammaton, that is (if we may so say), the four-lettered name: for it is compounded of the four spiritual letters, and is called JEHOVAH.

It is derived from the verb-substantive, Hovah, before which they put Jod and make it Jehovah, that is to say, Being, or I am; as he that is αυτοουσια (autousia), a being of himself, having his life and being not from any other, but of himself; lacking nobody's aid to make him be, but giving being to all manner of things — namely, eternal God, without beginning and ending, in whom we live, we move, and have our being. ^{Act 17:28} To this, those words especially belong which we find had passed between God and Moses in the third chapter of Exodus:

"And Moses said to God, Behold, when I come to the children of Israel, to whom you now send me, and say to them, The God of your fathers has sent me to you; and they ask me, saying, What is his name? the what answer shall I make them? And God said to Moses, I am that I am; or, I will be that I will be: and he said, Thus shall you say to the children of Israel, I am, or Being, or I will be, has sent me to you." ^{Exo 3:13-14}

That is, I am God that will be, and he has sent me who is himself Being, or Essence, and God everlasting. For their future tense contains three sundry times, He that is, He that was, and He that will be, has sent me. Truly, in his Revelation, the evangelist and apostle John seems to have had an eye to these words of the Lord, which he also went about interpreting, saying in the person of God: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, RSV's, or the first and the last, says the almighty Lord, which is, and which was, and which shall be."

There are some who observe this for a note, that in almost all tongues, even the barbarous sort, the name of God is written with four letters. Concerning his name in Hebrew it is assuredly so; and in the Greek, Latin, and German tongues it is also true. For God in Greek is called Θεός (Theos); in Latin Deus; and with us Germans he is called Gott. They add, moreover, that the Persians call him Συρη (Surh), and the Egyptians Θουθ or Θευθ (Thuth or Theuth), and by contraction, Θωθ (Thuuth). And in the four letters, the Cabalists say that there are wonderful mysteries contained. As others have written very diligently about this, I would rather not stand on them here, nor trouble your patience with them.

Also like this are these names of God: Jah (or Yah), and Hu. The first is found in the Psalms more than once: for David says, "Hallelu-Jah" that is, "Praise you the Lord." The latter is also mentioned by David, saying, Hu, that is "he," I say, God, the Being and creator of all things, "spoke the word and it was done; Hu, he commanded and it was." In Isaiah the Lord says: "I am the Lord, Hu is my name, and I will give my glory to no other." Now, those words also are derived from being, and they teach us that God is always like himself, an essence which of itself is eternally, and which gives being to all things that are — as He by whom, in whom, and to whom all things are, being himself a perpetual and most absolute or perfect havingness.¹ But the Hebrews do not read or express the four-lettered name of God by calling it Jehovah; instead they use the word Adonai. For they say that Jehovah must not be uttered. Now, all interpreters in their translations, where they turn it into Latin, call it Dominus, that is, Lord: for God is the Lord of all things, both visible and invisible. Nor is there any other Lord in the whole world, except this one (and he alone), to whom all things in the world are subject, and obey. For he has a most complete dominion and absolute monarchy over all his creatures. And therefore, for plainness' sake, the word Sabaoth is sometimes annexed to the name of God;² which some translate "the Lord of powers," and some "the Lord of hosts." For God, being almighty, displays by his power or strength, and declares in his host, what mighty things he is able to do, and how great a power and might he has. For since he is the God of all creatures, and he disposes and uses them as a captain uses his soldiers, to work mighty and marvellous things, he declares even by small things³ how great he himself is, and how great his power is. In the host of God are all the angels, of whom Daniel said, "A thousand thousands and hundreds of thousands ministered to him." One of these angels killed in the Assyrians' camp in one night, one hundred eighty-five thousand soldiers under the banner of the most powerful king Sennacherib.

In the host of God are all the winds, all the stars, and all the fiery, airy, and watery impressions. In the host of God are all evil spirits, all men, kings and princes, all the warlike furnishings of every nation, and finally, all creatures, both visible and invisible. And all these He uses according to his own pleasure, yes, according to his own good and just will, when, how much, and how long he wishes, to finish and bring to pass his own will and judgments. In punishing the first world at the deluge, he used water. In destroying Sodom and the cities thereabout, he used fire. And in rooting out the Canaanites and Jews, he used the means of mortal men, or soldiers.

Sometimes there is ascribed to the Lord the word Eleon, and the Lord is called Eleon, that is to say, high. For in the one hundred-thirteenth psalm we read: "The Lord is higher than all nations, and his glory is above the heavens. Who is like the Lord our God, who sets himself so high in his habitation?" Psa 113.4-5 And in the ninety-seventh psalm he says: "You, Lord, are higher than all that are in the earth; you are exalted far above all gods." Psa 97.9

Again, God is called El, because of his strength. For what he wills, that he can do, and therefore is he called a strong God, or a giant. For Jeremiah says: "The Lord is with me as a strong giant." Jer 20.11 Isaiah says: "The Lord shall come forth like a giant, he shall stir himself up ¹ like a man of war, he shall roar and overcome his enemies." Isa 42.13 And like this is the word Eloah, whose plural number is Elohim. That name betokens the presence of God, which never fails his workmanship and worshippers. Jeremiah brings in God speaking, and says: "Am I God, that sees only the thing that is near at hand, and not the thing that is far off? ² May any man hide himself, so that I shall not see him, says the Lord? Do I not fill heaven and earth?" Jer 23.24

For before him, also David said: "Where shall I go from the breath of your mouth? And where shall I flee from your countenance? If I ascend into heaven, you are there: and if I descend into hell, you are there also. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there your hand shall rule me, and your right hand shall hold me fast." Psa 139.6-10 Therefore the apostle Paul says: "God is not far from every one of us. For by him we live, we move, and have our being." Act 17.28 And for that reasons perhaps, God was called $\Theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ (Theos), namely, $\alpha\pi\omicron\ \Theta\epsilon\epsilon\iota\nu$ (apo Theein) by the Greeks, because of his readiness and immediate succour; because he never fails mortal men, but always and in all places aids and relieves them. Likewise, Plato in Cratylus, and his interpreter Proclus, think that $\Theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ (God) is derived $\alpha\pi\omicron\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \Theta\epsilon\epsilon\iota\nu$, that is, running. But that course, or running, does not refer to the presence or help of God, but to another thing.³ For when men saw the sun, moon, stars, and heaven itself, still turned around by running, they thought that they were gods. There are some who will derive it $\alpha\pi\omicron\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \delta\epsilon\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$ (apo tou deous), that is to say, of fear or dread: for fear of religion believes and persuades men that there is a God. The Latins perhaps framed their Deus (God) from the Greeks' $\Theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$. But some rather think that Deus is derived a dando, of giving, because he gives all things to all men. For so among the Hebrews he is called $\Theta\epsilon\omicron\varsigma$ (as I will shortly declare), or Shaddai, because he is sufficient to himself; he lacks nothing, but gives to all men all good and necessary things.⁴ Some others would have God called in Latin, Deus, quod ipsi nihil deest, that is, "God, because there is nothing lacking in him."

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

But now, the scripture attributes the plural number, Elohim, not to God alone, but also to angels, to judges, and to men in authority: because God is always present with them while they labour in that office which he has appointed them to. And by their ministry, He works the things which he himself wills, and which are expedient for the welfare of mortal men.

And although the word Elohim is plural in number, yet it is set before verbs in the singular number. In the first chapter of Genesis, we find, "In the beginning," Bara Elohim, Creavit Dii, "God created" (for Bara, created, is the singular number) heaven and earth. That phrase of speech shows to us the mystery of the reverend Trinity: for Moses seems to have said in effect, In the beginning, God in the Trinity created heaven and earth. In the seventh chapter of the second book of Samuel, verse 23, Elohim in the plural number is joined with verbs of the plural number, to declare that there is a difference of persons in the blessed Trinity.

Moreover, in the league which God makes with our father Abraham God gives himself another name. For he says: "I God am Shaddai" that is, sufficient, or sufficiency. ^{Gen 17.1} Therefore, God is called Shaddai. Some in their translations turn it Vastator, a destroyer, as if God would name himself a just revenger. But Moses Egyptian ¹ says: "The noun Shaddai is compounded from the verb Daii (which signifies, he suffices) and the letter Shin, which has the same meaning that Ascher has, and signifies, he that. So that Shaddai is as the same as saying, "he that suffices to himself, and is the sufficiency or fulness of all things." Perhaps the heathen have on this occasion derived their Saturnus, which name they gave to those whom they wickedly took to be gods. For as Diurnus comes from Dies, a day; so Saturnus is derived a saturando, of satisfying or filling.² Therefore, God is that One to whom nothing is lacking, who in all things and to all things is sufficient to himself; who needs no man's aid, yes, who alone has all things which pertain to the perfect felicity both of this life and of the world to come; and which he alone can fill and suffice all his people and other creatures. For this reason, the Germans call him Gott, as if to say Guot, good, or best;³ because, as He is full of all goodness, so he most liberally bestows upon men all manner of good things. The German word is not unlike the ancient name by which the Egyptians called God; for they called God Theuth, or Thoth: now if we put G for Th, then it is Goth, and we say, Gott.

The Lord himself, in the sixth chapter of Exodus, puts these two names together, Shaddai and Jehovah, as two of the most excellent names that he has, and says: "I am Jehovah. And I appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as God Shaddai: but in my name Jehovah I was not known to them;" ^{Exo 6.3} — not that the patriarchs had not heard or known the name Jehovah. For that name began to be called upon in the time of Seth, immediately after the beginning of the world. Therefore, it seems that the Lord in effect meant this: "I opened myself to the patriarchs as God Shaddai, who is able in all things to sufficiently fill them with all goodness; and therefore I promised them a land that flows with milk and honey: but I was not yet known to them by my name Jehovah, that is, I did not perform unto them that which I promised." For we have heard already that he is called Jehovah, of that which he brings about; and therefore he brings his promise to performance. "Now therefore" (he says) "I will indeed fulfil my promise, and show myself to be, not only Deum Shaddai, an all-sufficient or almighty God, but also show myself to be Jehovah, an essence or eternal being, immutable, true, and in all things like myself, or standing to my promise." ¹

Last of all, we read in the third chapter of Exodus, that God said to Moses: "Thus you shall say to the children of Israel, The Lord God of our fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, has sent me to you. This is my name forever, and this is my memorial from one generation to another." Exo 3.15 So then, here we now have another name of God; for he would be called the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. "This," he says, "shall be my memorial from one generation unto another; namely, that in which I will keep in memory my benefits bestowed upon those patriarchs, so that by them the posterity may know and remember me." For when we hear the names of those patriarchs, they put us in mind of all the excellent and innumerable benefits which God bestowed on our forefathers.

These are not in vain, and with such great diligence, particularly reckoned up by Moses in his first book called Genesis. For He will be our God, even as he was theirs, if we so believe in him as they did. For to us who believe, he will be both Shaddai and Jehovah, eternal and immutable truth, being, life, and heaped-up storehouse of all manner of good things.

And now, by the way, it is not without a mystery that, when he is also the God of other patriarchs, such as Adam, Seth, Enosh, and especially Enoch and Noah, yet out of the number of them, he picked those three: Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And to every one of their names he severally prefixed his own name, saying: "I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." He evidently did this to teach the mystery of the Trinity in the unity of the divine substance, and that each one of the persons is of the same divinity, majesty and glory; that is, that the Father is very God, the Son is very God, and the Holy Ghost is very God; and these three are one God; for he says, "I am God," etc. I will speak of this in a convenient place.

This much up to here concerning the names of God, out of which a general knowledge of God may easily be gathered. I know that one Dionysius ² has made a busy commentary upon the names of God. But I know too, that the godly sort, and those who are studious of the apostles' doctrine, understand that the disciples of the apostles far more simply handled matters belonging to religion. I know that other take account of seventy-two names of God out of the scriptures and books of the Cabalists. As I have repeated these in another place, ³ so I will hereafter repeat to you the chief of them, out of Exodus.

SECONDLY, God is exhibited to be seen in the word of God, to be beheld, and to be known by visions and divine mirrors, as though in a certain parable; while he is set before our eyes by Prosopography, Prosopopoeia, or mortal shapes.

And yet we are warned not to stick on those visible things, but to lift up our minds from visible things, to invisible and spiritual things. For God is not bodily in his own substance, just because in visions he is exhibited to us in a bodily shape like a man. Nor did any of the old saints before the birth of Christ express God in the shape and picture of a mortal man, just because God had exhibited himself in that shape so as to be seen by the patriarchs and prophets. It is the dotting ⁴ error of the Anthropomorphites ¹ to say that God exists bodily, and that he has members like a mortal man. And so that no man in this case deceives himself by attributing falsely to God the thing that is against his honour, I will here, instead of a remedy against that poison, recite to you, dearly beloved, the words of ST. AUGUSTINE. Out of the pure understanding of the holy scriptures, and assured testimonies of catholic true doctors, he wrote to Fortunatus — De Videndo Deo, against the Anthropomorphites:

"Concerning the members of God, which the scripture mentions in every place, know this: lest any man believe that, according to the fashion and figure of this flesh, we are like God, that same scripture also said that God has wings, which it is manifest that we men do not have. Therefore, just as when we hear wings named, we understand God's protection and defence; so when we hear of hands, we must understand his operation; when we hear mention made of feet, we must understand his present readiness; when we hear the name eyes, we must understand his sight, by which he sees and knows all things: and when we hear of his face, we must understand his justice, by which he is known to the whole world: and whatever else like this that the same scripture mentions, I believe truly that it must be understood spiritually. Nor do I alone, nor am I the first that thinks this; but even all those who with a basic understanding of the scriptures, withstand the opinion of those who, for that reason, are called Anthropomorphites.

I mean to allege here one testimony out of the writings of St. Jerome. I will not cite too much, so as not to cause too long a stay. For when that man, who was most excellently learned in the holy scriptures, expounded the Psalm, where it is said, "Understand, you unwise among the people; you fools, at length be wise. He that planted the ear, shall he not hear; or he that made the eye, shall he not see?" Psa 94.8-9 JEROME said among other things,

"This place most of all works against the Anthropomorphites, who say that God has members even as we have. For example, he is said to have eyes. 'The eyes of the Lord behold all things; the hand of the Lord makes all things.' And 'Adam heard the sound of the feet of the Lord walking in paradise.' They understand these places simply as the letter lies, and refer mortal weakness to the magnificent mightiness of the immortal God. But I say that God is all eye, all hand, and all foot. He is all eye, because he sees all things; all hand, because he works all things; all foot, because he is present everywhere. Therefore, mark what he says: 'He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? or he that made the eye, shall he not see?' He did not say, therefore He has no eyes. But he said, 'He that planted the ear, shall He not hear; or He that made the eye, shall He not see? He made the members, and gave them the efficient powers.'

And a little afterwards, ST. AUGUSTINE says:

In all this which I have cited out of the saints and doctors, Ambrose, Jerome, Athanasius, Gregory [Nazianzen], and whatever else like these from other men's works that I could ever read or come by (which I think would be too long to recite here individually), I find that God is not a body, nor does he have members like a man; neither is he divided by the distance of places, but by nature he is unchangeably invisible. And with the help of God, I believe without wavering, and so far as he gives me grace, I understand that when in the holy scriptures he is reported to have been seen with corporal eyes, he did not appear to those to whom he appeared, by that same invisible nature and substance, but by a visible shape taken to himself, as it pleased him."

This much out of Augustine. ²

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

To these I will now also add the words of TERTULLIAN, a very ancient ecclesiastical writer, in his excellent book De Trinitate.

"By members, are meant the efficient powers of God, not the bodily fashion of God, or corporal lineaments. For when the eyes are described, it is set down because he sees all things; and when the ear is named, it is named because he hears all things; and when the finger is mentioned, then a certain signification of his mind is declared; and when the nostrils ¹ are spoken of, the receiving of prayers as sweet smells is thereby noted; and when the hand is talked of, it argues that He is the author of all creatures; and when the arm is specified, thereby is declared that no nature can withstand the power of God; and when the feet are named, that puts us in mind that God fills all things, and that there is no place where he is not present. For neither members nor the offices of members are necessary to Him, whose will alone all things obey and are ready at hand, without any words. For why should He require eyes, when he is himself the light? Or why should he seek feet, when he is himself present everywhere? Or why should he go in, since there is nowhere to go out from himself? Or why should he wish for a hand, whose will works all things without words? Nor does he need ears, who knows the most secret thoughts. Or why should he lack a tongue, whose thinking alone is a command? For these members were necessary to men, and not to God; because the counsel of men would have no effect, unless the body fulfilled the thoughts. But they are not needful to God, whose will the very works not only follow without any stirring business, but immediately proceed and go forward with his will. He is all eye, because he wholly sees. He is all ear, because he wholly hears. He is all hand, because he wholly works; and He is all foot, because he is wholly everywhere. For whatever is simple does not have in itself any diversity — not of itself. But whatever things are born to dissolution, those things fall into a diversity of members; but things that are not concrete, cannot feel diversity." ²

And as follows. For all these, up to here, are the words of Tertullian.

Therefore, when we read that Moses saw God face to face, and that Jacob, Israel, and the prophets saw God plainly and not obscurely, what is meant is that a vision most manifest, effectual, and very familiar was exhibited to them. For truly, said Theodoret, the bishop of Cyrus: "We say that the fathers did not see the divine nature or substance — which cannot be circumscribed, comprehended, or perceived in the mind of man, but itself comprehends all things. But we say that they saw a certain glory and certain visions, which correlated to their capacity, and did not surpass the measure of it." ³ For these assured sentences of the holy scripture always remain most true: "No man ever saw God at any time." Joh 1.18 "God dwells in the light that no man can attain unto, whom no man has seen nor can see;" 1Tim 6.16 and again, "No man shall see my face, and live;" Exo 33.20 that is, so long as he lives on this earth in the corruption and imperfection of his flesh no man shall behold the essence of God, which is eternal and light that cannot be looked upon. For once we are delivered from this corruption and are glorified, then we shall see him as he is. 1Joh 3.2

Therefore, God is said to have been seen by the fathers, not according to the fulness of his divinity, but according to the capacity of men.

² Originally, "but the things that are not compact together, cannot feel diversity." In ed. 1577, diversity is placed within brackets. Novat. de Trin. Lib. apud Tertull. Opp. Par. 1664, p. 710.

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

Tertullian thinks that all things in the old Testament were done of God the Father by the Son, who, taking upon with himself a competent shape, appeared to men and spoke to the fathers. In the beginning of his epistle to the Hebrews, ^{2.14} Paul significantly speaks of the Son of God incarnate, not absolutely denying that the Father ever did anything by the Son. Tertullian says:

"To the Son was given all power in heaven and on earth. But that power could not be of all things, unless it were of every time. Therefore, it was the Son who always descended to talk with men, from Adam to the patriarchs and prophets, in vision, in dream, in a mirror, and oracle. So it always pleased God to be familiar with men in the earth, being none other than the Word who afterward was to be made flesh. And it pleased him to so make a way for us to faith, that we might more easily perceive that the Son of God descended into the world, and that we might know that such a thing was done." ¹

And so forth as follows; for all these are the words of Tertullian. After this introduction,² we will now add the visions of God's majesty exhibited to holy men.

God exhibited to his servants many and sundry visions in which, in a way, he foreshadowed his majesty to them. It would be too long a labour for me to repeat and expound to you all of these visions. You shall find the most notable ones in Exodus 19, Isaiah 6, Ezekiel 1, Daniel 7, and in the Apocalypse of the blessed evangelist and apostle John. It is sufficient to put you in mind of them. But now, the most renowned and excellent one of all, I will recite here and handle at large. It is found in the thirty-third and thirty-fourth chapters of Exodus.

Moses had trial of the facility and goodness of God, and that there was nothing which he obtained that was not at God's hand. Therefore he takes it upon himself to boldly ask this also of the Lord: to see God in his substance, glory, and majesty; which all the true wise men of every age only wished and longed for. For Moses says: "Because I understand that you, O God, wish me well, and that you can deny nothing, I beseech you, then: show me your glory." That is, allow me, I pray you, to see you as you are in your glorious substance and majesty. Now, in answering this request, which is the greatest of all others, God says to him: "I will make all my goodness pass before you, and I will cry the name of the Lord, or in the name of the Lord,³ before you." ^{Exo 33.19} In these words, he promises two things to Moses. The one is, "All my goodness shall pass before you." But this chief good of God can be nothing else than the good and mighty God himself, or rather, the Word of God — I say, the very beloved Son of God, in whom we believe that all the treasures of wisdom, divinity, goodness, and perfection are placed and laid up. For he set before Moses' eyes his appearance in a human and visible shape, that same appearance he would have at the end of the world, incarnate. The other thing that he promised is this: "I will cry the name of the Lord, or in the name of the Lord, before you;" that is, I will proclaim the names of my glory, by which you may understand who I am, and see me in your mind.

But now, so that no man should attribute so excellent a vision to the merit of Moses, the Lord adds a subsequent sentence. This vision does not happen to you because of your own merit. For "without man's merits I reveal myself to whom I will, and without respect of persons I will have compassion on whom it pleases me." This consideration of the free grace and liberal goodness of God greatly belongs to the true knowledge of God.

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

Then the Lord continues, and more significantly declares to Moses in what manner and order he will exhibit or show himself to him. "You may not in this life see my face;" that is, you may not fully see me in my substance; for that is reserved for the blessed spirits and glorified bodies in the world to come. I will therefore show myself to you in this fashion. You shall go up into the mountain; there in a rock I will show you a cleft, in which you shall place yourself: and I will lay my hand upon you, that is, a cloud, or some such thing, so that, as I come toward you, you may not look directly in my face. In that phrase of speech, the Lord imitates the fashion of men, whose order is to spread their hands over the eyes of the one whom they would not have narrowly behold anything. The Lord then adds: And in the meantime, I will pass by; that is, the image which I take, namely, the shape of a man, in which I will exhibit myself to be seen, shall pass by before you. And once I am past, so that you can not see my face, I will take away the hand with which I hid your eyes, and then you shall behold the back of the figure, or my hinder parts. Now the hinder parts of God are the words and deeds of God, which he leaves behind him, so that we may learn by them to know him. Again, beholding God's face is taken for the most exact and precise knowledge of God; but those who see the back only, do not know as well as those who see the face. And in the hinder or latter times of the world, God sent his Son into the world, born of a woman;¹ whoever beholds him in faith, does not see the Godhead in his humanity, but by his words and deeds, they know who God is, and so they see the Father in the Son. For they learn that God is the chief good, and that the Son of God is God, being co-equal and of the same substance with the Father.

Now let us see how God (according to this promise he made) exhibited himself to be seen by Moses. Moses, rising up in good time, ascends up into the mountain cheerfully to the rock which the Lord had shown him, placing himself in the cleft. He looks greedily for the vision or revelation of God. At length, the Lord descended in a cloud, and came upon the mountain to the cleft of the rock in which Moses waited for him.

And presently, when Moses' face was hidden, the figure of God passed by before him — that is, the shape of a man which God took upon himself. And when the back of the figure was toward Moses, so that he could no longer see its face, the Lord took his hand away, and Moses beheld the hinder parts of him. By this he gathered that God would one day, that is to say, in the hinder times of the world, be incarnate and revealed to the world. We will afterward say something more about this revelation. Once the Lord had gone past, he cried out as he promised, and as in a certain catalogue, he reckoned up his names by which, as in a shadow, he declared His nature. For he said, "Jehovah, Jehovah, God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abounding in goodness and truth; keeping mercy in store for thousands, forgiving wickedness, transgression, and sin: and yet not allowing the wicked to escape unpunished, visiting the wickedness of the fathers upon the children and children's children, to the third and fourth generation." Exo 34.6-7 What else is this, than if God had said,

'I am the uncreated essence, being of myself from before all beginning, who gives being to all things, and keeps all things in being; I am a strong and almighty God; I do not abuse my might, for I am gentle and merciful; I love my creatures, and man especially, on whom I wholly yearn in the bowels of love and mercy; I am rich and bountiful, and ready at all times to help my creatures; I freely, without recompense, give all that I bestow; I am long-suffering, and not irritable to anger or hasty to revenge, as mankind is; I am no niggard ² or envious, as wealthy men in the world usually are; I am most liberal and bountiful, rejoicing to be shared among my people, and to heap up benefits upon the faithful. Moreover, I am true and faithful; I deceive no man; I lie about nothing; what I promise, I stand to, and faithfully perform it. I neither can nor do so waste my riches that, at length, all is spent and I myself am drawn dry. For I keep good turns in store for a thousand generations, so that even if the former age never lived so wealthily with my riches, yet those who are still to come and be born, even till the end of the world, shall nevertheless find in me enough to suffice and satisfy their desire.

² Niggard: A selfish person who is unwilling to give or spend.

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

For I am the well-spring of good that cannot be drawn dry; and if any man sins against me and afterward repents of it, I am not unappeasable. For of my own free-will I forgive errors, sins, and heinous crimes. And yet, let no man therefore think that I am delighted with sins, or that I am a patron of wicked-doers. For I, even I, punish wicked and impenitent men, and chasten even those who are my own, that thereby I may keep them in order and office. But let no man think that he may sin and escape unpunished, because he sees that his ancestors sinned and were not punished — that is, sinned and were not utterly cut off and wiped out. For I reserve revenge till a just and full time, and I so behave myself, that all are compelled to confess me to be a God of judgment.'

Now, when Moses the servant of God had heard and seen these things, he made haste, and fell down prostrate to the earth, and worshipped. Let us also do the same, being surely certified that the Lord will not grant, so long as we live in this transitory world, to reveal himself and his glory any whit more fully and publicly,¹ than he was exhibited to us in Christ his Son. Therefore, let the things that sufficed Moses suffice us also: let the knowledge of Christ suffice and content us.

For THIRDLY, the most evident and excellent way and means to know God, is laid out before us in Jesus Christ, the Son of God incarnate and made man. For we just heard, even now, that the shadow of Christ was set before Moses, when it pleased God to most familiarly reveal himself to him. And the apostle Paul places the illumination or appearing of "the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jesus Christ." 2Cor 4.6 And in another place, the same Paul calls Christ "the brightness of his Father's glory, and the living image of his substance." Heb 1.3 Truly, he most plainly says himself in the gospel, "No man knows the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him." Mat 11.27 For he is the way to the Father, and the Father is seen and beheld in him. For we again read in the gospel, "No man has ever seen God at any time; the only-begotten Son, which is in the bosom of the Father, he has revealed Him to us." Joh 1.18

But again the apostle says, "Since, in the wisdom of God the world through their wisdom did not know God, it pleased God through the foolishness of preaching to save those who believe." 1Cor 1.21 That which he calls "the wisdom of God" in this place, is the very creation and workmanship of the world, and the wonderful works of God, in which God would be known to the world. And in beating out and considering this, all the wisdom of all the wise men till then, altogether lay. But because the consideration of those things did them no good, because man's wisdom for the most part referred the causes of things to something other than God, who is the true and only mark to which they should be referred. And while men thought themselves wise, as the same apostle ² teaches us, they became fools in their own reasonings. Thus, it pleased God to be known to the world by another way; namely, by the foolish preaching of the gospel, which indeed is the most absolute and perfect wisdom; but to the worldly wisdom of mortal men, it seems foolishness. For it seems a foolish thing to the men of this world, that the true and very God, being incarnate or made man, was resident with us here in the earth, in poverty, hungry, suffered, and died. And yet, even this is the way by which God is most evidently known to the world, together with His wisdom, goodness, truth, righteousness, and power. For the wisdom of God, which no tongue can utter, shines out very brightly in the whole ministry and wonderful dispensation of Christ — but far more publicly, if we discuss and beat out the causes (of which I spoke elsewhere), and thoroughly weigh the doctrine of Christ. In the incarnation of the Son of God, it appears how God wishes the world well, it being sunk and drowned in sin, as that to which he is bound by an indissoluble league. And through Christ He adopts the sons of death and the devil, into the sons and heirs of life everlasting. Now, Christ most exactly fulfils all those things which the prophets foretold of him by the revelation of God; and he most liberally performs the things which God the Father promised about him; and that declares how unchangeable and true the eternal God is.

In the deeds or miracles of Christ our Lord — in his resurrection, in his glorious ascension into heaven, and the most plentiful outpouring of his holy Spirit upon his disciples, but especially in converting the whole world from paganism and Judaism to the evangelical truth — appear the power, long-suffering, majesty, and unspeakable goodness of God the Father. In the death of Christ, the Son of God, shines the great justice of God the Father, who having once been offended with our sins, could not be pacified except with such and so great a sacrifice. Finally, because He did not spare not his only-begotten Son, but gave him up for us who are his enemies and wicked rebels — even in this, is that mercy of His made known to the world, which is very rightly commended above all the works of God. Therefore, in the Son and by the Son, God most manifestly makes himself manifest to the world; so that whatever is needful to be known about God or his will, and whatever belongs to heavenly and healthful wisdom, that is wholly opened and thoroughly perceived and seen in the Son.

Therefore, when Philip said to Christ, "Lord, show us the Father, and that will suffice us;" we read in John that the Lord answered, "Have I been so long with you, and do you not yet know me? Philip, he that has seen me has seen the Father; and how can say you, show us the Father? Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?" Joh 14.8-10 Now, in this he calls back all the faithful from over-curious searching after God, laying before them the mystery of the dispensation in which he would have us rest and content ourselves, namely this: that God was made man. Therefore whoever desires to see and know God truly, let them cast the eyes of their mind upon Christ, and believe the mystery of him contained in words and deeds, learning by them what and who God is. For God is such a one as he exhibits himself to be known in Christ, and in that very knowledge, he appoints eternal life to be, where he says: "And this is eternal life, that they might know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent." Joh 17.3

Let him that wishes himself well, take heed that he not go about to know any more than God himself teaches us in Christ. But whoever follows the rule and subtleties of man's wit, neglecting Christ, truly comes to nothing and perishes in his thoughts.

The FOURTH means by which to know God, is fetched out of the contemplation of His works. David says, "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament shows forth the works of his hands." Psa 19.1 And the apostle Paul says, "His invisible things, being understood by his works through the creation of the world, are seen, that is, both his eternal power and Godhead." Rom 1.20 Look, the power and Godhead of God are these invisible things of God; and yet they are understood by the consideration of God's works. Therefore, even God himself is known by the works of God.

But now, the works of God are doubly considered, or are of two sorts. For either they are laid before us to be beheld in things created for the benefit of men, as in the heavens and earth themselves, and those things that are in heaven and on earth, and are governed and preserved by the providence of God. Of this sort are the stars and the motions or courses of the stars, the influence of heaven, the course ¹ of time, living creatures of all kinds (trees, plants, fruits of the earth), the sea and whatever is in it, stones, and whatever things are hidden within and dug out of the earth for the use of men. St. Basil and St. Ambrose have written about these very learnedly and godly in their books entitled, "The Work of Six Days," which they called Hexaëmeron.² Here may be inserted that history of nature, which the glorious and worthy king David in the Psalms, especially the hundredth psalm, most fitly applies to our purpose. But lest we make the course of this present treatise entangled and intricate, I will hereafter speak of the creation of the world, and of God's government and providence, as the same. At present, it shall suffice to know ³ that heaven and earth, and all that is in them, declare to us, and set before our eyes as it were, an evident argument that God, just as He is most wise, is also most mighty, wonderful, of an infinite majesty, of an incomprehensible glory, most just, most gracious, and most excellent.

Isaiah therefore, a faithful teacher of the church, giving good counsel for the state of mortal men, says to them: "Lift up your eyes on high, and consider who has made these things that come forth by heaps,⁴ calling them all by their names; whose strength is so great, that none of them fails." ^{Isa 40.26} For although, even from the beginning, the stars have shined to the world, and have performed in their course, that for which they were created — yet they are not worn by use, nor consumed away or darkened ought at all by their continuance; for they are preserved whole, by the power of their maker. Jeremiah also cries: "Lord, there is none like you. You are great, and great is your name with power. Who would not fear you, O king of the Gentiles? For yours is the glory: for among all the wise men of the heathen, and in all their kingdoms, there is none that may be likened to you." ^{Jer 10.6-7} And immediately after, again:

"The Lord God is a true and living God and king. ⁵ If he is angered, the earth shakes, nor can the Gentiles abide his indignation. He made the earth with his power; with his wisdom he orders the whole compass of the world; and with his discretion he has spread the heavens out. At his voice, the waters gathered together in the air; he draws up the clouds from the uttermost parts of the earth; he turns lightning to rain, and brings the winds out of their treasuries." ^{Jer 10.10-13}

Or else, the works of God are set forth for us to behold in man, the very lord and prince of all creatures, not so much in the workmanship or making of man — which Lactantius and Andreas Vesalius ⁶ have surpassingly painted out for all men to see — as in the works which toward man, or in man, or by man, the Lord himself finishes and brings to pass.

For God justly punishes some men; and by punishing them he declares that he knows the dealings of mortal men, and hates all wrong and injury. Upon others, he heaps up very large and ample benefits; and in being bountiful to them, he declares that He is rich, yes, that He is the fountain of goodness which cannot be drawn dry; and that he is bountiful, good, merciful, gentle, and long-suffering. There are innumerable examples of this in the history of the Bible. Cain, for the murder committed upon his brother, lived a miserable and wretched life here on earth. For the just Lord revenges the blood shed of the innocent. The first world was drowned in the deluge;⁷ a plague was laid on it for the contempt of God; but Noah and his were saved in the ark by the mercy of God. God brings Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees, and places him in the land of Canaan, blessing and loading him with all manner of goods. He wonderfully keeps Jacob in all his troubles and infinite calamities. Through great afflictions, he lifts up Joseph from the prison ¹ to the throne of Egypt. He grievously plagues the Egyptians for the tyranny shown in oppressing Israel, and for the contempt of his commandment. But it would be too long and tedious to make a catalog of all the examples.

Now, by these and like works of God we learn who, and how great, our God is, how wise he is, how good, how mighty, how liberal, how just and rightful; and with this we learn that we must believe him, and obey him in all things. For Asaph says:

"The things that we have heard and known, and such as our fathers have told us, those we will not hide from our sons; but will show to the generations to come the praise of the Lord, his mighty and wonderful works which he has done: that the children which are born, when they come to age, may show their children the same; that they may put their trust in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments." ^{Psa 78.3-7} And as follows in the seventy-eighth Psalm.

Another means to know God, FIFTHLY, is that which is gathered from comparisons. For the scripture compares all the most excellent things in the world with God, whom it prefers before them all; so that we may gather by this, that God is the chief good, and that his majesty is incomprehensible.

This one place in Isaiah may take the place of many, where in the fortieth chapter he says:

"Who has measured the waters with his fist? Who has measured heaven with his span? Who has held the dust of the earth between three fingers, and weighed the mountains ² and hills in a balance? Who has directed the Spirit of the Lord? Who gave him counsel? Who taught him? Who is of his counsel, to instruct him? Behold, all people in comparison to him are a drop in a bucket-full, and counted as the least thing that the balance weighs. Yes, he shall cast out the isles as the smallest crumb of dust. Lebanon is not sufficient to provide Him wood to burn, nor its beasts enough for one sacrifice to him. All people in comparison to him are reckoned as nothing; and if they are compared with him, they are counted as less than nothing... Do you not understand this? Has it not been preached to you since the beginning? Have you not been taught this by the foundation of the earth? It is he that sits upon the circle of the world, whose inhabitants are (in comparison to him) but as grasshoppers. He spreads out the heavens as a covering, and stretches them out as a tent to dwell in. He brings princes to nothing, and makes the judges of the earth as though they did not exist." ^{Isa 40.12-17, 21-23} And so forth.

Now, to this place belong the Prosopopoeial ³ statements of God. You may find many sundry examples of them, besides the visions we placed in the SECOND way or means of knowing God. But the most excellent are found in the eighteenth Psalm, and in the fifth chapter of Solomon's Ballad. ⁴ I passed over both of these, untouched, because I did not mean to keep you too long; for we must descend to the other points.

Last of all, SIXTHLY, God is known by the sayings or sentences uttered by the mouths of the prophets and apostles. Of this sort is that notable speech of Jeremiah, where he says:

"Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, nor the strong man in his strength, nor the rich man in his riches: ¹ but let him that glories glory in this: that he understands and knows me, that I am the Lord, and do mercy, judgment, and righteousness upon earth. Therefore I am delighted in such things alone, says the Lord." Jer 9.23-24 Now, by the mercy of God we are saved and adorned with sundry great benefits; by his judgment he punishes the wicked and disobedient according to their deserts, and with this he keeps equity: even as his righteousness also truly performs that which he promises. Therefore, we say that God is a Saviour, a liberal giver of all good things, an upright Judge, and assured truth in performing his promises.

And here, now, is to be referred the doctrine of the prophets and apostles, which teaches the true knowledge of God, acknowledging Him to be one in essence, and three in persons. Concerning the unity of the divine essence (by the allegation of which, the plurality of the heathen gods is utterly rejected and flatly condemned), I will cite those testimonies out of the holy scripture which seem to be more evident and excellent than all the others — which are so many in number, that a man can hardly count them all. The most notable is that which is grounded upon prophetic and evangelical authority. It is cited out of the sixth chapter of Deuteronomy, ^{6.4} and set down in these words in the twelfth chapter of Mark: "Jesus said, The first of all the commandments is, Hearken, Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord. And you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your strength. This is the first commandment. And the second is like this, You shall love your neighbour as yourself. There is no other commandment greater than these." Mar 12.29-31 It now follows in the gospel: "And the Scribe said, Well, Master, you have said the truth; that there is one God, and that there is no other but he; and that to love him with all the heart, with all the mind, with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love a man's neighbour as himself, is greater than all the burnt-offerings and sacrifices." Mar 12.32-33 All the other notable testimonies in the law, agree with this one.

For in the twentieth chapter of Exodus, we read that the Lord himself said with his own mouth at mount Sinai: "I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage; have no other gods but me." ² Again, at the end of his song Moses brings in God saying: "See now, how I am God, and there is no other God but me. I kill, and make alive again. I wound, and I heal, nor is there any who can deliver out of my hand." Deu 32.39 The testimonies of the prophets also agree with those in the law. For in the eighteenth Psalm, David says: "The way of God is an undented way, the word of the Lord also is tried in the fire. He is the defender of all them that put their trust in him. For who is God but the Lord? or who has any strength ³ except our God?" Psa 18.30-31 There are many of this sort in other places in the volume of the Psalms.

The Lord says in Isaiah, and cries by Isaiah, "I am the Lord, Hu ⁴ is my name, and my glory I will not give to any other, nor my honour to graven images." Isa 42.8 "I am the first and the last, and beside me there is no God. And who is like me? (If any are), let him call forth and openly show what is past, and lay before me what has happened since I appointed the people of the world;⁵ and let him tell what will happen afterward, and come to pass." Isa 44.6-7 "I the Lord do all things; I alone spread out the heavens, and only I have laid out the earth by myself." Isa 42.5 "I make the tokens of witches of no effect, and make the soothsayers fools. As for the wise, I turn them backward, and make their wisdom foolishness. I set up the word of my servant, and fulfil the counsels of my messengers." Isa 44.25-26 "I am the Lord, and there is no other; who creates ¹ light and darkness, and makes peace and trouble: yes, even I the Lord do all these things." Isa 45.7

To these testimonies of the prophets we will now add one or two out of St. Paul, the great instructor and apostle of the Gentiles. In his epistle to Timothy he says: "There is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." 1Tim 2.5

And again he says: "One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all, which is above all, and through all, and in you all." Eph 4.5 Again, the same apostle says to the Corinthians: "There is no other God but one. And if others are called gods, whether in heaven or on earth, (as there are many gods, and many lords) yet to us there is but one God, even the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him." 1Cor 8.4-6 Now I suppose these divine testimonies are evident enough, and sufficiently prove that God is one in substance, of incomprehensible essence, eternal, and spiritual.

But under the one essence of the Godhead, the holy scripture shows us a distinction of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Now, note here that I call it a distinction, not a division or separation. For we adore and worship no more Gods than one; but we neither confound, nor yet deny or take away the three subsistences or persons of the divine essence, nor the properties of it. Noetus (indeed Anoetus) ² and Sabellius the Libyan, a godless, bold, and very rude ass, from whom sprang up the gross heresy of the Patripassians, ³ taught that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost imported no distinction in God, but that they were diverse attributes of God. For they said that God is called the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in no other sense than when he is named good, just, gentle, omnipotent, wise, etc. They said the Father created the world; and only in the name of the Son, he took on flesh and suffered; and again, merely changing his name, he was the Holy Ghost who came upon the disciples. But the true, prophetic, and apostolic faith expressly teaches that the names of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost show us what God is in his own proper nature. For naturally and eternally, God is the Father, because from before beginnings, he unspeakably begot the Son. The same God is naturally the Son, because he was begotten of the Father from before beginnings. The same God is naturally the Holy Ghost, because he is the eternal Spirit of them both, proceeding from both, being one and the same God with them both.

And when in the scriptures, he is called a gentle, good, wise, merciful, and just God, it is not so much expressed by this what he is in himself, as what a God he exhibits to us. The same scripture openly says, that the Father created all things by the Son; and that the Father did not descend into the earth, nor did he take our flesh upon himself, nor suffer for us. For the Son says, "I went out from the Father, and came into the world;" again, "I leave the world, and go to the Father." Joh 16.28 The same Son, falling prostrate in the mount of Olives prays, saying, "Father, if it is possible, let this cup pass from me." Mat 26.39 Again, in the gospel he says, "I will pray to the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter." Joh 14.16 Look, here he says the Father shall give you another Comforter. And yet again, lest we separate or divide the divine nature because of those persons and the properties of those persons, the Son says in the gospel, "I and the Father are one." ^{Joh 8.16} For when he says "one," he overthrows those who separate or rend the divine substance or nature. And when he says, "We are," and not "I am," he refutes those who confound the subsistences or persons in the Trinity. Therefore, the apostolic and catholic doctrine teaches and confesses that they are three, distinguished in properties; and of those three, there is but one and the same nature or essence — the same omnipotence, majesty, goodness, and wisdom. For although there is an order in the Trinity, there is no inequality at all. None of them is before another in time, or worthier than another in dignity. But of the three, there is one Godhead, and these three are one and eternal God.

The primitive church, truly, under the apostles and in the times that came after them, believed so simply, despising and rejecting curious questions and needless disputations. And even then, overly pestilent men arose in the church of God, speaking perverse things, whom the apostle for good cause calls "grievous wolves, not sparing the flock." ^{Act 20.29} They first brought in ¹ very strange and dangerous questions, and sharpened their blasphemous tongues against heaven itself. For they took the stance that three persons could not exist in one nature or essence; therefore, by naming the Trinity (they said), Christians worshipped many Gods, as the heathen do.

Again, since there can be but one God, they consequently infer that the same God is Father, Son, and Holy Ghost unto himself. It was thus agreeable that they should dote in folly, whom the word of God did not lead, but the gross imagination of mortal flesh. And by these means, God punished the giant-like boldness of those men, whose minds, being without any reverence and fear of God, wickedly strived to fasten the sight of the eyes of the flesh upon the very face of God. But the faithful and vigilant overseers and pastors of the churches were compelled to drive such wolves from the folds of Christ's sheep, and to valiantly fight for the sincere and catholic truth — that is, for the Unity and Trinity, for the monarchy and mystery of the dispensation. Such strife bred diverse words, with which it was necessary to hold and bind those slippery merchants.² Therefore, immediately after the beginning, these terms sprang up: Unity, Trinity, essence, substance, and person. The Greeks for the most part used ousia, hypostasis, and prosopon, which we call essence, subsistence, and person.

From these again sprang up new and fresh contentions in the churches.³ They disputed sharply about the essence and subsistence, whether they are the same or different things. For Ruffinus Aquileiensis,⁴ in the twenty-ninth chapter and first book of his ecclesiastical history, says:

"There arose a controversy about the difference between substances and subsistences, which the Greeks call ousia and hypostasis. For some said that substance and subsistence seem to be the same; and because we do not say that there are three substances in God, we should not say that there are three subsistences in him. But on the other side, those who took substance for one thing, and subsistence for another, said that substance denotes the nature of a thing and the reason on which it stands; but that the subsistence of every person shows that very thing which subsists."⁵

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

Basilius Magnus wrote a learned epistle to his brother Gregory about the difference between essence and subsistence.¹ And Hermius Sozomenus, in the twelfth chapter of his fifth book of Histories, says:

"The bishops of many cities, meeting together at Alexandria, together with Athanasius and Eusebius Vercellensis,² confirm the decrees of Nicaea, and confess that the Holy Ghost is co-essential with the Father and the Son, and name them the Trinity. They teach that the man, which God the Word took upon himself, is to be accounted perfect man, not in body only, but in soul also; even as the ancient doctors of the church also thought. But because the question about Ousia and Hypostasis troubled the churches, and there were contentions and disputations concerning the difference between them, they seem to me to have determined very wisely, that those terms should not at the first presently be used in questions about God. That is, unless a man were compelled to use them to beat down the opinion of Sabellius, lest by lack of words, he seemed to call one and the same by three names — when he should understand each one particularly, in that three-fold distinction."³

Socrates adds this in the seventh chapter and third book of his History: "But they did not bring into the church a certain new religion devised by themselves, but that which, from the beginning even till then, the ecclesiastical tradition taught, and prudent Christians evidently set forth."⁴ And so forth.

Therefore, away with the pope's champions, to the place where they are worthy. For when we teach that all points of true godliness and salvation are fully contained and taught in the canonical scriptures, by way of objection, they demand to know in what passage of scripture we find the terms Trinity, person, essence, and substance; and finally, where do we find that Christ has a reasonable soul? For although those specific words, consisting in those syllables, are not to be found in the canonical books (which were written by the prophets and apostles in another tongue, and not in Latin), yet the things, matter, or substance which those words signify, are most manifestly contained and taught in those books. All and every nation may likewise express these things in their language, and speak and pronounce them for their commodity and necessity. Away also with all sophisters, who think it is a great point of learning to make the reverend mystery of the sacred Trinity, dark and intricate with their strange, curious, and pernicious questions. It is sufficient for the godly, according to the scriptures and the apostles' creed, to simply believe and confess that there is one divine nature or essence, in which are the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Nor is it greatly material whether you call them substances, or subsistences, or persons, so long as you plainly express the distinction between them, and each one's individual properties — so confessing the unity, that you do not confound the Trinity, nor spoil the persons of their properties.

And here now, it will do very well⁵ to cite out of the scriptures evident testimonies that may evidently prove the mystery of the Trinity, with the distinction and several properties of the three persons. The Lord says in the Gospel of Matthew: "All power is given to me in heaven and on earth: go therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatever I have commanded you." ^{Mat 28.19-20}

Tertullian, alleging those words against Praxeas, says: "He last of all commanded his disciples to baptize into the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost. We are baptized not into one, nor once, but three times, at every name, into every several person." ¹ This much from Tertullian. Now as every several person is severally expressed, so the divinity of them all is singularly taught to be one and common to them all, because he bids us to baptize, not only into the name of the Father, but also of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. The apostle and elected vessel, Paul, flatly denies that any man either ought to be, or ever was, baptized into the name of any man, who is nothing but a mere man. "Were you," he says, "baptized in the name of Paul?" ^{1Cor 1.13} So then, the Father is God, the Son is God, and the Holy Ghost is God, into whose name we are baptized.

The Lord says in the Gospel of St. John: "When the Comforter comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, that is, the Spirit of truth," ^{Joh 15.26} "he will lead you into all truth. He shall not speak of himself: but whatever he hears, that he shall speak. He shall glorify me, for he shall receive of mine, and show to you. All things that the Father has are mine: therefore said I to you that he shall take of mine, and show to you." ^{Joh 16.13-15} In these words of the Lord's, you hear mention made of the person of the Father from whom the Spirit is sent, of the person of the Son who sends him, and of the person of the Holy Spirit who comes to us. You also hear of the mutual and equal communion of the divinity and all good things between the three persons. For the Holy Ghost speaks not of himself, but that which he hears. "He shall," says the Son, "take of mine." And again: "All things that the Father has are mine."

And therefore, what things the Son has, those are the Father's: and the divinity, glory, and majesty of them all is co-equal.

Two manifest testimonies of John the Baptist agree with these most evident statements. First he says: "He whom God has sent speaks the words of God; for God does not give the Spirit by measure to him. The Father loves the Son, and has given all things into his hand. He that believes on the Son has everlasting life," etc. ^{Joh 3.34} Look, here again, in the one Godhead you hear the three persons distinguished by their properties. For the Father loves and sends the Son, and gives all things into his hand; the Son is sent, and he receives all things; but the Holy Ghost is given by the Father, and received by the Son according to fulness. Then the Baptist cries out the second time, and says:

"I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode on him. And I did not know him; but He that sent me to baptize with water, said to me, Upon whomever you see the Spirit descending, and still tarrying upon him, this is He who baptizes with the Holy Ghost. And I saw, and bare record that this is the Son of God." ^{Joh 1.32-34}

Here again are shown to us, as clear as daylight, the three persons distinguished and not confounded. For He that sends John is the Father. The Holy Ghost is neither the Father, nor the Son, but appears upon the head of Christ in the likeness of a dove. And the Son is the Son, not the Father, and the Son of the Father too, on whose head the Holy Ghost stayed. And now to this place belongs the testimony of the Father, uttered from heaven upon his Son Christ. For he says: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." ^{Mat 3.17} But one and the same cannot be both father and son to himself. The Father is one, and the Son is one: and yet they are not diverse, but one and the same God, of one and the same nature. For the Son in one place most plainly says: "I and the Father are one," etc. ^{Joh 10.30}

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

Moreover, what could be more clearly spoken for the proof of the express distinction and properties of the three persons in the reverend Trinity, than where the archangel Gabriel in St. Luke, declaring the sacrament ¹ of the Lord's incarnation.

He evidently ² says the following to the virgin, the mother of God: "The Holy Ghost will come upon you, and the power of the Highest will overshadow you; therefore also, that holy one who shall be born will be called the Son of God." ^{Luk 1.35} What, I pray you, could have possibly been invented on purpose, to be more manifestly spoken for the proof of this matter, than these words of the angel? You have here the person of the Highest, that is, of the Father. For in the words of the angel, a little before, it is said: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest." ^{Luk 1.32} Now the Son is the Son of the Father. We also have the persons of the Son and of the Holy Ghost expressed, with their properties neither mingled nor confounded. The Father is not incarnate, nor the Holy Ghost, but only the Son. To the Father is born of the virgin, a Son, even he that was the Son by the eternal and unspeakable manner of begetting. But the Holy Ghost, which is the power of the Most Highest, overshadowed the virgin, and made her with child. And so, by this means you see here the persons distinguished, not divided; and how they differ in properties, not in essence of deity, or in nature.

Here now (although these places might seem to suffice any reasonable man ³) I will add yet other testimonies of the holy apostles, and the three most excellent among all the apostles. St. Peter, preaching the word of the Gospel before the church of Israel, as Luke testifies in the Acts of the Apostles, says among other things: "This Jesus God has raised up, and exalted him to his right hand; and having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he has shed forth what you now see and hear." ^{Act 2.32-33} Look, God the Father raises up and exalts the Son; the Son is raised up, exalted, and sits at the right hand of the Father; and the Son, receiving the Holy Ghost from the Father, bestows it on the apostles. Therefore, the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, subsisting in his own person, but being one and the same Spirit of them both. Moreover, in the sermon made at Caesarea in the congregation of the Gentiles, that is, in the house and family of Cornelius the centurion, the same apostle just as plainly expresses the person of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and knits the Trinity together into one essence of the divine nature. ^{Act 10}

St. Paul says in the beginning of his epistle to the Romans, that he was "appointed to preach the gospel of God, which he had promised beforehand by his prophets in the holy scriptures, about his Son; who was made of the seed of David after the flesh, and has been declared to be the Son of God with power after the Spirit that sanctifies." ^{Rom 1.1-4} Again, he says to the Galatians: "God sent his Son, made of a woman, that by adoption we might receive the right of sons. And because you are sons, God has sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." ^{Gal 4.4-6} And again, he says to Titus: "God, according to his mercy, has saved us by the fountain of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost,⁴ which he shed on us richly through Jesus Christ our Saviour." ^{Tit 3.5} Therefore, St. Cyril, speaking very truly of the apostle Paul, Libro in Joan. ix. cap. 45, says: "That holy man rightly knew the enumeration of the sacred Trinity. And therefore he teaches that every person properly and distinctly subsists; and yet he preaches openly the immutable self-sameness of the Trinity." ¹ Concerning this matter, if any man would gather together and reckon up all the testimonies that Paul has for the proof of it, he must of necessity recite all his epistles.

In his evangelical history as well as in his epistle, the blessed apostle and evangelist John, more strongly and evidently than the others, affirms and sets forth the mystery of the Trinity and the distinction of the persons. Among many, this one will be sufficient at this time. In his canonical epistle, he says: "Who is a liar but he who denies that Jesus is Christ? He is antichrist, who denies the Father and the Son. Whoever denies the Son, does not have the Father... Therefore let that abide in you which you have heard from the beginning." ^{1Joh 2.22-24}

And a little after, he says again: "You do not need that any man teach you, as the same anointing teaches you about all things, and it is true, and not lying." ^{1Joh 2.27} In these words, you hear the Father, you hear the Son, you hear the anointing, that is, the Holy Ghost. The Father is not the Son; the Son is not the Father; neither is the Holy Ghost the Father, or the Son: but the Father is the Father of the Son, the Son is the Son of the Father, and the Holy Ghost ² proceeds from them both. And yet, those persons are so joined and united, that he who denies one of them, has none of them in him. Indeed, whoever denies this Trinity is pronounced to be antichrist, for he denies God, who is one in Trinity and three in Unity. And consequently, by confounding or taking away the properties of God, he denies that God is such a one as He is indeed.

Now, I suppose that these many and so manifest testimonies will suffice the godly. For they believe the scriptures, and do not over-curiously pry into the majesty of God. They are content with those things alone in which it has pleased God of his goodness, to appear and shine to us mortal men. There are some who endeavour by certain parables or similitudes to shadow this matter; that is to say, to show how the three persons are said to be distinguished, and yet notwithstanding to be one God. But in all the things that God has made (as I admonished you in the beginning of this treatise), there is nothing which can properly be likened to the nature of God. Nor are there any words in the mouths of men that can properly be spoken about it. Nor are there any similitudes of man's invention that can rightly and squarely agree with the divine Essence. St. Basil, disputing in de Ousia et Hypostasi, says: "It cannot be that the comparisons of examples should in all points be like those things, the use of which the examples serve." ³ You may say that injury is done to the majesty of God if it is compared with mortal things. But because the holy scripture greatly condescends and tempers itself to our infirmity, I will propose a similitude, although indeed it is much unlike that which is usually taken and commonly used.

Behold the sun and the beams that come from it, and then the heat that proceeds from them both. Just as the sun is the headspring of the light and the heat, so the Father is the headspring of the Son, who is light of light. And just as the heat comes from the sun and the beams together, so the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son together. But now, imagine that the sun were such that it never had a beginning, nor will ever have an ending; I ask you, would not the beams of this everlasting sun then be everlasting too? And would not the heat, which proceeds from them both, be everlasting, as well as they? Finally, would not the sun still be one in essence or substance, and yet three by reason of the three subsistences or persons? TERTULLIAN used this parable of the sun. His words, which also contain other solitudes,¹ I will not be grieved to recite to you:

"I would not doubt to call both the stalk of a root, the brook of a spring-head, and a beam of the sun, by the name son; for every original is a parent, and everything that issues from that original is a son. Much more, then, even the Word of God may properly have the name of Son. And yet, just as the stalk is not separated from the root, nor the brook from the spring-head, nor the beam from the sun — no more is the Word separated from God. Therefore, according to the fashion of these examples, I profess to say that there are two: God and his Word, the Father and his Son. For the root and the stalk are two things, but joined in one; and the spring-head and the brook are two kinds, but undivided; and the sun and its beams are two forms, but both clinging one to the other. Everything that comes from anything must be second to that out of which it comes; and yet it is not separated from that from which it proceeds. But where a second exists, there are two; and where a third exists, there are three. For the third is the Spirit of God and of the Son; even as the third from the root is the fruit of the stalk, the third from the spring-head is the river of the brook, and the third from the sun is the heat of the beam: yet none of these is alienated from the matrix from which they take the properties that they have.

So too the Trinity, descending by annexed and linked degrees from the Father, does not work against the monarchy [or unity of the Godhead], and it defends the economical state — that is, the mystery of the dispensation. Understand that I profess this rule everywhere, in which I testify that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, are unseparated from one another — and you shall know how everything is spoken." ²

And so forth; for all these are the words of Tertullian, who flourished in Africa, not long after the age of the apostles.

But letting pass the parables, similitudes, or comparisons of man's invention, let us steadfastly believe the evident word of God. What man's capacity cannot attain to, let faith hold that fast. What the sacred scriptures declare to us, what Christ in his flesh taught us, what was confirmed by so many miracles for our sakes,³ what the Spirit of God in the true church tells us, that must be thought more true and certain than what is proved by a thousand demonstrations, or what all your senses are able to conceive. Paul denies that he would listen to an angel, if it were to speak anything contrary to the gospel of Christ. Yes, surely it is a prank of arrogant foolishness, to doubt the things that are laid out and taught with such great authority in the scriptures. But it is a greater madness if a man will not believe the oracles of God, and for no other cause than that our understanding cannot attain to the knowledge of all things, when nevertheless we know that our understanding is naturally blind and hates God.

Among philosophers, the one rejects the authority of any notable and approved writer, is considered an impudent fellow. It was enough to persuade the scholars of Pythagoras for a man to say to them, αυτος εφη "he said it." Then would a Christian dare to seek loopholes, and jangle about, asking curious questions, when it is said to him, God said it, and taught you to believe it? No man doubts the king's letters patent,⁴ if its seal is acknowledged. Therefore, what a folly it is to doubt the divine testimonies, which are so evident, and firmly sealed with the Spirit of God!

4-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF GOD AND THE TRINITY.

Therefore, that I may here recapitulate and briefly express the principal sum of our exposition, I will recite to you, dearly beloved, the words of the holy father Cyril, which are to be found in Libra in Joan. ix. cap. 30, in the following sense:

"True faith is in God the Father, and in the Son, not simply, but incarnate, and in the Holy Ghost. For the holy and consubstantial Trinity is distinguished by the differences of names, that is, by the properties of the persons. For the Father is the Father, and not the Son: and the Son is the Son, and not the Father: and the Holy Ghost is the Holy Spirit proper to the Father and the Son. For the substance of the Deity is all one, or the same. Therefore we preach not three, but one God. Therefore we must believe in God; but distinctly and more fully expounding our faith, we must so believe, that we may refer the same glorification to every person. For there is no difference of faith. We should not have a greater faith in the Father than in the Son, and in the Holy Ghost; but the measure and manner of it must be one and the same, equally consisting in each of the three persons, so that by this means we may confess the unity of nature in the trinity of persons. This faith must be firmly grounded in our minds, which faith is in the Father, and in the Son, (and the Son, I say, even after he was made man), and in the Holy Ghost." ¹

Now, all these points shall be thoroughly confirmed with fuller testimonies, once we come to prove the divinity of the Son of God, and of the Holy Ghost; which I mean to reserve till a convenient time.

But let no ² man think that this belief of the unity and trinity of the Godhead was either invented by the fathers or bishops of the churches, or first of all preached by the apostles immediately upon Christ's death and ascension. For all the holy patriarchs, prophets, and elect people of God, even from the beginning of the world, believed and grounded their faith in this same way that I have declared to you up to here. Although I do not deny that the mystery of the Trinity was more clearly expounded to the world by Christ, yet it is evident by some undoubted testimonies (which I will add shortly), that the mystery of the Trinity was very well known to the patriarchs and the prophets. But first, I will admonish you by the way, that the holy patriarchs and prophets of God held themselves content with the bare revelation and word of God, not raising curious questions about the unity and trinity of God. They clearly understood that there is one God, the Father of all, the only Saviour and author of all goodness; and that without or beside him there is no other God at all. And they again evidently saw that the Son of God, that promised Seed, has all things in common with the Father. For they most plainly heard that he is called the Saviour, and is the Redeemer, from whom all good things proceed and are bestowed upon the faithful.

By this it was now easy for them to gather that the Father and the Son are one God, although they differ in properties. For insomuch as they were assuredly certain that the damnable doctrine of the plurality of gods sprung from the devil, they did not worship many, but only one God, whom notwithstanding they believed to consist of a trinity of persons. For Moses, the undoubted servant of God, in the very first verse of his first book says: "In the beginning (creavit Dii) God created heaven and earth." He joins here a verb of the singular number to a noun of the plural number, not to make incongruity of speech, but to note the mystery of the Trinity. For the sense is as if he had said, That God which consists of three persons created heaven and earth. For a little after, consulting with himself about the making of man, God says, "Let us make in our image." Look, here he says, "Let us make," and not, "Let me make," or, "I will make." And again he says, "In our image," and not, "In my image." But lest any man think that this consultation was had with the angels, let him hear what God himself says in Isaiah: "I the Lord," he says, "make all things, and stretch out the heavens alone of myself," (that is, of my own power, without any help or fellow with me) "and set the earth fast." ^{Isa 44.24} Therefore, the Father consulted with the Son, by whom also he created the world. And again, lest any man think (as the Jews object) that these things were according to the order and custom of men, spoken by God in the plural number for honour's sake and worship,¹ you may hear what follows in the end of the third chapter: "Behold, this man has become as one of us, in knowing good and evil." Now here, by enallage ² he puts these words, "has become," for "shall become," or, "shall happen:" so that his meaning is as if he had said, "Behold, the same will happen to Adam that will come to one of us," that is, to the Son; namely: that he would have a trial of good and evil; that is, he would feel sundry fortunes — namely sickness, calamities, and death — and (as the proverb says) feel both sweet and sour; for that is the lot or condition of man.

But the Son being incarnate for us, not the Father nor the Holy Ghost, was found in shape as a man, and had a trial of sundry fortunes and of death. This was foretold to Adam, as it is manifest, for consolation's sake, and not in the way of mocking. For the good Lord with a garment, strengthened the body of our first parent ³ against the unseasonableness of the air, when for Adam's sin God purposed to banish him out of paradise; so he comforted and cheered up his sorrowful mind with a full example of the Son's incarnation and suffering. And when he had so armed him in body and soul, he casts him out of the garden of felicity, into a careful and miserable exile.

There are in every place, many examples of this matter like this. For Abraham saw three; but with those three, he talked as with one, and he worshipped one. ^{Gen 18} And "The Lord rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven, and overthrew those cities." ^{Gen 19.24} But lest any man interpret it and say, The Lord rained from the Lord, that is, from heaven; he presently adds, "From heaven." For as the Father created all things by the Son, so he preserves all things by him, and even still, works all things by him.

Next after Moses, the most notable prophet, David, says in his Psalm: "By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the hosts of them by the breath of his mouth." ^{Psa 33.6} So here you hear that there is one Lord, in whom is the Word and the Spirit, both distinguished but not separated. For the Lord made the heavens, but by the "Word; and the whole furniture of heaven stands by the breath of the mouth of the Lord. The same David says: "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit on my right hand, until I make your enemies your footstool." ^{Psa 110.1} Note that in another place, David flatly says that beside the Lord there is no other. And yet here again he just as plainly says, "The Lord said to my Lord;" meaning the Father, who had placed the Son, who was David's Lord, at His right hand in heaven.

Out of Isaiah may be gathered very many testimonies. But the most notable of all is that which Matthew the apostle cites in these words: "Behold, my Son whom I have chosen; my beloved, in whom my soul is pleased: I will put my Spirit upon him," etc. ^{Isa 42.1} With this agrees that which Luke cites,^{4.18} saying: "The Spirit of the Lord upon me, because he has anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; He has he sent me," etc. ^{Isa 61.1} In these testimonies here, you have the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. A few out of many; for I do not wish to turn over the entire scriptures of the old Testament.

³ protoplastorum, Lat.; parents.

So then, this faith with which we believe in God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, we have received from God himself, being delivered to us by the prophets and patriarchs, but most evidently of all, declared by the Son of God himself, our Lord Jesus Christ, and his holy apostles. From this we now easily gather why it is that all the sincere bishops or ministers of the churches, together with the whole church of Christ, have ever since the apostles' time, maintained and held this faith in honour, with so firm a consent. It would be truly a detestable impiety to leave this catholic and true rule of faith, and to choose and follow one newly invented. There are extant even today, most godly and learned books of ecclesiastical writers, in which they have declared and defended this catholic faith by the holy scriptures, against all wicked and blasphemous heretics. There are extant sundry symbols of faith, but all tending to one end, set forth and published in many synodal assemblies of bishops and fathers. There is extant today, that creed commonly called the Apostles' Creed, learned and repeated by the universal Church and all its members, both learned and unlearned, and by every sex and age. In it, we profess nothing else than what we have declared up to here: namely, that we believe in one God — the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. And because this consent of all the saints concerning this true faith has been so sure and firm ever since the beginning of the world, it was very well and godly provided by ancient kings and princes, that no man should once dare be so bold as to either call into doubt, or with curious questions and disputations, to deface or make intricate, this belief concerning the unity and trinity of the almighty God. ¹

Of old among the Israelites, the man was struck through and slain, who passed beyond the limited bounds that the Lord had set. And we also have certain appointed bounds about the knowledge of God; to pass them is hurtful to us; indeed, it is punished with assured death.

God grant that we may truly know, and religiously worship, the high, excellent, and mighty God, even so, and even such, as He himself is. For up to here I have, as simply, sincerely, and briefly as I could, discoursed about the ways and means to know God, who is one in substance, and three in persons. And yet we acknowledge and freely confess, that in this entire treatise up to here, there is nothing spoken that is worthy of or comparable to His unspeakable majesty. For the eternal, excellent, and mighty God is greater than all majesty, and than all the eloquence of all men; so far am I from thinking that by my words I, in one jot, come near to his excellency. But I humbly beseech the most merciful Lord, that he will grant of his inestimable goodness and liberality, to enlighten in us all the understanding of our minds with sufficient knowledge of his name, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

4-4. THE FOURTH SERMON: OF GOD AS CREATOR & GOVERNOR.

THAT GOD IS THE CREATOR OF ALL THINGS, AND GOVERNS ALL THINGS BY HIS PROVIDENCE:
WHERE MENTION IS ALSO MADE OF THE GOODWILL OF GOD TOWARD US, AND OF PREDESTINATION.

DEARLY beloved, it now remains for me in this day's sermon, to briefly add for a conclusion to what I have said up to here concerning God, something about that creation or work of God, by which, being the maker of all things, he has to mankind's commodity, wholesomely created all things, both visible and invisible, and now as always most wisely governs and orders them.

For by doing this, we will obtain no small knowledge of God; and many things will be more openly laid out for us, which we but touched in our last treatise. In searching out, considering, and setting forth the creation of the whole and its parts, all the diligence of all wise men ¹ has been set to work, and labours, and will be troubled so long as this world endures. For even if he were the wisest, most cunning, and most diligent writer of natural history, who does not leave many things untouched for the posterity to labour in, and to beat their brains about? Or who is he today, even if he uses the aid and industry of the most learned writers, that is not compelled to wonder at more and greater things than they ever could, or he ever will, attain for you? The most wise Lord will always have witty men who are enriched with heavenly gifts, to always be occupied and evermore exercised in searching out and setting forth the secrets of nature and of the creation. But we simply conceive by faith, that the worlds were made by God through the Word of God, out of nothing, with no heap of matter; and that it persists by the power of the Holy Ghost, or Spirit of God. For so king David, and Paul, the teacher of the Gentiles, both believed and taught. But even though the order of the whole, and the manner of the creation, cannot be knit up or declared in few words, yet I will endeavour to utter something by which the sum of things may partly appear to the diligent considerer.

And here I choose to use another man's words rather than my own; especially because I suppose this matter cannot be expressed more lively than Tertullian sets it forth in his book De Trinitate, as follows:

"God has hung up heaven in a lofty height; he has made the earth massive, with a low and pressed-down weight; he has poured out the seas with a loose and thin liquor; and has planted all these, being decked and full with their proper and fit instruments.

For in the firmament of heaven he has stirred up the dawn risings of the sun; he has filled the circle of the glittering moon for the comfort of the night, with monthly increasings of the world; and he enlightens the beams of the stars with sundry gleams of twinkling light; and he would that all these should by appointed courses go about the compass of the world, to make for mankind days, months, years, signs, times, and commodities.

In the earth also, he has lifted high hills aloft, depressed the valleys below, laid the fields out evenly, and profitably ordained flocks of beasts for sundry services and uses of men. He has made the massive oaks of the woods for the benefit of man; he has brought forth fruits to feed them with; ² he has unlocked the mouths of springs, and poured them into running rivers. After all of these necessary commodities, because he would also procure something for the delight of the eyes, he clad them all with sundry colours of goodly flowers, to the pleasure and delight of those who beheld them.

² So ed. 1584 also: but ed. 1577 has, fruit to feed him.

4-4. THE FOURTH SERMON: OF GOD AS CREATOR & GOVERNOR.

In the sea also, although it was very wonderful for the greatness and profit of it, he framed many sorts of living creatures — some of a mean, and some of a monstrous bigness. By the variety of the workmanship, these give special notes of the workman's wit. And yet, not being content with this, lest the rage and course of the waters should, with the damage of the earth's inhabitants, break out and occupy another element, he closed up the water's limits within the shores. Thereby, when the raging waves and foaming water rose up from the depth and channel, the sea might turn into itself again, and not pass beyond the bounds appointed, keeping still the prescribed course; to the end also that man might be that much more ready to keep God's laws, when he perceived that even the very elements observe and keep them. Last of all, God sets man to be lord over the world — the one he made in the likeness and image of God; the one to whom he gave reason, wit, and wisdom, that he might imitate God; the one whose body, although it was made of earth, was yet notwithstanding inspired with the substance of the heavenly breath and Spirit of God; the one to whom, when he had put all things in subjection, He would have him alone be free, without subjection.

And lest that liberty, being let loose at random, might come into peril again, God gave a commandment by means of which it could not be said that evil was out of hand, or was later present in the fruit, but should be in it, once He perceived in the will of man the contempt of that commandment. For he ought to be free, lest the image of God seem bound indecently; and also a law was to be given, lest at any time that unbridled liberty should break out to the contempt of Him who gave the liberty. This was so that man might consequently receive either due rewards of obedience, or merits of punishment for disobedience, having it given to him, which part he was willing to incline toward by the motion of the mind. By this, the envy of mortality returns to him who might have escaped it by obedience; yet he ran headlong into it, as he made too much haste to become a god," etc.

He adds:

"In the parts above the firmament which are not now to be beheld by our mortal eyes, at first there were ordained angels; then there were ordained spiritual virtues; then there were placed thrones and powers, and many other unmeasurable spaces of the heavens; and many works of holy things were created there," etc. ¹ This much from Tertullian.

Now the sum of it all is this: God by his power created heaven, earth, and the sea, out of nothing; he immediately adorned and enriched them with all kinds of good things. And into this world, which takes the name of furniture for what is in it, as in a most sumptuous palace well-furnished with all sorts of excellent necessities, it pleased God to bring man, to whom he put all things in subjection. David sets it forth in Psalm 8 with wondering and marvelling, where he says:

"Lord, our governor, how excellent is your name in the whole world! For your glory is lifted up above the heavens. Out of the mouths of very babes and sucklings you have ordained strength, because of your enemies; that you may destroy the enemy and the avenger. For I will consider the heavens, even the works of your fingers; the moon and the stars, which you have ordained. What is man, that you are so mindful of him; or the son of man, that you take care over him? You made him somewhat lower than the angels [or, than God]; you crown him with glory and honour, you made him to have dominion over the works of your hands. You have put all things in subjection under his feet; sheep and oxen, and the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea, which walk through the paths of the sea. O Lord, our governor, how excellent is your name in the whole world!"

Again, in another place he says: "The heavens are yours, God, and the earth is yours; you have laid the foundation of the round world, and all that is in it." ^{Psa 89.11} "The day is yours, and the night is yours; you have ordained the lights and the sun: you laid all the borders of the earth; you have made both summer and winter." ^{Psa 74.16-17} Now, who is so much of a sot that he does not easily gather by these proofs, how great our God is; how great the power of God is; how good, rich, and liberal our God is to man, who never deserved any such thing from His hand? He has created for man alone, such great riches, such exquisite delights, and such furniture, that it cannot be sufficiently praised, and has made them all subject to him, and would have them all obey man, as their lord and master.

But here, by the way, in the creation of the world, we have to consider the preservation and government of the whole, by the same God. For the world neither stands and endures by any power of its own, nor do those things move and stir of their own accord, or (as we say) "happen," however moved or stirred. For the Lord in the gospel says: "My Father works up to now, and I work." And Paul says: "God by his Son has made the worlds, and does rule and uphold them with the word of his power." And again: "By God we live, and move, and have our being." And again: "God left not himself without witness, in that he showed his benefits from heaven, giving us rain and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness." And Theodoret, in De Providentia, says: "It is a most absurd thing to say, that God has created all things, but that he has no care of the things which he has made; and that his creature, like a boat destitute of a steersman, is tossed to and fro with contrary winds, and knocked and cracked upon shelves and rocks." ¹

Therefore, in this place we have to say something about God's providence and government, which all the wicked, together with the Epicures, deny today, saying in their hearts: "Is it likely, that He that dwells in heaven should regard the things on earth? And does the Almighty observe and mark the very smallest of words and works? He has given to all creatures a certain inclination and nature, which he has made their own; and so He leaves them now in the hand of their own counsel, that they may of their own nature, move, increase, perish, and do even what they lust. Tosh, God neither knows, nor does He greatly trouble himself about these toys." Thus the wicked reason very wickedly. But the scripture expressly pronounces and proves in many places, that by his providence, God cares for and regards the state of mortal men, and of all the things that he has made for the use of mortal men. And therefore, here it is profitable and necessary to cite some testimonies out of the holy scriptures for the proof of this argument.

David in his Psalms says: "The Lord shall reign forever, and his kingdom is a kingdom of all ages, and his dominion from generation to generation." ² Look, the kingdom of God (he says) is a kingdom of all ages, and his dominion throughout all generations. Therefore, God has not only created the world and all things that are in the world, but He also governs and preserves them today, and shall govern and preserve them even till the end. For the same kingly prophet, celebrating the providence of God about man and his estate, says: "You, Lord, know my sitting down and my rising up; you spy out all my ways. For there is not a word on my tongue, but that you, O Lord, know it altogether. You have fashioned me behind and before, and laid your hand upon me;" ^{Psa 139.2-5} and so forth, as follows in the hundred thirty-ninth psalm, which wholly serves this purpose. The testimony of Solomon agrees with this doctrine of David, where he says: "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord; like with the rivers of water, he may turn it wherever he wills. Every man's way seems right in his own eyes; but the Lord drives, or rules, the heart." Pro 21.1-2

And in the gospel, the Lord said: "Are not two little sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not light on the ground without your Father. Yes, even all the hairs of your head are numbered." Mat 10.28

Besides these, there are other evident testimonies of the providence of God. Daniel, the wisest man of all the east, and the most excellent prophet of God, says this: "Wisdom and strength are the Lord's. It is he that changes the times and seasons; he takes away kings, and sets up kings; he gives wisdom to the wise, and understanding to those who understand; he reveals the deep and secret things; he knows the thing that lies in darkness; for the light dwells in Him." Dan 2.20-22 Moreover, Ethan the Ezrachite says: "You, Lord, rule the raging of the sea; you still its waves when they arise. You have an almighty arm; you strengthen your hand, and set up your right hand. In justice and equity your royal throne is established; goodness and faith go before your face." Psa 89.9-14 And David says: "With the fruit of your works, God, shall the earth be filled. And He brings forth grass for cattle, and herb for the use of man; and bread to strengthen the heart of man, and wine to make him merry." Psa 104.13-15 And immediately after in the same psalm: "All things wait upon you, that you may give them their food in due season. When you give it, they gather it; and when you open your hand, they are filled with good. If you hide your face, they are troubled; and if you take away their breath, they die, and are turned into their dust." Psa 104.27-29 Again: "The Lord upholds all those who fall, and lifts up all those who are down. The Lord looses men from their fetters; the Lord gives sight to the blind. The Lord keeps the stranger; he defends the fatherless and widow; and the way of the wicked he turns upside down." ¹

"Great is our Lord, and great is his power; and of his wisdom there is no end. He tells the number of the stars, and calls them all by their names. He covers the heavens with clouds, and prepares rain for the earth. He gives fodder to the cattle, and meat to the young ravens that call upon him. He gives snow like wool, and scatters the hoar frost like ashes. He tosses his ice like morsels: who shall abide before the face of his cold? He shall send out his word, and melt them; he shall blow with his wind, and the waters shall flow." Psa 147.4-18

And again: "I know that the Lord is great; and that he is above all gods. What pleased him, that has he done in heaven and earth, and in the sea, and in all deep places. He lifts up the clouds from the ends of the world, and turns lightning unto rain, and brings the winds out of their treasuries." Psa 135.5-7 There are many testimonies like these to be seen in the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth chapters of the book of Job; and frequently in the Psalms, and in the books of the holy prophets. But these that I have recited up to here are sufficient enough, testifying abundantly that, by his providence, God governs this world and all things that are in it, and especially man himself, the possessor of the world, for whom all things were made.

We attribute nothing here to destiny, either stoical or astrological; nor do we have anything to do with that ethnic fortune,² either good or ill. We utterly detest philosophical disputations in this case, which are contrary to the truth of the prophets' writings and the doctrine of the apostles. We content ourselves in the only word of God; and therefore we simply believe and teach that God governs all things by his providence, and that too is according to his own good will, just judgment, and decent order, by means that are most just and equal. This means that whoever despises, and makes his boast only on the bare name of God's providence, it cannot be that he rightly understands the effect of God's providence. They make this objection: "Because all things in the world are done by God's providence, therefore we need not put our oar [in the water]. We may snort idly and take our ease. It is sufficient for us to expect the working or impelling of God; for if he needs our aid, then whether we will or not, he will impel us to the work which he would have wrought by us." ¹ But the saints in the scripture are laid before us and shown to have thought, spoken, and judged more sincerely of God's providence. The angel in express words says to Lot: "Hasten to Zoar, and save yourself there: for I can do nothing until you have come there." ^{Gen 19.22}

Look, Lot with his are saved here by God's providence; the citizens of Sodom are destroyed, and all the cities thereabout. And yet, even in the very work of his preservation, Lot's labour is required, and he is bid to do his good-will to save himself. Indeed, "I cannot," says the Lord, "do anything till you have come into Zoar." The king and prophet David plainly says, "I have hoped in you, O Lord; I have said, you are my God: my days are in your hand." ^{Psa 31.14-15} And yet even he, who wholly took himself to the providence of God, earnestly considered with himself, how with his diligence and industry he might deceive and escape from Saul, his father-in-law, who laid in wait for him. Nor does he despise the aid and shifts ² of his wife Michal. He does not reply back to her and say, "All things are done by the providence of God; therefore no wiles need to be wrought. The Almighty is able to take me out of the hands of our father's soldiers, or otherwise save me by some miraculous means. Let us content ourselves, and allow God to work his will in us." He did not argue thus; but understood that, just as God's providence proceeds in a certain order by middle (secondary) means, so it is his part to apply himself to means, in the fear of God, and by all assays ³ to do his best for his own defence.⁴ St. Paul hears the Lord flatly saying: "As you have borne witness of me at Jerusalem, so must you bear record of me at Rome." Although he did not doubt the truth of God's promises, and was not ignorant of the power of God's providence; yet notwithstanding, he secretly sent his sister's son — who had told him that the Jews had conspired to kill him — to the tribune, to ask of him that Paul might not be brought out at the Jews' request. Nor did he show himself discourteous or unthankful to the soldiers who carried him to Antipatridis, nor to the horsemen who went with him to Caesarea. Again, as he sailed in the Adriatic Sea, when he was in peril of dangerous shipwreck, and all his company were struck with fear, he said: "Sirs, I exhort you to be of good cheer; for there shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but only of the ship.

For there stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am and whom I serve, saying, Fear not, Paul: you must be brought before Caesar; and behold, God has given you all those who sail with you. Therefore, sirs, be of good cheer; for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told to me." ^{Act 27.22-24} But a while after, when the mariners were about to abandon the ship, Paul said to the centurion and the soldiers: "Unless these men stay in the ship, you cannot be saved." ^{Act 27.31}

Therefore, means belong to the providence of God, by which he works; and therefore they are not to be neglected. Truly, it is by God's government or providence, that we have all these impressions of whatever sort, either fiery, or airy, or watery.⁵ For by the power of God, and not by any power of their own,¹ the air makes the earth fruitful, the water flows and ebbs again, and the earth brings forth her increase. And the saints think truly, that none of all this is done for any sake of theirs,² because the Saviour himself says in the gospel, "The Father sends rain upon the just and unjust." Mat 5.45 Yet, for all that, they never forget the words of the prophet, where he says, "If you are willing and obedient, you shall eat the good of the land: but if you are obstinate and rebellious, you shall be devoured with the sword: for the mouth of the Lord has spoken it." Isa 1.19-20 For the great prophet Moses had said, long before Isaiah: "If you hearken diligently to the voice of the Lord your God, to observe and do all his commandments, all these blessings shall come upon you. You shall be blessed in the city, and blessed in the field. Blessed shall be the fruit of your body, and blessed shall be the fruit of the ground. The Lord shall open heaven to you, and give rain to your land in due season. But if you will not hearken to the voice of the Lord your God, to observe and do his commandments, then all these curses shall come upon you. You shall be Cursed in the city, and cursed in the field. The heaven above your head shall be brass; and the Lord shall strike you with many plagues," etc. And histories bear record that all these things happened to the people of God, even as they are foretold here; and that too, was not without the providence of the Lord their God.

All good successes and prosperity are the good blessings of God; and on the other side, all calamities and adversities are the curses of God. Therefore, the saints gather from this, that men's affairs and estate are wholly governed by God's providence. Yet, they must not therefore sit idly (as we say) with their hands in their bosoms, and neglect good means. Rather, they should watchfully and diligently walk by the grace of God in the ways and means, or in the precepts and ordinances, of the Lord. For the providence of God does not disturb the order of things; it does not abrogate the offices of life, nor our labour and industry; it does not take [away] a just dispensation and obedience. But by these things, it works the health of those men who, through the help of God, religiously apply themselves to the decrees, purpose, or working of the Lord. They rightly ascribe to these whatever good happens to them; imputing to man's corruption, to our own unskilfulness, and to our sins, whatever evil happens to us. Therefore, the saints acknowledge that, by God's providence, wars, plagues, and diverse other calamities afflict mortal men; yet notwithstanding, the causes of these arise from nothing else than the sins of man. For God is good, who wishes us good rather than evil. Indeed, oftentimes of his goodness, he turns our evil purposes to good ends, as seen by the history of Joseph in the book of Genesis. Gen 50.20

Truly, upon the earnest consideration of God's providence, all the godly sort gather that their good God wishes all to be well to man. For he has a great care over us, not only in great things, but also in the smallest. He knows the number of the days of our life. In his sight are all our members, within as well as without. For the Lord in the gospel says, that "all the hairs of our head are numbered." Mat 10.30 By his providence He defends us from all manner of diseases and imminent perils. He feeds, refreshes, and preserves us. For just as he made all creatures for man's health and benefit, so he preserves and applies them to man's good and commodity.

The doctrine of the FOREKNOWLEDGE and PREDESTINATION of God, which has a certain likeness to his providence, no less comforts the godly worshippers of God. They call foreknowledge that knowledge in God, by which he knows all things before they come to pass, and sees even present all things that are, have been, and shall be. For to the knowledge of God, all things are present; nothing is past, nothing is to come. And the predestination of God is the eternal decree of God, by which he has ordained either to save or destroy men — a most certain end of life and death being appointed for them. Thus it is elsewhere called a fore-appointment. Touching these points, some have diversely disputed, and many truly, have disputed curiously and contentiously enough. In such disputes, surely, not only the salvation of souls, but also the glory of God is endangered with the simple sort. The religious searchers or interpreters of the scriptures confess that here nothing is to be permitted to man's wit; but that we must simply and wholly hang on whatever the scripture has pronounced.¹ And therefore, these words of St. Paul are continually before their eyes and in their minds: "the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable (or incomprehensible) are his judgments, and his ways past finding out! For who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who was his counsellor? Or who has given to him first, and he shall be recompensed?" Rom 11.33-35 They never forget the admonition of the most wise man, Jesus Sirach,² saying: "Do not seek the things that are too hard for you; nor search after things which are too mighty for you: but what God has commanded you, always think thereupon that, and do not be too curious in many of his works; for it is not needful for you to see with your eyes the things that are secret." Wis 3.22-23 In the meantime, truly, they do not contemn or neglect those things which it has pleased God by the open scriptures to reveal to his servants touching this matter.

There are many testimonies of God's foreknowledge, especially in the prophecy of Isaiah, chap. forty-one, and in the chapters following, by which the Lord declares that he is the true God.

Furthermore, by his eternal and unchangeable counsel, God has fore-appointed who are ³ to be saved, and who are to be condemned. Now, the end or the decree of life and death is short and manifest to all the godly. The end of predestination, or fore-appointment, is Christ, the Son of God the Father. For God has ordained and decreed to save all, however many have communion and fellowship with Christ, his only-begotten Son; and to destroy or condemn all, however many have no part in the communion or fellowship of Christ, his only Son. Now, the faithful truly have fellowship with Christ, and the unfaithful are strangers from Christ. For Paul says in his Epistle to the Ephesians: "God has chosen us in Christ, before the foundations of the world were laid, that we should be holy and without blame before him through love. He has predestined us into his adopted sons through Jesus Christ into himself, according to the good pleasure of his will; that the glory of his grace may be praised, with which he is pleased with us ⁴ in his beloved." Eph 1.4-6 Look, God has chosen us; and he has chosen us before the foundations of the world were laid; indeed, he has chosen us that we should be without blame, that is, to be heirs of eternal life: yet, in Christ — he has chosen us by and through Christ. ⁵ And yet again, even plainer: he has "predestined us," he says, "to adopt us into his sons," but by Christ; and that too he has done freely, with the intent that glory might be given to his divine grace. Therefore, whoever are in Christ are chosen and elected. For John the apostle says: "Whoever has the Son has life; whoever does not have the Son of God, does not have life." 1Joh 5.12 The doctrine of the apostles agrees with that of the gospel also. For in the gospel the Lord says: "This is the will of him that sent me, the Father; that everyone who sees the Son, and believes in him, should have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." Joh 6.40

Look, this is the will or eternal decree of God, he says: that we should be saved by faith in the Son. Again, on the contrary, touching those who are predestined to death, the Lord says: "He that does not believe is condemned already, because he has not believed in the name of the only-begotten Son of God. And this is the condemnation: that light is come into the world, and men have loved darkness more than light." ^{Joh 3.18-19} Therefore, if you ask me whether you are elected to life, or predestined to death; that is, whether you are of the number of those who are to be damned, or of those who are to be saved; I answer simply out of the scripture, both from the evangelists and the apostles: If you have communion or fellowship with Christ, then you are predestined to life, and you are of the number of the elect and chosen. But if you are a stranger from Christ, however otherwise you seem to flourish in virtues, you are predestined to death, and foreknown, as they say, to damnation. I will not creep higher and deeper into the seat of God's counsel. And here I repeat again the former testimonies of scripture: "God has predestined us, to adopt us into his sons through Jesus Christ. This is the will of God, that whoever believes in the Son should live; and whoever does not believe should die." Faith, therefore, is a most assured sign that you are elected; and while you are called to the communion of Christ, and are taught faith, the most loving God declares his election and good-will towards you.

The simpler sort, truly, are greatly tempted and exceedingly troubled with the question of election. For the devil sets about putting the hate of God into their minds, as though he envied us our salvation, and God had appointed and ordained us to death. That he may more easily persuade us of this, the devil labours tooth and nail to wickedly enfeeble and overthrow our faith; as though our salvation were doubtful. His labours lean upon and are stayed upon the uncertainty of our election by God. Against these fiery weapons, the servants of God arm their hearts with thoughts and comforts of this sort, fetched out of the scripture:

God's predestination is not stayed or stirred with any worthiness or unworthiness of ours, but it respects Christ alone, of the mere grace and mercy of God the Father. And because our salvation stays only upon him, it cannot help but be most certain. For those are wrong, who think that the ones saved to life are predestined by God for their merit's sake, or good works, which God foresaw in them. For the apostle Paul says notably: "He has chosen us in Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, that the glory of his grace might be praised." ^{Eph 1.4-6} And again: "It is not in him that wills, nor in him that runs, but in God who shows mercy." ^{Rom 9.16} Again: "God has saved us, and called us with a holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace, which was given to us through Christ Jesus before the world existed, but is now made manifest by the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ." ^{2Tim 1.9,16} Freely, therefore, of his mere mercy, not for our deserts but for Christ's sake, and only in Christ, has He chosen us, and for Christ's sake He embraces us, because he is our Father and a lover of men. The prophet David also speaks of this: "The Lord is full of compassion and mercy, slow to anger, and of great kindness... As a father has compassion on his children, so the Lord has compassion on those who fear him: for he knows what we are made of, and He remembers that we are but dust." ^{Psa 103.8, 13-14}

Moreover, in the prophet Isaiah we read: "Can a woman forget her child, and not have compassion on the son of her womb? Though she may forget, yet I will not forget you." ^{Isa 49.15} Truly, in Christ, the only-begotten Son of God exhibited to us, God the Father has declared what great store he sets by us. From this, the apostle gathers: "He who did not spare his Son, but gave him for us all, how can it be that he should not also with him give us all things?" What thing, therefore, should we not count on and promise ourselves from so beneficial a Father? For you can not complain that he will not give you his Son, or that he is not yours, who, as the apostle says, was given for us all.

Moreover, the Lord himself says, crying out in the gospel: "Come to me, all you that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you." ^{Mat 11.28} And again to his disciples: "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to every creature. He that believes, and is baptized, shall be saved." ^{Mar 16.15-16}

Whereupon Paul also says: "God our Saviour wills that all men shall be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth." ^{1Tim 2.4} In olden times, long ago, it was said to Abraham: "In your Seed all the tribes (or nations) of the earth shall be blessed." ^{Gen 22.18} And Joel says: "And it shall be, that whoever calls upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." ^{Joe 2.32} Peter also repeated this in the Acts, chapter 2; and Paul to the Romans, chapter 10. Isaiah also says: "We have all gone astray like sheep; we have turned every one to his own way: and the Lord has laid upon him the iniquities of us all." ^{Isa 53.6} And therefore St. Paul dares to say: "As by the offence of one the fault came on all men to condemnation; even so also by the justification of one, the benefit abounded ¹ towards all men, to the justification of life." ^{Rom 5.18} Therefore, the Lord is read in the gospel to have received sinners and publicans with outstretched arms and embracings, adding these words, moreover: "I came to seek that which was lost. Neither did I come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." ^{Luk 19.10}

All these sayings belong to this: that being more narrowly weighed, they might confirm and establish us concerning God's good-will towards us, who in Christ has chosen us to salvation. This salvation, truly, cannot help but be most certain, and by all means undoubted, especially since the Lord himself says in the gospel: "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give them eternal life; and they shall never perish, nor shall anyone pluck them out of my hand," etc. ^{Joh 10.27-28}

Here again, I know what stings and grieves the minds of many. They say, "The chosen sheep of Christ know Christ's voice; and being endued with a steadfast faith, they inseparably stick in Christ, since they have felt that drawing of which the Lord speaks in the gospel. 'No man comes to me, unless my Father draws him.' ^{Joh 6.44} As for me, I feel no such drawing, so I do not stick in the Son of God with a full and perfect faith." First of all, true faith is required of the elect: for the elect are called; and being called, they receive their calling by faith, and frame themselves like him that called them. "He that does not believe is already condemned." ^{Joh 3.18}

Whereupon also Paul says: "God is the Saviour of all men, especially of the faithful." ^{1Tim 4.10} Furthermore, unless we are drawn by the heavenly Father, we cannot believe. And we must be very careful lest, conceiving vain opinions of that divine drawing, we neglect the drawing itself. God truly drew Paul violently, but he does not draw all to him by the hair. There are also other ways by which God draws man to himself; but he does not draw him like stock or a block. The apostle Paul says: "Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." ^{Rom 10.17} God therefore draws you, then, when he preaches the gospel to you by his servants; when he touches your heart; when he stirs you to prayer, by which you may call out and cry for his grace and assistance, his enlightening and drawing. When you feel these things in your mind, I would not wish you to look for another drawing. Do not despise the grace offered, but use it while present time serves, and pray for the increase of grace. For you aspire in a godly way to greater and more perfect things afterwards; in the meantime, there is no reason why you should despise the lesser. In the gospel of St. Matthew, 25.14f, those receive larger riches who, having received but a few talents, invested them faithfully. But the one who despised the talent which he was credited, and cloaked his slothfulness with I know not what care, is greatly accused. Indeed, he is relieved of the money which had been given to him, and is thrown into everlasting torments, being bound with bonds of condemnation. For the Lord pronounces generally: "Whoever has, to him shall be given, and he shall have abundance; but whoever does not have, from him shall be taken away even what he has." The one who has, is the one who acknowledges, magnifies, and reverences the grace of God; to this heap of graces, more is added, so that it is made more abundant. The one who does not have, is the one who does not acknowledge the gifts of God, and imagines others, I cannot tell of what kind. Meanwhile, he does not put to use the grace he received, and which is present. Such men are prone to use excuses: that God's drawing has not yet come to them; and that it is a very dangerous matter to invest or "make merchandise of" the gifts of God.

But St. Paul, judging far otherwise, says: "So we as workers together beseech you, that you not receive the grace of God in vain." ^{2Cor 6.1} And to Timothy: "I put you in remembrance, so that you stir up the gift of God which is in you." ^{2Tim 1.6} Not that without God we are able to do anything of ourselves, but that the Lord requires our endeavour which, notwithstanding, is not without his assistance and grace. For truly, the same apostle says: "God works in us both to will and to do his good pleasure." ^{Phi 2.13} Again: "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves, to think anything of ourselves; but all our sufficiency is of God." ^{2Cor 3.5}

Furthermore, I do not wish any man to despair if, by and by, he does not feel and experience in his mind, a most ripe and perfect faith. The gospel says: "Of her own accord, the earth brings forth fruit; first the blade, then the ear, and afterwards full corn in the ear." ^{Mar 4.28} For so likewise, faith has her increasings. And therefore, the apostles of the Lord prayed: "Lord, increase our faith." ^{Luk 17.5} Furthermore, in Mark a truly woeful man cries out to our Saviour: "If you can do anything, Lord, have compassion on us, and help us." But he heard the Lord immediately saying to him: "If you can believe it, all things are possible for him that believes." And this silly soul cried out: "I believe, Lord; help my unbelief." ^{Mark 9.22f} Look, this woeful wretch believed, feeling in his mind faith given to him by God, which notwithstanding, he perceived to be so weak that he stood in need of God's help and aid. He therefore prays, "help my unbelief," that is, help my faith which, if it is compared with an absolute and perfect faith, may seem like unbelief. But hear, I beseech you, what this faith, however little it was, wrought and brought to pass — what a humble mind was able to do, hanging only on the mercy of God. For immediately, Christ healed the child of the woeful father; and being restored to health, and raised up from the dead as it were, gives him back to his faithful father. If anyone therefore feels faith in his mind, let him not despair, even though he knows, and God knows, that it is weak and feeble. Let him cast himself wholly upon God's mercy; let him presume very little of his own strength, or nothing at all: let him pray incessantly for the increase of faith.

To this purpose, truly, the words of our Saviour out of the gospel, which are very full of comfort, may confirm and strengthen any man most wholesomely:

"Ask, and it shall be given you: seek, and you shall find: knock, and it shall be opened to you. For whoever asks, receives: and whoever seeks, finds: and to him that knocks, it shall be opened. Is there any man among you who, if his son asks him for bread, will give him a stone? or, if he asks for fish, will give him a serpent? If you therefore, who are evil, can give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give good things, even the Holy Ghost itself, if you ask it of him?" ^{Mat 7.7-11}

These and like sayings, presented to us in the holy gospel for our consolation, should more move and establish our minds of the good, indeed, of the right good-will of God towards us, than the eggings of the devil. He goes about with those, not only to overwhelm the hope of our election, but to make us suspect and doubt God, as though He hated his creature, whom he would rather have destroyed than saved. But the devil is well-enough known to the saints by his subtleties and trains; for so he deceived our first parents. Let us keep it deeply printed in our breasts, that God has chosen us in Christ, and for Christ's sake he has predestined us to life; and therefore, he gives and increases faith toward Christ in those who ask for it; and he is the one who puts it in our hearts.¹ For all things that tend to our salvation come from the grace of God; nothing is ours but reproach and shame.

I have thus far laid these things before you, brethren, concerning the marvellous and wonderful work of the creation wrought by the eternal, true, and living God, without any trouble or pain-taking. "For he spoke the word, and they were made. He commanded, and they were created." ^{Psa} 33:9 We added a little touching the most wise and excellent governing of all things by God's divine providence, which is always just and most righteous; likewise of God's good-will towards us; of predestination;² and certain other points belonging to these.

All these things have we recited, truly, to beautify the glory and knowledge of God our creator, to whom both the perpetual and universal course of nature, as well things invisible and visible, bear witness; whom the angels worship, the stars wonder at, the seas bless, the earth reverences, and all infernal things behold; whom the mind of every man feels, even if it does not express him; at whose beck ³ all things are moved, the springs pour out their streams, rivers decrease, the waves arise aloft, all things bring forth their increase, the winds are forced to blow, showers to fall, seas to rage, all things in all places deliver abroad their fruitfulness; who planted a unique garden of felicity for our first parents, gave them a commandment, and pronounced sentence against their sin; delivered righteous Noah from the dangers of the deluge; translated Enoch into the fellowship of his friendship; chose Abraham to himself; defended Isaac; increased Jacob; appointed Moses the captain over his people; set free from the yoke of bondage the groaning children of Israel; wrote a law; brought the offspring of the fathers into the land of promise; instructed his prophets with his Spirit, and by all these, promised his only-begotten Son again — and at the same instant that he had promised to give him, He has sent him; through whom he would also be acquainted and come in knowledge with us; and has poured out upon us all his heavenly graces. And because, of himself, he is liberal and bountiful, lest this whole world wax dry, being turned away from the rivers of his grace, he would have apostles be sent by his Son as teachers throughout the whole world, that the state of mankind might acknowledge their Maker;⁴ and if they followed him, they might have instead of a God, one whom they might call Father in their petitions and prayers; whose providence has not only extended itself, and is now extended, not only severally to men, but also to towns and cities, the ends of which he foretold by the voices of his prophets, yes, throughout the whole world — whose ends, plagues, decays, and punishments for unbelief he has described. And lest any should think that this infatigable providence of God does not extend to everything, however small, the Lord says:

"Of two sparrows, not one of them falls to the ground without the will of the Father;" and, "the hairs of your head are all numbered." His care and also His providence did not let the garments of the Israelites grow old, nor the simple shoes on their feet become worn and torn. And not without good reason. For if this God comprehends that which contains all things, and the whole consists of parts and particulars — then his care shall consequently reach even to every part and particular, whose providence has already reached to the very whole, whatever it is. To this God, be all glory.

4-5. THE FIFTH SERMON: OF WORSHIPPING GOD IN TRUTH.

OF ADORING OR WORSHIPPING, OF INVOCATING OR CALLING UPON, AND OF SERVING THE ONLY, LIVING, TRUE, AND EVERLASTING GOD: ALSO OF TRUE AND FALSE RELIGION.

TOUCHING God, what he is in person, quality, and substance, I have told you already; not as I should, but as I was able. I have likewise outlined how good and ready his will is towards man, whom he has ordained to life everlasting in his only-begotten Son; whom he has also made Lord of all things in this present world, all things being brought in subjection to him.

Now, so that man should not be ignorant of what he owes to so mighty a God, and to a Father so loving and liberal, I will shortly engage in a disputation touching this living, true, and everlasting God, to be adored, called upon, and worshipped by man. For man is neither created nor born to behold and gaze upon the stars, as the philosopher doted;¹ but he was created to be the image and temple of God, in whom God might dwell and reign. And he should therefore acknowledge God, reverence, adore, call upon, and worship Him, and also ² be joined to God, and live with him eternally.

First of all, I will speak of ADORING God; next of CALLING UPON God; and lastly, of SERVING God. Upon doing so, we will perceive without any trouble at all, which is the true religion, or which is the false. The places truly expounded are plentiful. But I will comprehend in few words what the scripture teaches us concerning these things — not every one particularly, but the chief ones, and as much as seems sufficient for our salvation and sound knowledge.

To ADORE or WORSHIP, in the holy scriptures, signifies for honour's sake to uncover the head, bend the body, incline or bow the knee, or to lie prostrate with the whole body on the ground, falling flat on the face at someone's feet in the fashion of suppliants or petitioners, as a token of humility, submission and obedience. It refers chiefly to the posture or habit of the body. The Hebrews use one only word Schahah,³ which all interpreters have expounded by the word adorare, to adore — to bend, bow, and lie along the ground with the face downward. The Grecians have expounded it by the word προσκυνεω (proskuneo), that is, I bow the knees, I uncover or make bare the head, I humbly beseech or adore. And προσκυνησις (proskunesis), adoration, is so called either for kissing, or removing the hat; for κυνεω (kuneo) signifies, I kiss. That a kiss was sometimes a sign of worshipping, reverencing, or adoring, is gathered out of the thirty-first chapter of Job.^{31.27} What, and is it not a fashion that is very much used even today, for honour and reverence' sake to kiss the hand? Again, κυνη (kuue) signifies a hat, a bonnet, or a cap; so that, to adore, is to make bare and uncover the head for reverence' sake. The Latinists also, perhaps, had an eye to the habit of the body; for orare, to pray, signifies both to crave as well as to say something. He therefore adores who, casting his countenance on a man, craves something suppliantly. It is likely that the Germans also regarded this: for they turn adorare, to adore, by the word anbatten; which moreover might have been turned to Zu fussen fallen.⁴

In the ninth chapter of Matthew you read: "Behold, a certain ruler came to Jesus, and worshipped (or adored) him." ^{Mat 9.18} But Mark, writing the same history, says "And behold, there came one of the princes of the synagogue, whose name was Jairus; and when he saw him, he fell down at his feet, and besought him instantly (or much);" ^{Mar 5.22} thus expounding to us what adore is: namely,

to fall down at one's feet, and to submit and beseech like a suppliant. For so we read in the old Testament about Jacob Israel, our father: "And, going before them, he bowed himself to the ground seven times, until his brother Esau approached and drew near." ^{Gen 33.3} Thus we read of David and Abigail in Samuel: "When Abigail saw David, she hastened, and alighted off her donkey, and fell before David on her face, and worshipped on the ground, and she fell at his feet, saying: Let that iniquity be counted mine, my lord," etc. ^{1Sam 25.18} Likewise of Nathan the prophet, it is thus written: "And when he had come in to the king, he worshipped" (or made obeisance) "with his face on the ground." ^{1Kng 1.23} For God, communicating this honour, allows it for men, either for their old age, their authority, or for worthiness' sake: for man is the living image of God. And it pleases God himself to call men who excel others in authority, gods. Whereupon the apostles of Christ, Peter and Paul, instructing the people of God, taught them, truly, "Fear God, honour the king;" ^{1Pet 2.17} and this, "The magistrate is God's minister: give therefore to all men, honour to whom honour belongs; fear to whom fear is due." ^{Rom 13.6-7} In the law, the Lord says: "In the presence of a hoary (grey) head, rise up;" ^{Lev 19.32} and "Honour your parents." ^{Exo 20.12} In consideration of this commandment of God, the godly reverence the aged, their parents, and magistrates; and also please God with faithful obedience.

But to adore, worship, or honour images, whatever representation or likeness they bear, the Lord nowhere likes or allows; for he says in the law: "You shall not bow down nor worship them." ¹ And by his prophet Isaiah, "None (he says) considers within himself about this matter, and says, I have burnt one piece of the wood in the fire, I have baked bread with its coals, I have roasted flesh with it, and eaten it; and should I now make from the residue an abominable idol, and fall down and worship a rotten piece of wood?" ^{Isa 44.19}

In the same prophet, you read with much pronounced indignation: "Their land is full of vain gods (or idols); before the work of their hands they have bowed themselves and adored it; yes, even before the thing that their own fingers have made. There kneels the man, there the man falls down (before them): therefore do not forgive them." ^{Isa 2.8-9} Therefore that ancient writer, Lactantius, inspired with a prophetic spirit, disputing against the Gentiles, has left it thus written:

"The images themselves which are worshipped are representations or counterfeits of dead men. And it is a perverse and an absurd thing, that the image of a man should be worshipped by the image of God, namely, by a man; for he worships the thing that is worse and weaker. Besides that, the very images of saints, which most vain men serve, are void of all sense and feeling, because they are earth. And where is he that does not understand that it is a wicked and sinful act for an upright and straight creature to be bowed down, and to adore and worship earth — which is under our feet to the end that it should be trodden upon, and not adored by us. We are therefore made to go upright and look upward, that we should not lie grovelling downward, that we should not cast this heavenly countenance to the earth; but instead we look there and direct our eyes, to where the condition of their nature has guided them? Whoever therefore endeavours to maintain the mystery of man's creation, and to hold the reason for his nature, let him raise himself up from the ground, and with a raised mind, bend his eyes to heaven. Let him not seek a god under his feet, nor dig from under his footsteps, that which he may adore or worship; because whatever lies under or is subject to man, must be inferior to man. Rather, let him seek aloft, let him seek in the highest place; because nothing can be greater than man, but that which is above man. And God is greater than man: he is therefore above, and not beneath; nor is he to be sought in the lowest, but rather in the highest region or place. This is why there is no doubt that wherever an image exists, there is no religion. For if religion consists in divine things, and nothing is divine unless it is among heavenly things, then images lack religion — because there can be no heavenly thing in that which is made of earth.

This matter, even by the very name itself, may be apparent and manifest to a wise man. For whatever is counterfeit, must be false. Nor can that which is a representation or a gloss of the truth, at any time take to itself the name of truth. If then, not every representation or counterfeit is made in earnest, but is a toy and a sport as it were, then religion is not found in images; but there is less religion where they are found. Therefore, that which is true is to be preferred before all things that are false. Earthly things must be trodden underfoot, that we may get or obtain heavenly things." ¹

We have not unadvisedly recited these words up to here out of Lactantius. We now return to our purpose.

The outward posture or habit of the body is commonly framed according to the inward quality of the mind; and the outward habit of the body of someone who adores, shows that it submits, yields, and subjects him who worships, to him who is worshipped. Therefore, adoration is likewise translated to the inner man. So that, to adore is to reverence and respect God, to bequeath ourselves wholly to him, to cling inseparably to him, and in all things to hang upon him only and alone, and to have recourse to him in all our necessities whatsoever. Furthermore, outward adoration immediately, when it is needful and ability is granted, follows a mind rightly endued with true faith and a holy fear of God. For adoration is two-fold, or of two sorts: one of the mind or spirit, which is inward, sound, sincere and true; and another of the body, which is outward, unsound, counterfeit, and false, and which may proceed from someone in whom there is no sparkle of religion. True adoration is the fruit of true faith and a holy fear of God; namely, a lowly or suppliant yielding and humble consecrating, whereby we bequeath ourselves, yield and submit ourselves to our God, whom we understand to be our best and most merciful Father, and also to be our most high and almighty God. Therefore, upon Him alone we wholly depend, and to Him only we have respect; which also, as soon as occasion is ministered to us, we quickly express and testify by outward adoration. We will better understand all this by the following testimonies from the scripture. David says:

"Come, let us sing unto the Lord; let us heartily rejoice in God our salvation. Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and show ourselves joyful in him with psalms. For the Lord is a great God, and a great king above all gods: because in his hand are the corners of the earth, and the height of the hills are his. For the sea is his and he made it, and his hands fastened the dry land. O come let us adore (or worship) and fall down, and kneel before the Lord that has made us: because he is the Lord our God; and we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hands."

You perceive, therefore, that we must adore or worship God, and that we must cling to him, and sing praises to his name, because he is the most mighty God, Creator of all things, yes, our Creator, our Father, and our Shepherd. Likewise, in the gospel according to Matthew, adoration follows faith; it grows out of it and is nourished by it, as it were.

For after the disciples, being taught by miracles, believed that Jesus was Christ, they came (says Matthew) and adored (or worshipped) him, saying: "You are truly the Son of God." ^{Mat 14.33} Again, you read in John that the Lord asked the blind man that was excommunicated or cast out of the synagogue, to whom he restored his sight, "Do you believe in the Son of God?" The blind man responded, "Who is he, Lord, that I might believe in him?" Jesus answered and said: "You have both seen him, and it is he that talks with you." Moreover, it follows upon this in the history: "But he said, I believe, Lord; and he worshipped him." ^{Joh 9.35-38} Now, up to here belongs that which the Lord said to the Samaritan in the gospel: "The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth." ^{Joh 4.23} For the Lord allows spiritual and inward adoration or worshipping — not outward, counterfeit, or hypocritical worshipping, but that which proceeds from a mind regenerated by faith through the Holy Ghost, and that tends sincerely towards one God. For we read in the history of the old Testament, that those princes worshipped in truth, who consecrated and made themselves holy to one God with their whole heart, and depended on him only Again, that those who did not worship the Lord with their whole heart, who being destitute and void of sincere faith, depended also upon creatures. Now a reason for this adoration or worshipping the Lord adjoins in the gospel. Worship (he says) should in all points agree with Him that is worshipped. But God who is worshipped, is spirit and truth, and He is delighted with spiritual worship and unfeigned faith. He must therefore be worshipped in spirit and truth.

Therefore, the saints have a special care and regard that the inward worship of the mind is sound, and that first of all they worship in heart, and truly, with a sincere faith and a reverence for God's majesty. And while they are so occupied inwardly, they no less outwardly, falling on their faces with humility, worship in God's presence. For the outward worship is a companion of the inward, and follows it. Hypocrites also worship God in body, suppliantly and lowly enough; but because their minds go wool-gathering, and neither with faith nor reverence cling to the Lord, they hear this spoken of the Lord by the prophet:

"This people honours me with their lips, but their heart is far from me. They worship me in vain, teaching as doctrines the precepts of men." ^{Mat 15.8-9} And this truly is the counterfeit and false worshipping. And that worshipping also is false, indeed, it is most wicked and abominable, with which the creatures are worshipped, either with God, or for God, or without God. And, to say it truthfully, they do not worship God at all, who neither fear God, nor believe in God, nor yet depend or hang only upon God.

All men confess truly that God must be worshipped, but not everyone sincerely acknowledges and confesses that God only and alone is to be worshipped. It therefore remains to be declared, that God only and alone is to be worshipped by men. Adoration or worshipping is joined with true faith and perfect or sincere reverence of God's majesty. Seeing that these are due to God alone, it follows that God alone is to be worshipped. And therefore this saying is so often cited and beaten upon in the law and the prophets: "You shall worship the Lord your God, and a strange god you shall not worship." Now, a strange god is whatever you choose to worship for yourself, that is outside and beside the only, living, true, and everlasting God.¹ Therefore, the only and alone true, living, and everlasting God is to be worshipped. In the history of the gospel, we read that the devil tempted our Lord Christ; and having led him up into a high mountain, showed him from there all the kingdoms of the world and their glory, and said: "All these I will give to you, if you, falling down, will worship me." And the Lord answered: "Away Satan; for it is written, you shall worship the Lord your God, and him only shall you serve." ^{Mat 4.8-10} And surely, worshipping and serving are mutually linked, one with the other, so that they cannot be severed or put asunder. From this it follows, seeing that the Lord requires the He only and alone is to be served, that doubtless in like manner He only and alone is to be worshipped. Elijah, the great prophet of God, teaching that God can in no case abide having another joined to him in worship, cries out to the people worshipping God and with him their god Baal: "How long will you halt between the two? If the Lord is God, follow him; if Baal is god, go after him." ¹Kng 18.21

It is as if he said, You cannot worship God and Baal at once. "No man can serve two masters." For the Lord our God requires, not a piece, but our whole heart, our whole mind and soul. He therefore leaves nothing for us to bestow on any other. In the epistle to the Hebrews, Paul shows that Christ is more excellent than angels, because angels adore or worship Christ; but they are not to be worshipped in turn. If the angels are not to be worshipped, then whom shall we grant deserves to be worshipped, beside the living, true, and everlasting God? Therefore, God only and alone is to be worshipped. For in the revelation of Jesus Christ, made to the blessed apostle and evangelist John, we read this: "And I saw another angel flying through the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach to those who dwell on the earth, and to all nations, and kindreds, and tongues, and people, saying with a loud voice: Fear God and give him honour, because the hour of his judgment has come; and worship Him that has made heaven and earth, the sea, and fountains of waters." ^{Rev 14.6-7}

And again, in the same book we read: "And I fell down before the feet of the angel, to worship him. And he said to me: See that you do not do this; I am your fellow-servant and of your brethren having the testimony of Jesus; worship God." ^{Rev 19.10} Again, in the end of the same book you read: "And after I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel who showed me these things. And he said to me, See that you do not do it; for I am your fellow-servant, and of your brethren the prophets, and of those who keep the words of this book." ^{Rev 22.8-9}

When Cornelius the centurion fell down and worshipped at his feet, what St. Peter said and did does not greatly disagree with this. Peter said, "Arise, I myself am also a man;" ^{Act 10.26} and with that, laying his hand on him, which lay along, lifted him up, and set him on his feet. Right religiously, therefore, Augustine wrote in his book ¹ touching true religion:

"Do not let religion be for us the worshipping of man's handiwork, for better are the workmen themselves who make them, whom notwithstanding we should not worship. Do not let religion be for us the worshipping of mortal men, because if they have lived godly, they are not to be esteemed as those who would seek such honours; but it is their will that [Christ] should be worshipped by us, who enlightening them, they rejoice that we are made fellow-partakers of his merit. They are therefore to be honoured for imitation's sake, not worshipped for religion's sake. And if they have lived badly, they are not to be worshipped, wherever they are." ²

Augustine in his first book, De consensu Evangelistarum, the eighteenth chapter, wrote about the consent of the evangelists, reasoning why the Romans never accepted both the God of the Hebrews, and the worship of their God, considering that they accepted almost all the other gods of the Gentiles for worship. He answers that it came to pass by no other occasion, than because the God of the Hebrews would be worshipped only and alone, without a mate or partner. If anyone requires his words, they are these:

"There remains nothing for them to say, as to why they have not received the holy rites and worship of this God, save only because he would be worshipped alone; and He has forbidden them to worship the gods of the Gentiles, whom nevertheless these people did worship. For the sentence or opinion of Socrates (who, as ratified by oracle, was the wisest of all men) is that every god should be worshipped as he himself has commanded. Therefore, the Romans were of necessity forced not to worship the God of the Hebrews; because if they worshipped him in a fashion other than He himself said He would be worshipped, they would not then worship him, except in manner that they themselves had devised and made. And if they worshipped him in that manner which He himself prescribed, then they saw that they were debarred from worshipping other gods, which He forbade to be worshipped. Upon this, they refused the worship of the only true God, with the intent they might not offend many counterfeit and false gods — thinking that the anger of them would be more to their disprofit than the good-will of Him would be to their benefit." ¹ Thus says Augustine.

Although these things are written concerning the worship and service of God, and we dispute about adoring God's majesty, yet notwithstanding, they are not impertinent or beside our purpose; for worshipping and serving God are inseparably linked and knit together. We will say more afterward about serving God. But by the words cited before, we gather that the true, living, and everlasting God is to be worshipped only and alone, according to that commonly known sentence of the law: "You shall worship the Lord your God; you shall fear him; you shall serve him only; you shall cling to him; and you shall swear in his name." ^{Deu 10.20}

Furthermore, God has promised and performed from the beginning — yes, and will perform while this world stands — great rewards to his true worshippers. Contrariwise, we believe that great mischiefs or punishments are prepared for those who either do not worship God at all, or else worship strange gods instead of the true God. The Lord says in his Revelation shown to John the apostle: "The fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their portion in the lake that burns with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." ^{Rev 21.8}

We have spoken these things up to here about worshipping God. We will now, in the second place, speak about invocation, or calling upon God, which we promised to speak about.

To call upon, and calling upon, is diversely taken in the scriptures. For it signifies bringing forth a witness, or calling to witness. So Moses calls heaven and earth to witness against the children of Israel, ^{Deu 30.19} by the figure Prosopopoeia. Again, the name of anyone to be called upon or over another, is to be called by, or after, his name. "Let my name" (Jacob says) "be called upon them," ^{Gen 48.16} that is, upon Ephraim and Manasseh — let them be named by my name, as if they were my children; and let them be called, not the sons of Joseph, but the sons of Jacob Israel. So the wives say to their husbands, ² "Let your name be called upon us;" that is, allow or give leave, that we may be named by your name, and that we may be made your wives: for those women, through the knot of wedlock, take for themselves their husbands' names. In the same manner, we oftentimes read in the prophets and holy history of the Bible, "The house upon which your name is called;" ^{Jer 7.10} that is, the house which is called after your name, and is named the Lord's house. Likewise Joab, general of the king's army, says to David: "Take the city" (Rabbah, the chief city or royal seat of the Ammonites), "lest I take it, and my name be called upon it;" ^{2Sam 12.28} that is, lest I be called the conqueror of Rabbah. Therefore, they are most ignorant and unskilful of the scriptures and the phrases of speech used in the scripture, who cite that saying of Jacob, which we just now declared, in defence and maintenance of the invocation of saints, as though Jacob would have his name be called upon his posterity and offspring. In Daniel you read, "A people upon whom the name of God is called:" ^{Dan 9.19} which signifies nothing else than a people who are called God's people.

² So also ed. 1584: but ed. 1577 has rightly, husband; maritum, Lat.

Here is no mention of invocation, by which we ask for or desire anything. Furthermore, invocation, or calling upon, is taken for religion. For Luke says in the Acts: "Saul had power (or authority) to bind all those who called upon the name of the Lord." ^{Act 9.14} And Paul says: "Let everyone who calls upon the name of the Lord depart from iniquity." ^{2Tim 2.19} Also, "Seek after peace with all those who call upon the name of the Lord," ^{2Tim 2.22} that is, who are of the true Christian religion. Lastly, to invoke or call upon, signifies to cry or call for help, and to crave something with continual outcries.

Therefore, that invocation or calling upon God which we are treating at this time, is a lifting up of man's mind to God in great necessity or in some desire, and a most ardent craving for counsel and assistance by faith; and it is also bequeathing or committing ourselves into the protection of God, taking ourselves to his sanctuary and only safeguard as it were. Therefore, in true invocation, first of all, a faithful mind is required, which acknowledges God as the author and only giver of all good gifts; who is willing to hear those who call upon him, and is able to grant us all our requests and desires whatever. An incessant and ardent petition or beseeching is also required. But more will be said about these points, when God gives us leave, in our sermon about the prayer of the faithful — for invocation is a kind of prayer.

Now, truly, I will show that in all our desires, God is to be called upon — yes, and to be called upon only and alone. There are surely express commandments of God, charging us to call upon the name of the Lord, who promises that for the good will and love which he bears us, he will hear our requests and suits, and largely give to us those things tending to our health and benefit. Out of many testimonies, I will cite one or two. Solomon, the wisest of all men, teaches us to call upon God in all and every one of our necessities, making particular mention of men's special desires. ^{1Kng 8.30 ff} Solomon's father, that most holy king David, handles the same argument throughout the whole hundred and seventh Psalm. He therefore reckons up the diverse casualties, chances, and miseries of men, their affliction or oppression, their wanderings and dangers in their journey, their bonds and imprisonments, their diseases, and the fear of death (which is sometimes more terrible and hideous than death itself), their jeopardies on the sea and rough waters, barrenness, scarcity, calamities, contempt, shame, and ignominy. 'Those crosses,' he says [in effect], 'if they light on any man, let him not ascribe them either to his [false] god to whose defence he has committed himself, or to fortune, or to his constellation and destiny; but to that God who knows all things, and can do all things, and let him call upon that God earnestly by faith.'

For the prophet often repeats these words: "And when they cried to the Lord in their tribulation, he delivered them out of their distress." ^{Psa 120.1} And for that cause, he so often reiterated those words, to the end that, having conceived a perfect trust in our hearts and sure belief, we might learn in all circumstances to call upon the name of the Lord. For Solomon says yet again in his Proverbs (18.10): "The name of the Lord is a most strong tower; the righteous man runs to it, and he shall be advanced," ¹ or, he shall be set free from danger. Asaph also says in his holy songs: "Sacrifice to the Lord a sacrifice of praise, and pay your vows to the Most High." ^{Psa 50.14} And, "Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver you, and you shall glorify me." ^{Psa 50.15} And he brings in the Lord himself speaking, and requiring sacrifices, not of beasts, not of gold or silver, but of praise and invocation. With this, He promises help; and He witnesses that he is honoured (or glorified) by invocation and praising. Upon which David said: "In my trouble I will call upon the Lord, and I will cry unto my God; and he shall hear my voice out of his holy temple, and my cry shall enter into his ears." ^{Psa 18.6} Joel also said: "Everyone who calls upon the name of the Lord shall be safe." ^{Joe 2.32} And the Lord by the prophet Jeremiah says: "You shall call upon me, and you shall live:¹ you shall pray to me, and I will hear you; you shall seek me, and you shall find me, if you seek me with your whole heart." Jer 29.11-13 Furthermore, we do not read that our holy and blessed fathers in their petitions and requests, whether they were small or great, called upon any other than that God who lives everlastingly, world without end. For the Lord himself says by Asaph: "In your extremities and troubles, Israel, you called upon me, and I delivered you." Psa 81.7 Also David says: "Our fathers hoped in you, and you delivered them. To you they cried, and were delivered; in You they trusted, and were not confounded." Psa 22.4-5

Now add to all these, the commandment of Christ our Lord: "When you pray, say, Our Father," etc. Add also the words which follow in Luke 11.9, and Matthew 7.7. "Ask, and it shall be given to you;" and so forth. We conclude, therefore, that the true, living, and everlasting God should be called upon by all men in all their necessities.

But perhaps it is to no purpose that I take pains in this point, seeing that there are but a few, or none at all, who would deny that God is to be called upon. This seems to require a more diligent declaration, that God only and alone is to be called upon. For many doubtless call upon God, but certain chosen patrons are called upon together with God, or for God; from which it follows that they do not call upon God only and alone. Now, we declare that He alone is to be called upon in this way. By invocation, or calling upon, we require help or succour, either that good things may be given to us, or that evil things may be turned away from us. This needs no further proof, seeing that it cannot be denied by anyone who is ruled by his right wits. Now, God only and alone is our helper, who only gives good things, and takes away evil things. For the Lord says in the gospel: "There is none good but one," Mar 10.18 namely, God; where one is taken for one only and alone. Again in the law, by the mouth of Moses, the Lord says: "Behold, that I am God alone, and that there is no other God beside me." Deu 32.39 And again by Isaiah: "Am not I the Lord? and there is no other God beside me: a just God and a Saviour; there is none other beside me." Isa 45.21 And David: "Who," he says, "is God, besides the Lord? and who is mighty (or a rock), save our God?" 2Sam 22.32 In very evil part therefore the worshippers of God took it, so often as men asked of them those things which are in the Lord's hands only to give. Rachel said to Jacob: "Give me children, or else I die." Gen 30.1 But the scripture then adds: "And Jacob being angry said, Am I in God's stead, who has denied you" (or withheld from you) "the fruit of the womb?" Gen 30.2 So when the king of Syria desired and sought Joram, the king of Israel (I know, a not so godly king), that he would heal Naaman who was infected with the leprosy, Joram says: "Am I a God, that I should be able to kill and to give life? For he sends to me, that I should heal a man from his leprosy." 2Kng 5.7

Therefore, it is most certain that it belongs to God only to give good things, and to turn away evil things. It consequently follows that God only and alone must be called upon. For if those patrons who are called upon as helpers and succourers, are able either to give those things that are good, or to turn away those things that are evil, then certainly there is not one God only; for those would likewise be gods. But they are not gods, because there is but one God, who only and alone gives (or bestows) good things, and takes away (or removes) evil things. God only and alone, therefore, is to be called upon. Patrons are not to be called upon, as they are unable to do us either good or harm. Touching that, some object here (of their own heads), that patrons do us good and harm, not of themselves, but of God. But this is doubtful — indeed, it is most false. For the Lord himself says by the prophet: "I am the Lord: Hu (this or being) ² is my name; and I will not give my glory to another, nor my praise to a graven image." Isa 42.8 So that all glory belongs to God, because He only ¹ and alone, is not only the well-spring of all good graces, which is never drawn dry, but also a most just and equal distributor of them; and for that cause he is called upon, worshipped, and served by men. Psalm 1.

Furthermore, insofar as we should sacrifice only to one God, it is certain that we must worship only one God. The Lord cries in the law: "He that offers to gods other than to the only God, let him be rooted out." ^{Exo 22.20} And therefore, when the people of Lystra were preparing sacrifices to offer to the apostles, Paul and Barnabas tore their clothes at it, as an intolerable blasphemy. For in the law of the Lord we read again: "Whoever makes for himself a composition (or perfume) of incense, to smell like it, he shall be cut off from among his people." And the sacrifices of the godly are prayers, thanksgivings, and invocations upon God's name.

For David says: "To you I will sacrifice a sacrifice of praise, and I will call upon the name of the Lord." ^{Psa 116.17} And again: "Let my prayer be directed in your sight as incense; and the lifting up of my hands as an evening sacrifice." ^{Psa 141.2} Paul likewise says: "By Christ we offer the sacrifice of praise always unto God, that is, the fruit of lips which confess his name." ^{Heb 13.15} For the prophet Hosea bids us "offer the calves of our lips." ^{Hos 14.2} Therefore, as only one God is to be sacrificed to, only one God is to be called upon. Nor is possible for those who do not call upon the only God, but upon heavenly patrons, if those patrons are saints, to require this manner of invocations by men. No indeed! These invocations rather offend both God and the saints, ascribing to the saints, that which no blessed spirits acknowledge. St. Augustine says that they are not the angels of the good God, but wicked devils, who would not have the only and most high God, but themselves, be worshipped and served with sacrifices.² Besides that, the blessed spirits (or saints) during the time that they lived in their mortal bodies, prayed "Your will be done, as in heaven so on earth." ^{Mat 6.10} Therefore, now being delivered and set free from all corruption, they much more fully, indeed, most perfectly agree with the will of God, which commands all men to worship and call upon the only God.

Again, the One who looks into and sees the hearts of those who call upon him, hears their petitions or requests, and is able to fulfil the desires of all men living, [is the only One who] is lawfully and fruitfully called upon. And surely it is requisite and necessary that He know all things, that he be almighty, and the searcher of hearts. Therefore, seeing that he is the only God, without further question, the only God should be called upon. Solomon testifies that only God is the searcher of hearts, that he is comprehended in no place but present everywhere, and that He is omnipotent, saying so in these words:

"Behold, the heavens and the heaven of heavens are not able to contain you. How much more unable, then, is this house that I have built! You therefore shall hear in heaven, in the place of your habitation (or, in your dwelling-place), and shall have mercy. For only you know the hearts of the sons of men. You shall do (and give) to each one according to all his ways, Who know his very heart." ^{1Kng 8.27 ff}

As for the "heavenly patrons," as these men call them, they neither know the thoughts of men; nor is their power spread throughout the heaven, the earth, and the seas; nor do they know all things; nor yet are they everywhere present, or omnipotent. For if it were so with them, then they would be transformed and changed into a divine nature, and would cease to be creatures anymore. But although they enjoy everlasting blessedness by Christ, yet notwithstanding, they remain creatures still; nor do they know all things, nor are they almighty. And therefore they are to be called upon at no one's hand. In one prick and moment of time, truly innumerable thousands of mortal men offer up their vows, and make their petitions: so that he truly who hears, must at a pinch, and in a single moment (not at sundry seasons or degrees of time) know and be able to do all things — indeed, and in a moment also reach out his helping hand to all. No creature, however excellent, can do this. Thus, the only God alone, who knows all, and is omnipotent, can do all things. And therefore, He only and alone is to be called upon.

I know well what the defenders of heavenly patrons (or saints) object against what I have spoken; namely, that of their own nature, they neither see nor hear what is done by us on earth; but in the face of God, as in a well-lit mirror, they see all things, whatever God grants to reveal to them, so that they have an under-knowledge of all our affairs, and also help us.¹ But this imagination or forgery (in all points doubtful) can be proved by no authority out of the holy scriptures. But touching the celestial saints, the scripture rather affirms the flat contrary. For in Isaiah, the people of God cry out: "You, God, are our Father. Though Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel does not know us; You, O Lord, are our Father, and our Redeemer." Isa 63.16

If, then, the patriarchs — so studious and careful for their people — did not know what they did, which of the saints (I ask you) would we grant or point out, who knows what we do, and intermeddles with the affairs of the living? Doubtless, it is true what that holy psalm sounds: "Because my father and my mother have left (or forsaken) me, the Lord has taken me up." Psa 27.10 If our parents forsake and leave us, then how (I ask you) can they tell, or do they care, how it fares with us? Let that suffice us, with which David held himself thoroughly content, saying: "The Lord has taken charge over me." We read that Josiah was translated out of this life into another, to the end he would not see the mischiefs (or plagues and punishments,) which the Lord determined to bring upon the Israelite people for their most wicked and naughty life. 2Kng 22.20 The blessed souls, therefore, enjoy the sight of God, and thereby partake of light and endless joy or gladness. They know none of our affairs, nor is it needful that they should know them, considering that the Lord alone has all things in his government.

Now, that is also most certain, that invocation springs from faith, just as the fruit springs from the root. For Paul, using that saying from the prophet, "Whoever calls upon the name of the Lord shall be safe," Joe 2.32 then adds: "But how will they call upon him, in whom they have not believed?" Rom 10.13-14 See how the apostle brings in one upon another: He is not called upon, who is not believed. This is why the one in whom we believe, we also call upon. But we believe in God only and alone; therefore, on we call upon him only. For wherever true faith is found, there likewise is the gift of the Holy Ghost.

For the apostle says: "If anyone does not have the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." Rom 8.9 And again: "You have not received again the spirit of bondage unto fear; but you have received the spirit of adoption, by which we cry, Abba, Father." Rom 8.15 Those, therefore, who are endued with a true belief in God, call upon God, whom they acknowledge and confess to be the only Father of all. Eph 4.6 Nor might so much as the least part in that solemn form and order of invocation, delivered to us by the Son of God, Mat 6.9 be attributed by any means to patrons, or saints. The only God is therefore to be called upon.

The heart of sinful man trembles and quakes to approach near to so great a majesty. For who may seem worthy in himself to appear and come before the presence of the most holy, the most just, and the most terrible ² God?

² Terrible: causing fear, dread or terror.

Here, therefore, some supply and make up the matter with the patronship or intercession of celestial saints, by whose mediation and making way before us, passage lies open for us to God. But they produce this without the warrant of the scripture. The scripture has laid calling upon God before us as a law, as it were, and to this has been annexed the most ample or large promises. So the commandment sets before us, by and through whom we should call upon God, adding to it a most excellent promise, and opening for us the only ready way to the Father, through Christ Jesus. For in the gospel, the Lord says: "Truly, truly, I say to you, whatever you ask the Father in my name, he shall give it to you. Up to now you have not asked for anything in my name. Ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be perfect," (or full). ^{Joh 16.24} And, "Whatever you ask in my name, I will do it; that the Father may be glorified by the Son. If you shall ask anything in my name, I will do it." ^{Joh 14.12} What could be spoken more fully and clearly than these words? Christ bids us by (or in) his name to call upon God the Father, and he promises that he will give the faithful whatever they ask in Christ's name. Who doubts, now, any whit at all of the truth and constancy of the one who promises? Therefore, why do we henceforth need the intercession of saints? We have no testimony of scripture, we have no promise, of calling upon them, or of coming to God by their mediation. To this I add that, whoever seeks to come to the Father by any other than by Christ and his intercession, contemns the commandment and precept of God. He that obeys the commandment of Christ, and makes invocation in his name, does not need the mediation of saints at all. Does he not have all things plentifully in Christ? We therefore say and affirm that only Christ is the mediator, intercessor, and advocate with the Father in heaven, of all men who are on earth, and the only one of that sort — that after him, it is needless to have other advocates.

Many grant that Christ is given to us an intercessor with God; but because they join many others with him, they do not surely send all to him alone, nor preach only one mediator.

They imagine that Christ is the mediator of redemption, yes, and the only mediator; yet he is not the only mediator of intercession, but together with him, there are many more. But as the scripture sets forth Christ as the only mediator of redemption, so it also sets him forth as the only mediator of intercession. The office of a mediator touching redemption and intercession, is one and the same office. A mediator puts himself in the middle between those who are at variance or disagreement; and he is joined to each in disposition and nature. An intercessor puts himself in the middle between those who are at strife and dissension; and unless he is indifferent to either side, he cannot be an intercessor. On both parts, reconciliation ¹ (or atonement) is required and looked for. There must therefore be a certain cause of discord; which being taken away, the discord or debate also ceases. The cause of discord is sin. It is therefore the duty of a mediator or intercessor to quite erase sin, that disagreement may no longer remain. For this, there are no amends or satisfaction to be made with words or with prayers, but with blood and death. ^{Heb 9.22} From this we necessarily gather that only Christ is the mediator or intercessor with the Father. For only Christ ² may set himself in the middle between God and men, because only he is partaker of both natures. The saints have but one nature; for they are men; but Christ is both God and man. Furthermore, he that is an intercessor must also be a reconciler, or an atonement-maker. For the end at which the intercessor shoots, is reconciliation. But Christ is the only reconciler of men, and therefore he is also the only intercessor. For it belongs to an intercessor to dissolve the cause of contention and discord, that is to say, to abolish and take away sin. But Christ alone takes away sin, and no creature. It therefore remains that Christ is the only intercessor. Up to here now, pertain the testimonies of scripture. Paul says: "There is one God, and one reconciler (or mediator) of God and men, the man Christ Jesus, who gave himself as the price (or ransom) for the redemption of all." ^{1Tim 2.5-6}

² Originally, "principally Christ." Principio enim solus Christus, Lat.; For, in the first place, only Christ, etc.

iv.215

And although the apostle speaks expressly of redemption, yet notwithstanding, these words are placed in the middle between the disputation and the invocation of God, which is done by Christ, who is the only-mediator of redemption and intercession. For just as he alone redeemed us, so being redeemed, he alone even now commends us to the Father. Touching this, let the apostle be heard once again, saying to the Romans: "Christ, when as yet we were sinners, died for us: much more therefore now being justified (or made righteous) by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him." ^{Rom 5.9} And yet again, somewhat plainer: "For if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son; much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." ^{Rom 5.10} For in another place the same apostle says: "Christ ever lives" for this end, "to make intercession for us." ^{Heb 7.25} And again: "It is God that justifies: who is he that can condemn? It is Christ that died; indeed, that is raised up; who is also at the right hand of God, and makes intercession for us." ^{Rom 8.33-34} The same Christ opens the way, or makes access for us to the Father.¹ Hebrews, chapter 4. and Ephesians, chapter 2. For in the gospel the Lord Jesus himself does not show us many doors, but one only door. "I am the door," he says. ^{Joh 10.7} And again: "I am the way, the truth, and the life. None comes to the Father but by me." ^{Joh 14.6} The one who says, "I am the way, the truth, and the life," indeed, says it in such a way, that there is access to the Father by none other than by me, that is, by me only and alone. Does that not exclude all other means, all other ways, and all other patrons or advocates whatsoever? Also, in another place of the gospel, in his own person, he plainly and lovingly calls all to him and to the benefit of his defence, cries: "Come to me, all you who labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest." ^{Mat 11.28} He does this lest anyone be hindered from calling upon God in the name of Christ, and committing themselves to Christ's defence of them – hindered through shame, knowledge of their own unworthiness, and guiltiness of sins, or the majesty and glory of Christ the Son of God.

Out of the epistle to the Hebrews may be gathered no less evident testimonies than these, and in good supply. Among others, this one is excellent: "Christ, because he endures forever," says the apostle, "has an everlasting priesthood. Therefore he is able to perfectly save those who come to God by him, seeing that he ever lives (for this end) to make intercession for them. For it was fitting for us to have such a high priest, (who is) holy, harmless, undefiled, separated from sinners, and made higher than the heavens," etc. ^{Heb 7.24-26} Mark how many arguments we have in this testimony of Paul, to prove that Christ, of all the faithful in heaven, is the only intercessor with the Father. The proper or particular office of the priest is to make intercession. But only Christ is priest in the presence of God. Therefore, he is the only intercessor. Now, the priesthood of Christ is also everlasting, or unchangeable. Therefore, he has redeemed us not only by once offering himself up for us (being made the only and alone Mediator of redemption), but he is also the everlasting and perpetual Mediator of intercession, making intercession for us even till the end of the world. For even though our Lord is a judge, yet notwithstanding, he is a judge of the unfaithful, a defender and upholder of the faithful, and at length, when the world is at an end, a judge of all. And if he has an everlasting priesthood, and (ἀπαράβατον) it is not conveyable, or removeable, – that is, if it cannot pass over to any other, either by succession, resignation,² or part-taking – then certainly Christ only and alone remains intercessor of the faithful. Moreover, there is no cause why we should choose and take other intercessors for ourselves, either after Christ, or with Christ. For he is able to work our salvation to the full, by himself alone; this leaves nothing at all to others with which to busy themselves. Let us also, first of all, ¹ note what he expressly adds, "That come to God by him;" — "by him," that is, by our mediator, priest, and intercessor, Christ. For the way lies open for us to go to the Father, by him only and alone. To this also is annexed, "That he lives; and (for this end) he lives to make intercession for us." The heavenly saints also live in the kingdom of God with Christ. But they live for themselves (or for their own benefit), and not for us (or our advantage). Christ lives for us, and he makes intercession for us: therefore he alone makes intercession. Saints do not make intercession.

These reasons prove to us most manifestly, I think, that the apostle speaks of the mediation of intercession, and not of redemption. Last of all, he requires those marks (or properties) in an intercessor, which cannot be found in anyone except Christ the Lord, only and alone. For although the angels are innocent and harmless, yet they are not higher than the heavens. The heavenly saints, although they are now purged and made clean from sins, yet for all that, they are not separated from sinners by nature, nor are they made higher than the heavens, as being lords over angels and over every creature. Only the Son is such a one, and this glory is reserved and kept for him. Therefore, He alone is the intercessor of the faithful with the Father.

To these testimonies of Paul, we will join yet another from St. Peter, and another from the most blessed apostle and evangelist John. St. Peter teaches that the saints, that is, we who are faithful in this world, are laid as living stones upon Christ the living stone, by faith; and we are made a spiritual building (or house), and a holy priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. Look, we are laid, not upon saints, but upon Christ, the living stone; by whom we are both quickened and preserved in the building. We are made a spiritual house, and a holy priesthood, for this end; that we should offer, not sacrifices beasts, but spiritual sacrifices, namely, ourselves and our prayers, unto God by Jesus Christ, not by saints. For they also are the spiritual house with us, the living stones, laid upon Christ, and living through Christ.

Furthermore, John writes: "My babes, these things write I to you, that you do not sin; but if any man sins, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, the just (or the righteous). And he is the propitiation (or reconciliation) for our sins; and not for ours only, but also (for the sins) of the whole world." ¹Joh 2.1 I do not think anything could be devised or spoken ² that is more agreeable to our purpose, more evident, stronger, or better than this. We hear that Christ is appointed by God and made unto us not only a mediator of redemption, once to redeem, but to be an everlasting mediator, indeed, of intercession.

He stands as an advocate before God the Father, so often as sinful man offends and needs his help and defence; to whom the guilty may also boldly have access, and commit their cause to him, to be pleaded before God. "If any man sins," says John, "we have an advocate with the Father." Look, John calls him an advocate, whom the defenders (or maintainers) of the patronship of saints call a mediator of intercession. For advocatus, παράκλητος (parakletos) an advocate, signifies a tutor, a defender, a favourer, a comforter, a patron, or a proctor, who pleads, or handles our cause. But mark whom he defines and sets forth to be our advocate: not the holy virgin, not Peter or Paul, not himself or Stephen, but Jesus Christ. If he had thought or believed that the patronship of heavenly saints had been additionally necessary and wholesome for men, then he would have joined them with Christ the Lord. But now, here he sets forth unto us Christ alone. He adds, "the just" (or the righteous); as if he had said, there is no cause why any should distrust or stand in doubt of his patronship, or think him a patron who is not in his Father's favour and love. He is the Son, he is Christ, he is the just or righteous: therefore he is highly in his Father's favour, and most acceptable; who in the presence of the most just God, may appear for us who are unjust. Such righteousness is not found in any one of Adam's children, but it is required in an intercessor. Indeed, he communicates his righteousness to the saints by faith; but that righteousness is imputed to the saints, and it is imputative.¹ In Christ, righteousness is natural and born in him as it were; indeed, it is properly his own. For Christ Jesus is the only righteous in heaven and on earth; who does not need either to pray or to offer sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the offences of the people; for only he has no sin, and is the righteousness of all. Therefore, only he can make intercession with the Father, because no one naturally and properly is righteous but Christ alone. And it is not amiss in this place, first of all ² to mark that Christ is called a propitiation, or satisfaction, not for sinners or people of one or two ages, but for all sinners and all faithful people throughout the whole world.

One Christ is therefore sufficient for all: one intercessor with the Father is set forth for all. For however often you sin, that often you have ready a righteous intercessor with the Father. Not that we should imagine in heaven, as in a court, the Father upon his throne to sit as a judge; and the Son our patron, as often as we sin and offend, to fall down on his knees, and plead or entreat for us. But we understand with the apostle, that Christ is the advocate and the universal priest of the church, and that only he appears in the presence of the Father. This is because, just as the power and force of his death is always effectual (he does not die daily), so the virtue of his intercession is always effectual. Let us therefore draw near and come to God by Christ, the only mediator of our redemption and intercession, our only intercessor and advocate. We cannot help being acceptable to God the Father, if we are commended to him by his only-begotten Son.

Furthermore, the arguments are weak with which the maintainers of the heavenly patrons go about establishing their patronship or intercession. The Spirit, they say, makes intercession for us according to the doctrine of the apostle; ³ therefore Christ alone does not make intercession. I answer that Paul does not speak of another intercessor in heaven, but of the spirit of man praying in this world; being enlightened and kindled with the Spirit of God, he groans and makes intercession for the saints. The words of the apostle are plain.

Yet these men add this: We read in scripture of the prayers of angels, and that they offer the prayers of the faithful in God's presence. ^{Rev 8.4} Therefore, it is not Christ alone who prays or makes intercession for us in heaven, but also the saints. We deny that this follows, because the scripture teaches that angels are ministering spirits; and according to their office, they offer prayers only as ministers in the presence of God, but not to make intercession. Nor are men heard for angels' sakes, but for Christ's sake, who makes intercession, and for whose sake the prayer which is brought and offered to God is acceptable to Him. Now, if they bring forth the same thing touching the blessed souls of the saints, and reason a simili, from that which is alike, then let them first teach that souls are appointed and made ministering spirits.

¹ That is, Christ's righteous must be imputed to believers, because it is inherent in him, and not in us who were all corrupted by the fall. His righteousness is imputed from his very nature, to become the essence our new nature, which is what makes us acceptable to God. Thus, his righteousness is necessarily and characteristically imputative. – WHG

³ Rom 8:26-27 ^{NKJ} Likewise the Spirit also helps in our weaknesses. For we do not know what we should pray for as we ought, but the Spirit Himself makes intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered. ²⁷ Now He who searches the hearts knows what the mind of the Spirit is, because He makes intercession for the saints according to the will of God.

But they cannot. And if they could, they would still not have proved that the heavenly saints are intercessors. For doubtless, the angels themselves are not intercessors, just because they offer the prayers of men to God.

[Heavenly saints] agree to us, they say, and are knit to us in the same knot of charity and love. And because the spirits of the blessed who live in heaven love us here on earth, therefore, according to the nature and disposition of this love, they also pray for us. We answer that they gather this from scripture without warrant. For we may grant them this without wrangling: that the saints in heaven are not without the love of their neighbour. And yet, notwithstanding, we add that this love in the heavenly saints no longer has that nature or disposition, and those offices, which it had on earth in times past. Otherwise, we would attribute many more absurdities to the saints; as though they either did or suffered those things which they neither did nor suffered. While they lived on earth, according to the disposition and nature of love, they were sorry, and they were glad, and they prayed with us; yes, they also made intercession for us. But now that they have put off this corruption and have left us, leading their lives in heaven with the Lord, they neither know our affairs, nor are moved with any earthly affections. They understand that it is surpassing well with us ¹ without their help. They likewise understand that the work of our salvation is already wrought and accomplished,² so that they may quiet themselves, and rest from their labours, and rejoice in Christ. Doubtless, he is the only intercessor with the Father of all men living in their misery, because he knows all, and can do all. Nor is he moved at, wearied or tired with, nor yet ignorant of anything. But whatever things are incident or belong to an intercessor, he takes upon himself most absolutely, and dispatches all these things. The [heavenly saints] understand that this glory agrees to the only Son of God; and therefore they do not go busily about it, that in Christ's stead they might appoint or make themselves intercessors. For here the love that they bear to God surpasses the love of their neighbour.

But these men object, that the saints do not pray in heaven in the rite and fashion of that only intercessor, but in the same manner that they prayed for their fellow-brethren while on earth. Just now we said that it did not follow: they did this on earth, therefore they do the same in heaven. Nor can it be proved by manifest scriptures that the saints in heaven pray for us. Why then do they set forth doubtful opinions as certain? For we may grant that the saints pray in heaven, (which not a few of the fathers have written ³); yet it does not follow that the heavenly saints are to be called upon. For that sentence from St. Augustine is very well known, which is written in his book De civitate Dei, xxii. chap. 10:

"The Gentiles built temples, made altars, ordained priests, and offered sacrifices to their gods. But we do not erect temples to our martyrs, as to gods, but only as remembrances to dead men, whose spirits live with God. Nor do we set up altars there, on which we might sacrifice to martyrs; but we sacrifice to one God, who is the sacrifice both of the martyrs, and also our sacrifice — according to which sacrifice, as men of God who have overcome the world in confessing Him, these things have their place and order. Even so, they are not called upon by the priest who sacrifices, because he is God's priest, and not theirs. Now the sacrifice itself is the body of Christ, which is not offered to the [heavenly saints]; because they themselves are also the same." ⁴

⁴ Augustin. de Civit. Dei, Lib. xxii. cap. 10. Opp. Tom. v. fol. 302. col. 4. Par. 1531.

Thus he says, testifying plainly enough, that the saints are not called upon, nor to be called upon, because sacrifice belongs to God, and not to the saints.

The adversaries add that for many years the church called upon the saints, and that the church did not err; therefore, those who now call upon the saints do not err. We answer that the church does not err when she hears the voice of her Bridegroom and Shepherd. But she does err when, neglecting the voice of her Shepherd, she follows her own decrees. The whole church of Israel erred, together with their high priest Aaron and the elders of the people, when — transgressing the law of God — they worshipped God represented by an image, with singing and dancing, otherwise than God himself had appointed. Nor are the Israelites absolved from error and sin, when for many years they did not pull down their high places.

They add again, that the saints have helped when they have been called upon; therefore, they are to be called upon. Oftentimes, that which is instituted against the word of God turns out well. But who can gather from this that what is instituted against the word of God, is good? It is as though the innocent and harmless were therefore to be destroyed with war, because we see that merciless soldiers grow rich by war. The gods of the Gentiles likewise seemed to hear the petitions of their suppliants; but are the gods of the Gentiles therefore to be called upon?

But we do not mean to answer every one of their arguments, because we have already done that elsewhere, according to our talent.¹ We conclude, therefore, that the word of truth, uttered out of the mouth of God, teaches us the invocation of God's name by the mediation of Jesus Christ. Nor do we read that any holy man, either in the old or new Testaments (of whom the scripture has undoubtedly mentioned), called upon any patriarch or prophet who had departed this life, however excellent, nor upon any apostle, or apostle's disciple — other than by the name of Jesus Christ. Let us therefore hold fast to this doctrine which is most perfect and most safe, which bids us all to call upon God alone by his only Son, which is what God himself requires of every one of us, and by which, when we obey, we please God.

The last place remains, touching the serving of God. This word colere is of large signification in Latin. For we say, colere amicitiam, to maintain friendship, colere literarum studia, to love learning, colere arva, to till or husband our lands, and colere senes, to reverence old men. In this place, we use colere for servire, that is, to be dutiful in all points like a servant, and to show ourselves obedient to reverence or to venerate, and to worship. The Hebricians use their word abad, which the Latin interpreter translated servivit, coluit, or sacrificavit;² that is, he served, worshipped, or sacrificed. In the book of Kings you read: "And Ahab served Baal, and worshipped him." ¹Kng 16.31 The Grecians call this service either λατρεία (latreia) or δουλεία (douleia). The one is taken for the other, though indeed, servire, to serve, is more than colere, to worship. For you can abide without much ado in worshipping some man; but to serve him, you cannot so well get away with much. We therefore say that the service of God is a service by which men submit themselves reverently to God, and obey him, and worship him according to his will. Therefore, those who serve³ God earnestly, behave themselves dutifully in obeying him — serving him inwardly and outwardly, as he has appointed.

For the service of God is twofold, or of two sorts; the true and the false. The true is called true religion, true faith, and godliness. The false is called superstition, idolatry, and ungodliness. For the true service of God springs from the true fear of God, from a sincere faith, which submits itself in all things to the will of God.¹ The false service consists in the contrary: touching which we will say more when we come to speak of superstition.

The true service of God is divided again, for perspicuity or plainness' sake, into the inward service of God, and the outward. The inward service is known to God alone, who is the searcher of hearts. For it is occupied in the fear of God, and perfect obedience, in faith, hope, and charity, from which spring the worship of God, calling upon him, thanksgiving, patience, perseverance, chastity, innocence, well-doing, and the rest of the fruits of the Spirit.

For God, who is a Spirit, is truly served with these gifts of God and spiritual things. Without these, no service is allowed by God, however gay, glorious and pure it may seem in the sight of men. This service of God has testimonies both divine and human; but first of all from the law, the prophets, and the apostles. For Moses says in the law:

"And now, Israel, what does the Lord your God require of you, but that you should fear the Lord your God, and walk in all his ways, that you should love him, and that you should serve the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, that you should keep the commandments of the Lord, and his ordinances, which I command you this day for your wealth?" Deu 10.12-13

Micah the prophet Mic 6.8 brings in someone asking questions concerning the true service of God, in what it consists of, and Micah answers: "I will show you,² O man, what is good, and what the Lord requires of you: surely to do justly (or judgment), to love mercy, and to humble yourself to walk with your God." ³ St. Paul the apostle says: "I beseech you, brethren, by the mercies of God, that you give your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God (which is) your reasonable serving of God. And do not fashion yourselves like this world, but be changed by the renewing of your mind, that you may prove what is the will of God, and what is good and acceptable and perfect." Rom 12.1 The same apostle says, comprehending in a few words the true service of God, which is turning from idols to God and the faith of Jesus Christ: "Those of Macedonia and other nations (or quarters), show how you have turned to God from idols, that you might serve the living and true God, and look for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, who delivers us from the wrath to come." 1Th 1.9-10 Moreover, St. James the apostle Jas 1.27 says: "Pure religion and undefiled before God the Father is this: to visit the fatherless (or orphans) and widows in their adversity, and to keep himself unspotted by the world." ⁴

These divine and evident testimonies of holy scripture declare plentifully enough, dearly beloved, which is the true inward service of God. Nevertheless, there are many human testimonies, in no way disagreeing with the divine, found everywhere in ecclesiastical writers. Lactantius says: "Therefore the knowledge of God and his service is all in all. In this consists all the hope and salvation of man. This is the first step (or degree) of wisdom: that we should know who our true Father is, that we should reverence him alone with due godliness, that we should obey him, and most devoutly serve him; and to obtain his favour, let all labour, care, and industry be bestowed." ⁵ The same author cites six other manifest testimonies of this kind, also largely in the tenth chapter of the same book, and in the first chapter of his book, de vero Dei Cultu.¹ But instead of many, we like citing that one testimony, touching the true service of God, freely uttered by the mouth of a Roman martyr ² before judge Asclepiades, at the Roman consistory. For after he had both courageously and religiously told what God is in His person and in His substance, he adds this:

You know God: now understand as well
 The form and manner how he served is;
 What kind of church it is where he does dwell;
 What gifts to give he thought it not amiss;
 What vows he asks: whom he (beside all this)
 Will have his priests, and in his church likewise
 What he commands to bring for sacrifice.

Unto himself, even in the mind of man,
 A church he has vouchsafed up to rear;

A lively, feeling, breathing church, which can Not sundred be, fair, beautiful, and clear,
 And never like destruction's dint to fear,
 With lofty top, and painted pleasantly
 With colours fresh of great diversity. God's priest.

At th' holy porch a priest is standing there,
 And keeps the doors before the church which been.
 Faith is her name, a virgin chaste and clear,
 Her hair tied up with fillets like a queen.
 For sacrifices simple, pure, and clean,
 And which she knows are pleasing, bids this priest
 Offer to God, and to his dear Son Christ;

A shamefac'd look, a meek and harmless heart,
 The rest of peace, a body pure and chaste,
 The fear of God, which sinners does convert:
 The rule likewise of knowledge truly plac'd,
 A sober fast from all excessive waste
 Of gluttony, a hope which does not faint,
 A liberal hand which gives without restraint.

From these oblations a vapour does arise,
 Which savours sweet by virtue's force compels:
 It does ascend and pierce the azure skies;
 The scent of balm and saffron it excels,
 Yea frankincense, and Persian spices smells:
 From earth to heaven it mounts up aloft,
 And pleases God therewith delighted oft. ³

¹ et luculentissima de vero Dei Cultu, cap. 1. Lat.; and (the same author) gives the most clear description of the true worship of God in the first chapter (of the same book). The sixth book of Lactantius Institutes is entitled, De Vero Cultu.

And so forth as follows to this purpose. These things I think are sufficient, concerning the inward service of God. I confess, in the meanwhile, that they may also be somewhat referred to the outward service of God.

The outward service of God springs from the inward. Nor is it known to God alone, as this other is, but it is open to the judgment of man. And it is keeping or executing the rites instituted by God himself, by which we both testify to men that inward service and also practise these rites to the glory of God and our profit. Among the ancient people, this kind included the temple, the priesthood, and all the ceremonies instituted by God, which are very often called the service of God. And this service had its appointed limits; for it was not lawful for everyone to feign service of God according to their own pleasure, as shown at large in the law and the holy history.

Now, I declared when I was in hand with the Jewish ¹ ceremonies, that outward service to the glory of God and the profit of the faithful. Furthermore, just as Christ abrogated those old rites, so he placed again a very few in their stead. For he instituted a holy assembly, in which His will is that his word should be preached and expounded out of the holy scripture to his own glory and to our profit; common prayer is to be made; and the sacraments are to be ministered and received. A convenient place, fit time, due order, and holy instruments are necessary to these things. In these things, again, the godly follow their own wills in none of it; for they fetch the whole manner and order of serving from the word of that God whom they serve. Something is said of this in the fourth commandment of the first tablet, and more will be said at large, in its due place and order.

To be short, God is served outwardly by those who, by faith and obedience, gather themselves into the holy assembly at fixed times; who keep the ecclesiastical discipline derived from the word of God; who hear the word of God, or the holy exposition of the sacred scriptures; who pray publicly with the church; who religiously participate in the sacraments; and who observe other lawful and wholesome rites or ceremonies. By their service they glorify God among men, and receive from God no small reward,² namely, his blessing, and increase of heavenly gifts.

I think there is no need in this place, from testimonies of scripture, to confirm these things that we have said up to here touching the outward service of God. For very many are to be found everywhere in the history of the Gospel, in the Acts and Epistles of the Apostles. For the Lord Jesus everywhere gathers holy assemblies together, to whom he preaches the gospel, and commends prayer. He says of Mary sitting at his feet and hearing his preaching: "This one thing is necessary; Mary has chosen the good part, which shall not be taken from her." And in another place: "Blessed are they," he says, "who hear the word of God, and keep it." Surely the Lord himself instituted and put in use the sacraments. For when John did not consent to baptize Jesus at his request, John said, "I need to be baptized by you, and you come to me?" Jesus answered, "Let it be so now: for it becomes us to fulfil all righteousness." The apostle Paul, diligently commending ecclesiastical discipline to the churches, likewise most decently ordained holy assemblies for it. The places are very well known to all; 1Cor 11.14, 16; 1Tim 2.1, 8-12; and elsewhere.

But before I conclude this place, I will show that only God is to be served. And surely the service itself, which we have treated up to here, cannot be bestowed upon any creature, nor upon angels or celestial saints; it is for God alone. Therefore, none is so blind as not to see that God alone must be served with these. And when God requires his service or duty from us, he requires our whole heart: nothing therefore is left for us to bestow upon others.

Moses, full of the Spirit of God, says in his law: "You shall walk after the Lord your God, and fear him; his commandments you shall keep; and you shall hearken to his voice, and him you shall serve, and cling to him." Nor does it matter that here the word "alone" is not added, seeing that the words are uttered with an emphasis or force. For when he says, "him you shall serve, and to him you shall cling," what else do we understand, than it is to him and not to any other, and thus to him alone? Furthermore, in the sixth chapter of Deuteronomy, you do not read, "You shall fear the Lord your God, and you shall serve him alone, and you shall swear by his name;" Rather, "You shall fear the Lord your God, and him (emphatically) you shall serve, and you shall swear by his name." Furthermore, in the gospel the Lord, brings these words of the law against the tempter, making the emphasis plain, "It is written," (he says), "You shall worship the Lord your God, and him only shall you serve." Doubtless, this testimony only, being most effectual and pithy, is sufficient for our demonstration, that God alone is to be served.

I will add to this, moreover, the testimony of a man, yet established by divine authority, which we also set down elsewhere in our books. St. Augustine, de Quantitate Animae, shows that God alone is to be served in this way:

"Whatever the soul serves as God, it is needful that she thinks it better than herself. But we must believe that neither the earth, nor the sea, nor the stars, nor the moon, nor the sun, nor anything at all that may be felt, or seen with these eyes — to be short, not heaven itself, which cannot be seen by us — is better than the nature of the soul. Indeed, assured reason convinces that all these are far worse than any soul." ¹

And shortly after;

"Therefore, if there are any other things that God has created, some are worse, and some are as good as the soul — worse, such as the soul of a beast; and equal, such as the angels; but nothing is better. And if some of these happen to be better, this comes to pass by sin and not by nature. Notwithstanding, if it is made less bad by sin, the soul of a beast is still not to be preferred before it, nor is it to be compared with it. Therefore, God alone is to be worshipped by the soul, for He alone is the author of it. And as for any other man, however wise and perfect, or any soul that is endued with reason and most blessed, these are to be loved and followed only according to merit and order. Only that which agrees with and is fitting for them is to be exhibited to them. For it is written, 'You shall worship the Lord your God, and Him only shall you serve.'" ²

These are St. Augustine's words. And this far we have treated one God only that is to be served — living, true, and everlasting.

Moreover, those who cling to God with a sincere faith, and worship, call upon, and serve one God lawfully, are rightly named religious. Their study and actions are true religion. Some would have religion derived a relinquendo,³ because thereby we leave or forsake false gods, all errors and earthly desires, and seek after the true God, after truth and heavenly things. Massurius Sabinus says: "That is religious for which we severally set aside some things for holiness' sake. The word 'religion' has its name a relinquendo, as Ceremonies a carendo." ⁴ But M. Cicero supposes that Religio is so-called a relegendo (from selecting or putting apart), because those who are religious carefully choose all things which seem to belong to the service of the gods.

But he is confuted, in many words, by Lactantius Firmianus, an ancient writer of the church, Lib. Instit. iv. cap. 28. Among other things, he says:

"We are born on this condition: that being born, we might do just and due service to God, that we should know him alone, and that we should follow him. We are strictly bound and tied to God with this bond of godliness, from which religion itself took her name... We said that the name of religion was derived from the bond of godliness, because God has tied and bound man to himself in godliness: for it is needful that we serve Him as a lord, and obey Him as a father."

Also other ecclesiastical writers such as Jerome and Augustine, following Lactantius, derived religion a religando, i.e., from tying or binding. For Jerome says in his commentary on the ninth chapter of Amos: "This bundle of the Lord, who is one, is tied up with religion. Religion therefore took her name a religando, from tying together, and binding into the Lord's bundle." ² And Augustine in his book de Quantitate Animae, chapter 36, says: "True religion is where the soul ties herself through reconciliation to one God, from whom she had broken away, as it were, through sin." ³ The same Augustine says in his book, de Vera religione, last chapter: "Let religion tie us to one God Almighty, from which it is believed to be named religion." ⁴

We say, therefore, that true religion is none other than a friendship, a knitting, and a unity (or a league) with the true, living, and everlasting God — to whom being linked by a true faith, we worship, call upon, and serve him alone. We wholly depend upon him, living in all things according to his will, or according to the prescript, rule, and law of his word. Therefore, the whole matter of salvation and faith is most rightly comprised in this one word, religion. Elsewhere in scripture it is called a league or covenant; and again, a marriage or wedlock. For just as those who are confederate are united and made one by a league, so God and man are knit together by religion: and just as the husband and wife are made one body by marriage, so we are knit into a spiritual body with God by religion, as with a husband; Isa 54.5 and with the very Son of God as our bridegroom Mat 9.15 and head. Eph 5.23 Therefore, to this belongs whatever things are said in the scriptures about keeping a league or covenant, and about the faithfulness of marriage. Whoever is not knit to one God by faith, and does not worship him alone, call upon him through Christ, and serve him as He himself said in his word he would be served, are truce-breakers, disloyal, and infamous through their adultery.

They are also called superstitious. For superstition is false religion, which does not serve God but something else for God, or not God alone, or not rightly or lawfully. This word superstition stretches itself even to old wives' tales and doting errors: for in Dutch we call superstition, aberglauben, mis-glauben, und mis-bruch. But Lactantius reasoned most exactly about this word. In his fourth book, Institutions, twenty-eighth chapter, he writes in this way:

"Religion is the service of the true God; superstition is the service of the false god. Those who wish their children to outlive them are not said to be superstitious (for we all wish that); but those are called superstitious who either reverence the memory of the dead; or else those who — while their parents were alive — worshipped their images within their houses, like household gods. For those who took for themselves new rites, with the intent they might, instead of gods, honour the dead, whom they thought were taken from among men and received into heaven — those (I say) were called superstitious.

But those who worshipped and served public and ancient gods, they called religious, upon which Virgil says:

Vain superstition, ignorant
Of the old and ancient gods.

But seeing that our ancients, in a similar manner, have been consecrated gods after their death, those who serve such false gods are therefore superstitious. But we are religious, who pray and make our supplications to one God, being the true God," etc. ¹

Superstition consists chiefly in these points: (1) when the Lord is not served, but other gods are served in his stead, with the only one, true, and living God being left and forsaken; or (2) when the Lord is served, but not alone; other strange gods are served together with him; or (3) when he is served, it is not with his lawful service.

The Gentiles offended in the first kind of superstition. ² They did not know the true God; and so, instead of Him, they worshipped false, imagined, or strange gods. And the holy prophet Jeremiah is a witness that the Israelites, God's people, were also sick with the same madness. Expostulating and reasoning the matter with the people, he says:

"Hear the word of the Lord, house of Jacob and all the families of the house of Israel. Thus says the Lord, What iniquity have your fathers found in me, that they have gone far from me, and have walked after vanity, and have become vain? For did they not say, Where is the Lord that brought us out of the land of Egypt; that led us through the wilderness, through a desert and wasteland, through a dry land, and by the shadow of death, by a land that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt?

And I brought you into a plentiful country, to eat the fruit and commodities of it. But when you entered, you defiled my land, and made my heritage an abomination. The priests did not say, Where is the Lord? And those who should minister the law, did not know me. The pastors also offended against me; and the prophets prophesied by Baal, and went after things that did not profit (or they followed idols). Therefore I will yet plead with you, says the Lord; and I will plead with your children's children. For go to the isles of Chittim ³ and behold; and send to Kedar, and take diligent heed; and see whether there are such things. Has any nation exchanged their gods, which yet are no gods? But my people have exchanged their glory for that which does not profit (or for an idol). O you heavens, be astonished at this; be afraid, and utterly confounded, says the Lord. For my people have committed two evils: they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and they have dug themselves pits,⁴ even broken pits, that can hold no water." Jer 2.4-13

You hear that the people of Israel forsook God, the living spring, by a heinous offence, and for which no amends might be made; and they dug broken pits for themselves. The "waters" signify the perfect good, with which the desire of both the soul and body may be satisfied. Such a plentiful spring is God alone, the highest, most excellent, and most perfect good. This being forsaken, they dug — that is, with very great pains and costs, they provided themselves pits. They turned to creatures, things that are not gods, and are unable to satisfy their desires. This mischief is also common even today. Many, having forsaken God, have turned to celestial saints, from whom they desire that which was to be desired from God — things that cannot be given except by God alone.

Here idolatry is found — that is, in worshipping images. For not only are those superstitious who imagine false gods for themselves (having forsaken the true God), or that put their trust in things that are nothing; but also those who worship and reverence the images either of God, or of gods. For images or counterfeits are set up either to the true God himself, or else to false gods — they are set up to creatures (I say).

But it is not lawful to represent, by any image or counterfeit, the exceeding great, everlasting, and living God, world without end. Nor is it lawful to worship or serve him, expressing it by an image or likeness. Much less, therefore, is it lawful to consecrate images or counterfeits to creatures, to worship and serve them. There are very many testimonies of scripture against idolatry, as in Exo 20.4-5; Isa 40.18-19; 44.9-17; Psa 115.4-8; 1Cor 6.9, 10.7; Rom 1.22-24; Gal 5.19-20; 1Th 1.9; 1Pet 4.3; 1Joh 5.21; Jer 10.1-5; etc. Furthermore, I diligently admonish the simpler sort here, that they not allow themselves to be deceived. For none can avoid being called an idolater, who worships, reverences, and fears images; who puts some part of his confidence in them; who lies down before them; who offers them gifts; who keeps them in a place of solemnity and honour; who sticks up tapers and burns incense to them; who loves, beautifies, maintains, enriches, and serves them with any kind of sacrifice or holy service whatsoever. But concerning idolatry, we have spoken very largely elsewhere.¹

Furthermore, they served the God of Israel (who doubts it?); yet not the true God alone, but with other gods also. We read of this in the history of the kings: "And yet they served (or feared) the Lord: and they appointed priests (even of the basest) for themselves for the high places, who prepared for them sacrifices in the houses of the high places. And when they served the Lord, they served their own gods also, in the manner of the nations from which they were brought into Samaria." And again: "So these nations feared the Lord, but served their images also; so did their children, and their children's children: as their fathers did, so they do to this day." This mischief, in like manner, is altogether common today. For a man may find worshippers and servers of God who will not be persuaded by anyone that God alone is to be served — even boldly affirming that it is flat and damnable heresy to deny that saints are to be worshipped, called upon, and served together with God. We have sufficiently argued against them elsewhere,² and in our present sermon also.

Next to be likewise marked here, comes the diverse manner and sundry fashion of serving God superstitiously. For someone serves God superstitiously, first, who pretends or imagines a god in his mind, and then expresses that same god by an image or counterfeit. He later offers sacrifices and incense to this image; and lying prostrate on the ground, he worships in its presence, and suppliantly serves it with all reverence. This is not the only way, but someone also principally serves God superstitiously, by communicating the incommunicable properties of God to creatures, even if he does not express God by a representation, likeness, or counterfeit. Or he serves superstitiously, if he thinks that the gifts which he has received from heaven at the hands of God, are given and bestowed on him by celestial saints. Furthermore, the incommunicable properties of God are to do all things, know all things, be present in every place, hear all things, help, succour, or assist, and being loving, bountiful, just, righteous, and merciful.

Truly Isaiah, the best learned of the prophets and of singular authority, proves and convinces by the strongest and most substantial arguments or reasons, that the gods of the Babylonians and Gentiles, are not gods: "Because they cannot foretell or know things that are to come later, nor can they do good or evil." For being able to enrich and store with all manner of benefits, and to chastise with due deserved punishments — also, to know all things, and have the power to compass and do all things — these are the properties of God alone, communicable to no creature. Someone is superstitious, therefore, who attributes these properties to celestial saints, and for that cause serves and calls upon them. Hosea the prophet very sorely inveighs against the Jews, who gave and attributed the gifts of God to strange gods, insomuch that he says their synagogues are of a strumpet or harlot. "I will have no pity on her children (God says), for they are the children of fornications. For their mother has played the harlot. She who conceived them has done shamefully. For she said, I will go after my lovers who give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax, my oil and my drink." ^{Hos 2.4-5} And shortly after: "Now she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil; and multiplied (or gave her much) her silver and gold, which they bestowed even upon Baal." ^{Hos 2.8}

And it is still done much today, to ascribe to celestial saints and not to the only God, the increase of the earth, and the temperate or sharp seasons of the year, as though they came from them. But that is superstition, not godliness or religion.

Furthermore, God is superstitiously served, when indeed he is served alone, yet not in a lawful manner. Unlawful service proceeds from the will and imagination of men; and it is contrary to the word and ordinance of God. For God is lawfully served, when he is served according to his own will and word. In the law, the Lord commanded has thus: "Beware that you do not seek after the gods of the Gentiles, saying, How did these nations serve their gods, that I may do likewise? You shall not do so to the Lord your God, etc. (Therefore) whatever I command you, take heed that you do it. You shall add nothing to it, nor take anything from it." ^{Deu 12.30-32} Nadab and Abihu offer strange fire to the Lord: therefore they are burned up in the presence of the Lord with fire from heaven. ^{Num 3.4} Uzzah also perished, because he handled the ark of God otherwise than the Lord had commanded in his law. ^{2Sam 6.6-7} In the book of Judges, Micah instituted an image, an altar, a chapel, and a service to the true God, whose name is Jehovah. ^{Jdg 17.5} But it is reprov'd in the sacred scripture, because it was not only not fetched outside of the holy scripture, but in all respects it was quite contrary and utterly against the law of God. Jeroboam also ordained a surpassing sumptuous service; he instituted cathedral churches, and set up golden images, all to the God of Israel. ^{1Kng 12.27-33} But because they were not agreeable to the word of the Lord, they are altogether utterly condemned for execrable and accursed sacrileges. Indeed, what are we to think in general about all the services which are neither instituted by God, nor agreeable with the word of God, but conceived with a good intent and meaning of our own? That unique testimony of the most excellent prophet Samuel declares it to us, when he pronounced it against Saul and his sacrifices in these words: "Has the Lord as great a pleasure in burnt-offerings and sacrifices, as when the voice of the Lord is obeyed? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken is better than the fat of rams. For rebellion is like the sin of witchcraft, and transgression is wickedness and idolatry." ^{1Sam 15.22}

This supports what we read in Isaiah: "He that kills a bullock is as if he slayed a man; he that sacrifices a sheep, as if he cut off a dog's neck; he that offers an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that remembers incense, as if he blessed an idol. They have chosen all these things in their own ways, and their soul is delighted in their own abominations." ^{Isa 66.3} Vain and abominable, therefore, are those services which are not kept and framed to the pure word of God. For the same prophet says, "In vain they serve me, teaching doctrines of men." ^{Isa 29.13}

4-5. THE FIFTH SERMON: OF WORSHIPPING GOD IN TRUTH.

May the living, true, and everlasting God, who would and should only and alone be worshipped, called upon, and served, give true religion to all men, and deliver them from all vain superstition, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Son Is begotten of the Father, unspeakably, from everlasting.

4-6. THE SIXTH SERMON: OF THE SON AS TRUE GOD AND MAN.

THAT THE SON OF GOD IS UNSPEAKABLY BEGOTTEN OF THE FATHER; THAT HE IS CONSUBSTANTIAL WITH THE FATHER, AND THEREFORE TRUE GOD. THAT THE SELF-SAME SON IS TRUE MAN; CONSUB-STANTIAL WITH US: AND THEREFORE TRUE GOD AND MAN, ABIDING IN TWO UNCONFOUNDED NATURES, AND IN ONE UNDIVIDED PERSON.

THE things themselves and their order require, that after I have spoken generally about God, of his unity, and of his trinity, I further treat particularly the persons of the reverend Trinity. First of all, our Lord Jesus Christ, true God and man; then the Holy Ghost. If our minds are endued with these, then whatever things we speak and hear will tend to the glory of God's name, and to the salvation of our souls. Let us therefore pray, etc.

The everlasting Father, the origin and author of all things, begot the Son by an everlasting and unspeakable begetting. For the whole scripture with one agreement calls God a Father — yes truly, an eternal or everlasting Father. But none is a father of himself, but a father of his son.

And because he is the everlasting Father, he must necessarily have an everlasting Son, equal to himself in all respects, co-eternal, and consubstantial with him. St. Paul undoubtedly, to confirm this catholic verity, alleges two testimonies ^{Heb 1.5} out of the old Testament: "To which of his angels did God say at any time, you are my Son, this day have I begotten you?" ^{Psa 2.7} And again, "I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son." ^{2Sam 7.14} All these words he applies to Christ Jesus, the Son of God. Micah also bears witness of him, saying: "And you, Bethlehem Ephrathah, are little to be among the thousands of Judah; yet out of you he shall come forth to me, who shall be the ruler in Israel: whose goings forth" (or spreadings abroad) "have been from the beginning and from everlasting." ^{Mic 5.2} Upon which, the Son of God himself says in the Gospel according to John: "Truly I say to you, Before Abraham was, I am." ^{Joh 8.58} And John says: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was the Word." ^{Joh 1.1} But what he means by "The Word," is not the word which is spoken and so vanishes, and not the counsel of God, but the person of the Son. For later he adds, "And the Word became" (or was made) "flesh." And we know that the Son of God, not the determination or purpose of God (as heretics vainly imagine), was incarnate. And he that was incarnate in time, was with the Father from everlasting and before all beginnings; and therefore he is also true God with the true God. For "The Word," he says, "was with God, and God was the Word:" because in the beginning — namely, from everlasting — he was with God.

These simple and plain testimonies concerning the everlasting begetting of the Son by the Father, delivered to us out of the scriptures (and therefore most true), are sufficient I think, for those who are not curious.¹ For the scripture here does not fulfil the vain desires of curious men, nor reason subtly about these points; but rather, it delivers and sets down only a few things which it is our part to believe. But what the scripture either does not set down, or else foreshadows in few words, we are either ignorant of to our health, or else, sticking to what is set down, we do not seek further.

The holy father Cyril says this, expounding that saying of the evangelist John, "In the beginning was the Word":

"Seeking infinite things which cannot be contained within bounds, let us not busy our brains about a consideration that cannot be expressed, and can never have an end. For we will not grant a beginning of beginning; nor will we yield that the Son was begotten by the Father in time. But we will confess that he is with the Father from everlasting. For if he was in the beginning, what mind may ever be able to climb beyond that word "was"? Or when will we so comprehend "was" in our mind, that it does not go before or overreach our thoughts? It was for good and worthy reasons, therefore, that the prophet Isaiah, being astonished, cries out, "And who will declare his generation [or age]? For surpassing all capacity of minds, and being far above and beyond all reason of man, He is unspeakable."

And shortly after he says:

"Because the Son is before all worlds, he cannot be begotten in time: but he is evermore in the Father as in a fountain. As he says of himself, 'I went out and came from the Father.' For we understand the Father as a fountain, in whom the Word is his wisdom, his power, the engraved form of his person, his brightness, and his image. This is why, if there was never any time in which the Father was without his wisdom, his power, the engraved form of his person, his brightness, and finally his image, then we must of necessity and force confess that the Son is co-eternal and everlasting with him, since the Son is the wisdom, power, etc. of the Father everlasting. For how is he the engraved form of his Father's person, or how is he the most perfect image of his Father, unless he has perfectly obtained and possesses the beauty of the one whose image he is? And it is not absurd that we said the Son is to be understood in the Father, as in a fountain. For the term fountain signifies nothing else than that from which [something flows]. And the Son is in the Father, and from the Father — not flowing abroad, but either as brightness flows from the sun, or as heat from the fire with which it is endued. For in these examples, we see that one is brought forth from the other, and both are so co-everlasting, that one cannot be without the other, nor can they keep and retain the quality of their nature.

For how would it be the sun if it is deprived of its brightness; or how would brightness be, unless there is a sun from which it comes? And how would it be a fire if it lacks heat? Or where would heat come from if not from the fire, or from something else perhaps not far distant from the substantial quality of fire? Therefore, as the qualities which proceed from these bodies are together with the ones from which they proceed, and evermore declare where they come from; so it is to be understood in the only-begotten Son. For he is understood to be from the Father, and likewise believed to be in the Father: not differing from the nature of his Father, nor second in nature to his Father, but always in the Father himself, and with him, and from him, according to the manner of his unspeakable begetting." ¹

And these points surely concerning the Father, and the unspeakable begetting of the Son of God, are to be steadfastly believed according to the scriptures.

Furthermore, touching the Son of God, let us firmly hold and undoubtedly believe that he is consubstantial (or, of the same substance) with his Father, and therefore he is true God. The self-same Son, being incarnate for us and made man, subsists in either nature, God as well as man — nonetheless, these natures are neither confounded between themselves, nor divided. For we believe that the one and self-same Lord Jesus Christ is true God and true man. We will plainly declare to you, all and every one of these points, throughout their parts, according to the measure of grace that God gives us.

The ecclesiastical history testifies that there has been a long and great altercation among the ancient writers about the word homoousius, which the Latinists have agreeably translated consubstantial, consubstantial. What it signifies, and how it was taken by that most famous and solemn synod of Nicaea, the most learned and godly Eusebius Pamphili, bishop of Caesarea, briefly and pithily expounded in this way:

"In that the Son is said to be consubstantial with the Father, it has an express signification, because the Son of God has no similitude or likeness with creatures that were made, but is resembled and likened to the Father alone who begat him; nor is he of any other substance, essence, or being, than that of the Father."

And shortly after he says:

"To this statement and opinion, expounded in this manner, it appears we may well subscribe — seeing that we know the best learned and famous bishops and interpreters among the ancients used this word homoousius, reasoning about the Godhead of the Father and the Son." These are Socrates' words in his first book of histories, the eighth chapter.¹

Surely the godly governors of churches, being constrained by the hypocrisy, craftiness, and malice of heretics, used and caused others also to use, words that were most pithy and as little doubtful as possible. Thereby partly they might manifestly express the sound truth, and partly discover and reprove — yes, and also thrust out — the deceits and malicious practices of heretics. Arius confessed that the Son of God was God; but meanwhile he denied that the Son was consubstantial with his Father. Thus, he declared that he did not sincerely confess the true Godhead of the Son. Nor is it any great matter that some apt and fit word is not expressed in the holy scripture, to set out and declare the thing in so many letters as it is written in another tongue — for what we read manifestly expressed in the scriptures, is what that word signifies. Therefore, if we show that the Son is of the same substance or nature with the Father, and thus is equal with and like God, and one with him, then we have made a sufficient and plentiful demonstration that the Son is homoousius, or consubstantial with the Father. The prophet Zechariah says, bringing in the person of God speaking: "Arise, O you sword, upon my shepherd, and upon the man that is my fellow (or my co-equal): strike the shepherd, and the sheep (of the flock) shall be scattered abroad." Zec 13:7 Look, God calls the shepherd; that is, He struck his fellow or co-equal. And the history of the gospel declares who that shepherd was who was struck — pointing out to us the very Son of God himself, our Lord Jesus Christ. Nor does it hinder but furthers our cause, that Jerome does not read it, "The man who is co-equal with me," but "The man clinging to me." For he does not deny that *Amiuth*² signifies co-equal, but he sets down another word that is no less effectual.

For when he translates it, "The man clinging to me," he would express the inward and very substantial (if I may so term it) inherence or co-equality of the Father and the Son. For he adds in his commentaries: "And the man who clings to God — who is it but even he that says, I am in the Father, and the Father in me?"³

³ Jerome proceeds to explain "vir cohierens Deo," by Joh 14.10, and Luk 23.46. — Jerome, Opp. Tom. iii. p. 1789. Par. 1704.

Again we read in the gospel of John: "The Jews therefore sought to kill Jesus, not only because he had broken the sabbath-day, but also because — ἀλλὰ καὶ πατέρα ἴδιον ἔλεγε τὸν Θεόν — he said that God was his Father (even his proper, or very own), thus making himself (ἴσον, ison) equal to God." ^{Joh 5:18} Furthermore, the Grecians expound ἴσος (isos) that is to say, equal, by this word, ομοίος (omoios) that is to say, like. Nor can that equality be found anywhere else than in the substance. For the Jews understand that of which the Arians would be ignorant: that the Lord calls God his Father in a certain unique and special manner; namely, ἴδιον (idion), his proper or very own Father, by nature or by birth, of whom the Son, being naturally begotten, is natural and consubstantial with his Father. For it follows: "Making himself equal to (or with) God," ^{Joh 5:18} namely in virtue or power, in everlastingness, and in essence. For the same Lord says in the same evangelist: "I proceeded and came from God." ^{Joh 8:42} He did not say only, "I came," but "I proceeded." He proceeded from the Father, such a one in substance as the Father is — surely, "Light of light, very God of very God." For he says again to the Jews: "Truly I say to you, Before Abraham was, I am." ^{Joh 8:58} He does not say, "I have been," or "I will be;" but "I am;" alluding to the name of the Lord Jehovah, ^{Exo 3:14} and declaring that the substance of his Godhead is the very same as the substance of the Father; and he is therefore consubstantial with the Father. For yet again he says more plainly: "I and the Father are one:" ^{Joh 10:30} one, I say, not in concord or agreement, but in self-sameness ¹ and in being; for the power and majesty of God are handled in that place.

And when the Jews would without further delay stone the Lord to death, having spoken these words, they declared plainly enough what they understood his words to mean: for they stoned blasphemers to death, who with revilings either impaired God's glory, or else usurped and took it for themselves.

To this belongs what Paul said concerning the Son of God: "Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of all creatures, because all things were created by him." ^{Col 1:15-16} For if he is the image of the invisible God, then he must be a fellow (or co-equal) with God. For in another place Paul calls the same Christ, "the engraved form of God, and his express image," ^{Heb 1:3} and corresponding in all respects most truly to His pattern or first figure. Truly, an image and likeness is of something that is not unequal or unlike, but equal and alike. And he is called "the first born," because he is Prince and Lord, ² not reckoned among creatures. For all things that were made, were made by him. Therefore, he is not a creature, but true God — namely, of the nature and substance of God, and one with the Father.

The same apostle says to the Philippians, that the Son is "in the form (or shape) of God." ^{Phi 2:6} But to be in the form (or shape) of God is nothing else than to be a fellow (or equal) with God in all respects, to be consubstantial with him, and so indeed, to be God himself. For what it is to be in the form or shape of God, is manifestly declared by the contrary clause. For it follows: "He took upon himself the form of a servant." ^{Phi 2:6-8} This is again expounded by what follows: "Being made in the likeness of men;" that is to say, being made very man, like all other men in everything but sin (which is plainly expressed in another place). ^{Heb 4:15} And here he adds again, "And found in figure as a man." ^{Phi 2:8} Therefore, to be in the form of God is to be co-equal and consubstantial with God — for he adds, "He thought it no robbery to be equal with God." ^{Phi 2:6} For robbery is taking away that which another owns; for it is possessed by injury. The Son, therefore, is co-equal with the Father, and true God by nature and in the most proper manner.

² See p. iii.130.

And this is the meaning of St. Paul' words: even though the Son was of the same glory and majesty as the Father, and could have remained in his glory without humiliation or debasement, yet he would rather abase himself — that is to say, take to himself the nature of a man, and cast himself into dangers, yes, even into death itself. For otherwise, he suffered no change according to his Godhead; for God is unchangeable and without variableness.

Since the case so stands, what St. Ambrose says in his book against the Arians, de Fide, fifth chapter, is a godly saying: "Seeing, therefore, that you know this unity of substance in the Father and the Son, not only by the authority of the prophets, but also by the gospel, how can you say that Homoousius, consubstantial, is not found in the sacred scriptures? It is as though Homoousius were something else than what he says here: 'I went out from God the Father,' and 'I and the Father are one,'" etc. ¹ The scholar St. Augustine in his controversy with Pascentius, follows his master Ambrose, and confirms Homoousius by places in scripture, and declares that this is holily used in our faith and religion.² He also does the same in his third book against Maximinus, bishop of the Arians, fourteenth chapter.³ But what need is there to heap up more words? For I trust it is plainly enough declared by evident places of holy scripture, that the Son is consubstantial with the Father, and that it must be so believed. We also hope that in the treatise following, this self-same point will be made not a little manifest by testimonies of scriptures.

Arius with his accomplices denied that the Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, is true God. But the most true scripture so evidently proves and confirms it, that none who loves the truth from his heart can doubt anything at all about it. We will presently cite some testimonies and arguments that are most plain and apparent, whereby our faith may be established, and the catholic and sound truth itself be made manifest, through the assistance of the Holy Ghost.

In the third chapter of Matthew, the heavens are opened to our Lord as he was baptized by John the Baptist, and the Holy Ghost came down in the likeness of a dove, and alighted upon the head of our Lord Jesus Christ. And immediately a voice was heard out of the clouds, pronounced by the glorious God in this way: "This is my beloved Son, in whom my soul is well pleased." ^{Mat 3.17} And John says in his gospel: "I saw the Spirit descending from heaven in the likeness of a dove, and it abode upon him; and I did not know him, but He that sent me to baptize with water said to me, Upon whom you see the Spirit descending and abiding upon him, this is he which baptizes with the Holy Ghost. And I saw and bare witness that this is the Son of God." ^{Joh 1.32-34} To this belongs what Peter said, being asked by the Lord, "But whom do you say that I am?" He answered in the name of all the disciples; "You are that Christ, the Son of the living God." ^{Mat 16.15-16} And again, the Lord questions him, "Will you also be gone?" Peter again answered in the name of them all; "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of everlasting life. And we believe and have known that you are Christ, the Son of the living God." ^{Joh 6.67-69} We too are truly called the sons of God, yet by adoption: but Christ is not by adoption, nor by imputation, but he is of God — by nature. For in the fourteenth chapter of Mark, the high priest says to our Lord: "Are you Christ, the Son of the blessed?" ^{Mar 14.61} In Matthew also, the same high priest says: "I adjure (or charge) you by the living God, that you tell us whether you are the Son of the living God. Jesus answered, I am. For you shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven."

This appears to be repeated out of the seventh chapter of Daniel.^{7,13} Furthermore, they bring this confession of the Lord before Pilate as blasphemous, and not to be satisfied except with death, crying: "We have a law, and according to our law he ought to die; because he made himself the Son of God." Joh 19.7 But they themselves in the history of the gospel, thunder out these words against the Lord: "We are not born of fornication; we have one Father, even God." Joh 8.41 It is certain, therefore, that the Jews accused our Saviour for no other cause of high treason committed against God's majesty, than for naming himself the natural and not the adopted Son of God; for the last did not deserve death, but the first was worthy of death. For we also read in the fifth chapter of John: "Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, not only because he had broken the sabbath-day, but also because he said that God was his Father, making himself equal with God," (or God's fellow). Joh 5.18

Look, you have the manner of how he called himself the Son of God, not by adoption, or reputation, but by nature and substance. For yet again the Lord himself questions those who would have stoned him: "Many good works have I shown you from my Father: for which of these good works do you stone me? The Jews answered again, saying, For your good works" (or well-doing) "we do not stone you, but for blasphemy; namely, because you, being a man, make yourself God." Joh 10.32-33 Look, what could be spoken more plainly? "You make yourself God." And what, I ask you, had he spoken from which they gathered these things? "I give my sheep everlasting life, nor shall they perish forever, nor shall anyone pluck them out of my hand. My Father who gave them to me is greater than all: and none can pull them out of my Father's hand. I and the Father are one." Joh 10.27-30 To give life everlasting belongs to the power of God — to preserve, and to so preserve that none may be able to pluck them out of his hands, belongs to the same power.

Now the Lord proves this statement with this argument or reason: None is able to pull the sheep out of my Father's hands: therefore none can pull them out of my hands. The proof of his antecedent is this: Because the Father is greater than all; that is to say, He is the greatest of all, whose divine power is above all. The proof of his consequent is this: Because I and my Father are one; namely, equal not only in will and agreement, but also in majesty and power (which is what we treat at present) — not equality of concord or agreement, but of power to make alive and to preserve. Touching this, the Lord himself most plentifully discourses throughout the whole fifth chapter of St. John's gospel, showing that he forgives sins, and that by his power, he makes alive and raises up from the dead, even as his Father does — therefore, that he is of one and the same divine power and majesty with God the Father. These things are so evident, plain, and manifest, that even if we had no other testimony, these may abundantly suffice to prove the assertion of the true divinity or very Godhead of the Son of God, that the Son indeed is true and very God.

Again, with great liberty of speech and plainness of words, without any manner of riddle, dark sentence, and obscurity of words, our Lord and Saviour openly and expressly says to his disciples: "Let not your heart be troubled (or vexed). You believe in God, believe also in me. I am the way, the truth, and the life. He that has seen me has seen the Father. Do you not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in me?" Joh 14.1,6,10 And it is certain that Christ our Lord is the heavenly doctor or teacher, the most constant defender of the truth, who has neither seduced nor could seduce and lead us out of the way, no, not so much as one. But [he] bids us to believe in him as true and very God. Therefore, our Lord and Saviour is true and very God. For in another place he says most plainly: "I am the living bread (or the bread of life) that came down from heaven: he that believes in me has life everlasting." Joh 6.51

Again in the gospel, he plainly pronounces and says: "Father, the hour has come; glorify your Son, that your Son may also glorify you, as you have given him power of all flesh, that he might give life everlasting to as many as you have given him. And this is everlasting life: that they should know you, the only true God, and the one whom you have sent, Jesus Christ." Joh 17.1-3

By these words, he has expressly proved both the unity of God (that is to say, that there is but one God), against the ethnics who worshipped many gods; and he notably touched the distinction of the persons, meanwhile declaring himself to be very God with the Father. For he then adds: "Glorify me, O Father, with yourself, with the glory which I had with you before this world was."

Here I think the argument of Tertullian must not be over-looked by me, which I will recite to you, dearly beloved, out of his book, De Trinitate, in which he gathers together many of the soundest and strongest reasons for Christ's divinity or Godhead.

"If Christ is only man, then why has he appointed and set down such a rule to believe, in which he says, 'And this is life everlasting, that they might know you the only true (or very) God, and the one whom you have sent, Jesus Christ?' If he would not be known to be God, then why does he add, 'And whom you have sent, Jesus Christ,' if not that he would also be taken for God? Because if he would not be known to be God, he would have added, And whom you have sent, the man Jesus Christ. But now, Christ has neither added, nor has he delivered to us in doctrine, that he is man only; but he has joined himself to God, to the end that he would be known by this conjunction or joining together, that he is God also, as indeed he is. Therefore, according to the prescribed rule, we must believe in one Lord, true and very God; and consequently, in the one whom He has sent, Jesus Christ. He would by no means have joined himself to the Father, unless he would be known to be God also. For if he would not have been known to be God, then he would have separated himself from the Father. And if he had known that he was man only, he would have placed himself among men only. Nor would he have joined himself with God, if he had not also known himself to be God. Now, he also says nothing touching that he is man, because no man doubts that he is man. And not without good cause, he joins himself to God, that he might set down a form of his divinity or Godhead for those who would believe. If Christ is only man, how is it that he says, 'And now glorify me with the glory which I had with you before the world was?'

If he had glory with God before the world was, and possessed glory with the Father, then he was before the world. Nor would he have had glory if he had not been before, that he might possess such glory — for none can have a thing, unless the one who possesses it, exists beforehand. But Christ had glory before the creation of the world; therefore, he was before the creation of the world. For if he had not been before the creation of the world, then he could not have had glory before the creation of the world, when he himself did not exist. He could not have glory as a man before the creation of the world, if he did not exist when the world was made. But Christ had glory; therefore, he was before the world was made. He was therefore not man only, for he was before the world was made. Therefore he is God, because he was before the world was made, and he possessed glory before the world was made." ¹

After these words, Tertullian shows that these things are not meant of the predestination of Christ, but about his substance. But this far about this.

St. Paul the apostle in his epistle to the Romans, declares in plain words, not once or twice, that our Lord Jesus Christ is true and very God. For speaking of Christ in his ninth chapter, he says: "Who is God in all things to be praised forever." Rom 9.5 The words are very well known which the same apostle writes in his first epistle to the Corinthians, the eighth chapter. 1Cor 8.6 St. John the apostle and evangelist, so manifestly declares the divinity or Godhead of the Son in his canonical epistle, that someone who does not see and perceive it, is blind both in body and mind. In the end of the epistle he says: "We know that the Son of God has come, and has given us a mind, that we should know him who is true: and we are in him that is true, in his Son Jesus Christ. This same one is true (or very) God, and eternal (or everlasting) life." ¹Joh 5.20

Now it is God by "whom we live, move, and have our being," ^{Act 17.28} as Paul witnesses. But it is by Christ our Lord that we live, move, and have our being, as he himself expressly taught in the gospel according to John. ^{Joh 14.6-7} Christ, therefore, is true and very God.

In the forty-third and forty-fifth chapters of Isaiah, the Lord says: "I am, I am the Lord; and there is no Saviour without me." ^{Isa 43.11} "A just God and a Saviour, there is none beside me." ^{Isa 45.21} But Jeremiah in his twenty-third chapter calls Christ the son of David, Jehovah, and our Righteousness. ^{Jer 23.5-6} Likewise in Isaiah, speaking of his Son, the Father says: "I have given (or made) you the light of the Gentiles, that you may be my health [or salvation] to the end of the world." ^{Isa 49.6} Moreover, seeing that there is no other God but one, no other salvation and righteousness save that divine righteousness only, it consequently follows, doubtless, that Christ is true and very God, and in all respects co-equal with his Father.

In the same Isaiah, the Lord says: "I have sworn by myself, the word of righteousness shall go out of my mouth, and it shall not be drawn back again: because every knee shall bow to me, and all tongues shall swear (by my name ¹)." ^{Isa 45.23}

And Paul says: "There is a name given to Christ which is above all names, that in the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, of things on earth, and of things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess that the Lord is Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father." ^{Phi 2.9-11} It must therefore be that Christ is true and very God. For seeing that he is worshipped and also served, seeing that we confess him to be Lord — that surely turns not to the reproach and ignominy, but to the honour and glory, of God the Father. For in the gospel according to John, thus says the Lord: "The Father has given all judgment (namely, all jurisdiction, and all government, all glory, power, and authority) to the Son; that all might honour the Son as they honour the Father. He that honours not the Son, honours not the Father that sent him." ^{Joh 5.22-23} To this therefore belongs what we read in the prophet Isaiah: "I the Lord, Hu is my name,² and my glory I will not give to another," ^{Isa 42.8} (or to a stranger, etc.) But he gives his glory to the Son. Therefore, in his substance, according to his divinity or Godhead, he is not a stranger or severed from the Father, though he is acknowledged to be another individual person. What does the Lord say in the gospel according to John? "And now, Father, glorify you me with yourself, with the glory which you gave me with you before this world was?" No, but instead, "which I had with you before the world was." "I had," he says, not "I received;" though the scripture often uses this word for the mystery of dispensation.

In Micah, the Christians say: "All people (one with another) walk in the name of their God. As for us, we will walk in the name of our God." ^{Mic 4.5} Furthermore, they walk in the name and the way of Jesus Christ, saying in the gospel, "I am the way," ^{Joh 14.6} and "the door:" ^{Joh 10.9} "I am the light of the world; he that follows me does not walk in darkness." ^{Joh 8.12} Who can be ignorant that Christ is therefore God? For the Lord says in Ezekiel, "I will feed my flock, myself alone;" ^{Eze 34.15} and shortly he adds, "My servant David shall feed it;" ^{Eze 34.23} meaning Christ, the son of David, that unique universal pastor or shepherd of the church, and therefore true God.

For the universal pastor or shepherd must be a king and a priest;¹ he must be everlasting; he must know all things; he must be omnipotent; he must be present with all men in all places. The Son of God therefore is true and very God, because he is the Messiah.

Furthermore, what is more manifest and less called into controversy than that only God forgives sins? It must be, therefore, that nothing is more evident and less doubtful than that we believe Christ to be true and very God, because "He is the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world." Joh 1.29

Again, though Paul truly calls Christ "our hope" 1Tim 1.1 (for Isaiah foretold, "In him the Gentiles will trust" Isa 11.10) and though Jeremiah cries, "Cursed be the man who puts his trust in man, but blessed is the man who puts his trust in God;" Jer 17.5, 7 we must necessarily confess that Christ is God. For in John he often repeats: "Truly I say to you, he that believes in me has everlasting life." Joh 11.26

I could bring innumerable examples of this kind out of the scriptures, which witness that the Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, is of one and the same nature as the Father, and therefore is very God of very God. But I trust that to holy hearers who are not given to contention, those which I have already cited will suffice.

It remains that we declare to you, that the Son of God was incarnate for us, and was born very man of the virgin Mary, consubstantial, or of the same substance as us in all points, sin excepted. The law, the prophets, and the apostles, show us most manifest arguments of the true flesh or humanity of the Son of God.

For in the law, the Lord says: "The Seed of the woman shall crush the serpent's head." Gen 3.15 But who does not know that the head of the serpent is the kingdom, force, or power of the devil? And the whole scripture witnesses that Jesus Christ broke this power. And here he is called the Seed of the woman. Truly, he is called seed to verify his true human nature. And he is termed the seed of the woman, not of the man, because of his conception by the Holy Ghost, and his birth by the virgin Mary.

And because she was the daughter of David, of Abraham, and Adam, it follows that the son of Mary was very man. For as we have heard it said to Adam, "The Seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head;" so also we read that the same promise was renewed and repeated to Abraham in these words: "In your seed shall all the nations of the world be blessed." And Paul manifestly says to the Galatians that this Seed of Abraham, in which we have obtained blessing, is Christ Jesus. Gal 3.16 The same apostle says, "For in no way did he take the angels, but he took the seed of Abraham" — by angels doubtless excluding all manner of spiritual substances: by the seed of Abraham intending the very substance itself of the flesh of man. For he adds: "Therefore in all things it became him to be made like his brethren. And because they are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part with them (of the same)." Heb 2.17 Truly, the scripture draws the lineal descent of Christ most diligently from the loins of Abraham to Jacob, and from him again to Judas, and from him in like sort to David. To him again the promises of the incarnation of the Son of God are renewed. For Nathan says to David: "Thus says the Lord, When your days are fulfilled, you shall sleep with your fathers, and I will set up your seed after you, who shall proceed out of your body, and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever." 2Sam 7.12-13 Nor is there any cause why any man should interpret this of Solomon. For he was born while his father David lived, and his kingdom quickly decayed. But Nathan speaks of a son who would be born to David after his death: "When you shall sleep with your fathers," he says, "I will set up your seed after you." And he most evidently declares what manner of seed this would be, and says, "which shall proceed out of your body." For in the 132nd Psalm we read; "Of the fruit of your body I will set upon your seat." ^{Psa 132.12}

Furthermore, Mary the virgin descended lineally from the seed of David, of whom Christ our Lord was begotten and born. The angel, speaking and expounding those old and ancient prophecies about him, says to the virgin: "And the Lord God shall give him the seat of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." ^{Luk 1.32-33}

To this also belongs what Elizabeth says to the virgin who came out of Galilee into the hill-country of Judah: "And why is this, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? Blessed are you among women, and blessed is the fruit of your womb." ^{Luk 1.42} Truly Matthew and Luke draw the lineal descent of Christ from the loins, as it were, of David even to the virgin Mary, who conceives by the Holy Ghost — that is, the Holy Ghost makes her fruitful. When the months were fulfilled that she should be delivered, she brought forth a son. And the one who is born appears in all respects to be true and very man. He is laid in a manger, wrapped in swaddling clothes; he grew in stature, and increased in years, according to the manner of a man's body; he is wearied, he is refreshed, he is glad, he is sad, he is hungry, he is thirsty, he eats, he drinks, he fears, and to be short, he dies. The history of the gospel declares this truth in many words.

Nor is the scripture itself ashamed to call Mary the mother of our Lord, not the putative or supposed mother, but the true and natural mother who, from the substance of her own body, gave true flesh and the substance of man to the Son of God. The angel of God so witnessed to Isaiah, and said, "A virgin shall conceive in her womb, and shall bring forth a son." Look, he says, "in her womb." And again, in Matthew the self-same angel says, "That which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost." ^{Mat 1.20} Upon this, the apostle says to the Galatians that "the Son of God is made of a woman," namely, according to man's nature. For Christ is the fruit of the body of David, and of the virgin Mary, begotten and born of the loins of David. And John also, the apostle and evangelist, says, "The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us." In calling God flesh, doubtless he calls him very man. For the same apostle says in another place: "Every spirit that confesses that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God; and every spirit which confesses not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God." ^{1Joh 4.2-3}

Therefore we freely pronounce that Valentinus, Marcion, Apelles, and Manichaeus, denying the true and very flesh of Christ, are of the devil; and therefore that they are to be avoided by all means, together with all their disciples and sectaries. We knit up this treatise about the true flesh of Christ with these most plain words of Paul: "When Christ was in the form of God, he made himself of no reputation, taking on himself the form of a servant, and made in the likeness of men, and found in figure as a man. He humbled himself, being made obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." ^{Phi 2.7} Therefore, it is without doubt that the Son of God took on true and human flesh, and is consubstantial or of the self-same substance with us in all points, sin excepted.

Nor did our Lord, after he was risen from the dead (though he was glorified), put off or lay aside his true body once he had taken and put it on; and his glorification does not take away the truth of his nature. For he says to his disciples, "A spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see me have." ^{Luk 24.39} Therefore, he carried his true and very flesh into heaven with him; in his true flesh, he appears always for us in the sight of God the Father; in his true flesh he will come again to judge the quick and the dead; and those who crucified ¹ him will see him in his true flesh. Christ is a creature according to this nature (who in respect to his Godhead he is no creature, but a Creator); for the flesh of Christ has a beginning, and he lineally descended from Adam, who is the creature of the living God. And though these things are sufficiently fenced with the force of the scriptures, yet it will not seem irksome to you, dearly beloved, for me to repeat the opinion of the blessed father Cyril, concerning the same matter. He left these words written in his epistle to Successus, bishop of Isauria diocese ²:

"Because I found something in your publication, as though the holy flesh of Christ, the Saviour of us all, had returned into the nature of his deity after his resurrection, so that now he would seem to be wholly and solely God, we also thought it good to answer this..."

"After the resurrection, it was certainly the self-same body which had suffered, yet not now having man's infirmities in it. For we do not affirm that it abides in hunger, labour, or any such thing, but we confess that it is now incorruptible. And not only this, but also that it quickens and gives life. For it is a body that both has and gives life — that is to say, of the only-begotten Son of God; and it is glorified with the most worthy brightness of God; and it is known and taken to be the body of God. Therefore, if any man says that it is God's body, as the body of a man is man's body, he does not swerve from allowable reason. It is upon this, I think, that most blessed Paul also said, 'Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet from now on, we know him no more.' For being, as I said, the proper body of God, it far surpasses all human bodies. But a body made of earth could not abide to be turned into the nature of the deity or Godhead. For this is impossible. Otherwise we abase the Godhead, as if it were made, and as if it had taken something into itself which does not properly belong to its nature. Hereby it is proved to be as much folly to say that the body is turned into the nature of the Godhead, as to say that the Word is changed into the substance of flesh. For as this is impossible, because it is proved to be a body that is not able to be turned and changed; so also it is not possible that any creature can be turned into the essence or nature of the Godhead. And flesh is also created; therefore we say that the body of Christ is divine, because it is the body of God, and beautified with unspeakable glory. And now, let us confess that it is incorruptible, holy, and life-giving. But none of the holy fathers thought or taught that it is changed into the nature of the Godhead; nor do we." ³ This far from Cyril.

And Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, Dialog, ii. Eranist. says:

"I will show that the body of the Lord, even after the ascension, was called a body. Hear Paul therefore saying, 'Our conversation is in heaven, from where we look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ: who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like his glorious body.' ^{Phi 3.20-21} Therefore it is not changed into another nature, but it remains indeed a true and very body, replenished with divine glory, and casting forth beams of light. But if it is changed into another nature, their bodies also shall be likewise changed; for they shall be fashioned like him. But if the bodies of saints keep the substance of their nature, the body of the Lord likewise has his substance unchangeable." ⁴

Furthermore, when we profess that Christ has true and actual flesh, we do not mean flesh without a soul. For we must confess that Christ has a reasonable or human soul, not void of a mind.

Arius taught that the Son of God took on flesh only, without a soul, and that the Word was in place of the soul. And Apollinarius attributed a soul to Christ, but he took away the mind, denying that it was reasonable.¹ The scripture attributes a soul to Christ, and it does not take the mind away from the soul. The Lord himself says in the gospel: "The Son of Man came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and to give his soul a redemption for many." ^{Mat 20.28} The same Matthew has left written of him: "He began to be sorrowful and heavy. And Jesus said, My soul is heavy, even unto death." ^{Mat 26.38} And in another place the Lord himself says: "Now my soul is troubled." ^{Joh 12.27} If this soul of Christ lacks the mind, which is the chief part of the soul, then how does he have a soul? How could he be sorrowful, and understand, desire, and remember? "With hearty desire (says the Lord) I have desired to eat this Passover with you before I suffer." ^{Luk 22.15} But this desire came not from his Godhead, nor from his flesh only, nor from his soul lacking a mind, but from his perfect manhood of body and mind. Moreover we read in the gospel that the Lord said: "The Son of Man did not come to destroy men's souls, but to save them." ^{Luk 9.56} Therefore, he not only took on flesh, but a reasonable soul also. For man had perished, both soul and body. Therefore, that he might be saved, both body and soul, our Saviour Christ took on a very man's body and a reasonable soul; that is to say, a most perfect man. Therefore blessed Athanasius said, teaching us the confession of true faith according to the scriptures: "Christ is God of the substance of his Father, begotten before all worlds; and man of the substance of his mother, born in the world: perfect God, and perfect man, of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting." ²

Thus far in these words we have shown that Jesus Christ our Lord is very God and very man; he is consubstantial or of the same substance with the Father according to his Godhead, and he is consubstantial or of the same substance with us according to his manhood. For he has a reasonable soul and human flesh in very deed. We will speak further about the conjunction or uniting of these natures into one person; for histories declare that certain ancient writers in olden times foully erred in this matter.

Eutyches ³ admitted only one nature in Christ, and that muddled or confused together his divine and human nature. The Monothelites were not far beyond him, acknowledging only one will in Christ. Nestorius, willing to avoid a coal-pit, fell into a lime-kiln.⁴ For by confessing two natures, he seems to affirm that there are two persons, teaching that the Word is not united to the flesh in the self-same person, but that only dwells in it. Thus he forbade the holy virgin to be called God's mother. Against him, the common assertion of the whole church (holding an opinion according to the scripture) has taught that we are to confess two natures in Christ, and also the properties of those natures. These are so coupled together into one undivided person, that the divine nature

is not changed into the human, nor is the human changed into the divine, but each of them retains or keeps its own nature, and both of them subsist in the unity of one person. For Christ, ¹ according to the disposition of his divine nature, is one and the same, immortal. And according to the disposition of his human nature, he is mortal. And the self-same immortal God and mortal man is the only Saviour of the world. We will speak of this shortly, by God's grace, somewhat more largely and plainly.

Touching the very conjunction or uniting of the true Godhead and manhood in Christ, the prophets and apostles have not irritably nor craftily disputed. For speaking simply, they said, "God was made man;" or, God took on man. For John the apostle and evangelist says: "The Word was made flesh," ^{Joh 1.14} that is, God was made man, or the Word of God became flesh. St. Paul says: "God was made manifest in the flesh." ^{1Tim 3.16} And again: "The Son of God in no way took on himself the angels, but he took on the seed of Abraham." ^{Heb 2.16} Therefore, we say that according to the doctrine of the apostles, expounding the mystery of the conjunction of the divine and human nature in Christ, God was incarnate or made man; God took on himself man; God appeared or was made manifest in human flesh. He that sifts out deeper matters than these, casts himself into great dangers.

There are some who, in expounding these points more fully, use the words of society or fellowship, participation, and communion, or part-taking; and that is not without the authority of the scriptures. Paul says, "Since then, as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part with them." ^{Heb 2.14}

Nevertheless we must first of all take heed here, that we do not muddle or confound the two natures joined together in one person, nor rob them of their properties. For God of his own nature is everlasting and unchangeable. God therefore, remaining always one and the same, is not changed into a human or into any other nature, but he joins, couples, takes, yes, and unites to himself, the human nature. Again, unless he remains a creature in his human nature, and is the same which he is said to be, it is not a human nature. Therefore, this remaining in its own substance, is taken to the divine nature. And therefore, two natures remain in the one person of Christ: the divine and the human. And either of them retains its own disposition and its own property: which we will now declare by some places of scripture.

Isaiah in his seventh chapter says: "A virgin shall conceive, and bring forth a Son; and his name shall be called Immanuel." ^{Isa 7.14} He acknowledges both natures in Christ: for according to his divine nature he is called "Immanuel," that is to say, "God with us;" and according to his human nature, he is conceived and born. The same prophet says: "A child is born to us, and a son is given to us," etc. For the one who is given, is from everlasting; and the one that is born has his beginning and being in the world. Therefore, one and the same person retains both the divine and the human nature.

For Micah also says: "And you, Bethlehem Ephrathah, are little indeed among the thousands of Judah. Out of you he shall come forth unto me, who shall be the governor in Israel, whose outgoings have been from the beginning, and from everlasting." ^{Mic 5.2} Look, what could be spoken more plainly? One and the self-same person has two offspring: for inasmuch as he is God, his generation is from everlasting; and as he is man, he is born in Bethlehem. Therefore, one and the self-same Christ is very God and very man.

4-6. THE SIXTH SERMON: OF THE SON AS TRUE GOD AND MAN.

Again, in the gospel of St. Matthew, the Lord asks the Pharisees, saying: "What do you think of Christ? Whose Son is he? They said to him, The Son of David. He says to them, How then does David in spirit call him Lord, saying, The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies your footstool? If David call him Lord, how then is he his Son?" Mat 22.43-45 It is as if he had said: Since Christ without doubt is the Son of David, and David calls him Lord (not by human affection, but by the Holy Ghost), that is to say, very God of the self-same power with the Father, the sequel ¹ is that Christ is very man and very God. The angel Gabriel, noting no less plainly both these natures, says to the virgin Mary: "That holy thing which will be born shall be called the Son of God." Luk 1.35 For he is born of the virgin, very man of very man: and this is the Son of God. For Elizabeth also calls the virgin the mother of the Lord; namely, of God. Moreover, in the gospel of John you may read very many sayings of this sort, which point out, as if with the finger, both natures in the self-same Christ. "You believe in God," says the Lord, "believe also in me." Joh 14.1 And again, "The Father is greater than I." Joh 14.28 Also, "I went out from the Father, and came into the world. Again, I leave the world, and go to the Father." Joh 16.28 And again in another place: "The poor shall you have always with you, but me always you shall not have." Mat 26.11 And again: "Behold, I am always with you, even unto the end of the world." Mat 28.20 These sentences truly are contrary, and cannot be all true at once, unless we acknowledge that Christ retains the properties of (both) natures unconfounded or unmingled.

Paul manifestly says to the Romans, that "he was called to be an apostle to preach the gospel of God, which he had promised beforehand by his prophets in the holy scriptures, concerning his Son, who was made of the seed of David according to the flesh; and declared mightily to be the Son of God, touching the Spirit of sanctification, by the resurrection from the dead." Rom 1.1-3 The apostle therefore acknowledges both natures in Christ. For according to the flesh (he says) Christ is the Son of David. But if we behold the power of his miracles, his resurrection from the dead which gives us life, and the fact that Christ sends the Holy Ghost and sanctifies all the faithful, then it appears that the one who is the Son of David after the flesh, is also the Son of God according to his divine power.

The same apostle, in the second chapter to the Philippians, no less plainly and evidently affirms both natures in Christ. But because that place has often been alleged already, I pass over it to cite others.

St. Augustine, expounding not only the confession of his own faith, but of the whole church which flourished in his time, has thus left this, written in his epistle to Dardanus, lvii.:

"Do not doubt that the man Christ Jesus is there now, from where he shall come; and have in ready remembrance and faithfully hold to the Christian confession. Because he rose from the dead, ascended into heaven, sits at the right hand of the Father, he shall not come from somewhere else than from there, to judge the quick and the dead. And he shall come in the same way as he was seen going into heaven, as the voice of the angel witnessed. That is to say, he will come in the self-same shape and substance of flesh to which indeed he gave immortality, but without taking that nature away. He is not to be thought of as present everywhere in this shape. For we must beware, lest we so fortify the divinity of the man, that we clean take away the truth of his body. For it does not consequently follow that what is in God, should be everywhere as God. For the scripture, which cannot lie, says even of us, that in him we live, move, and have our being, even though we are not everywhere as he is. But he is man-in-God in another sort, because he is also God-in-man, in a certain proper and singular manner. For one person is God and man; and both are one Jesus Christ — he is everywhere in that he is God, but he is in heaven in that he is man."

And the same author says a little after:

"Take the bodies from the places they are in, and they will be nowhere; and because they will be nowhere, they will not be bodies. Take the bodies from the qualities of the bodies, and there will be no place for them to exist; and therefore, it must be that they have no being."

And at the end of the Epistle, Augustine says: "Do not doubt that Christ our Lord, the only-begotten Son of God, co-equal with the Father, is also the Son of man, whom the Father exceeds in greatness; and that both are present everywhere as he is God, and are also in the same temple of God, as God dwelling there; and yet, both are in some certain place of heaven, according to the manner of his true body." ¹

The same author expounds the same thing more at large in his fiftieth treatise upon John;² and Contra Felicianum Arianum, cap. 9, 10, and 11;³ also in his treatise De Agone Christi, cap. 24 to cap. 27.⁴

To this we will also join the testimony of the holy martyr Vigilus, bishop of Trident. For disputing against Eutyches in the defence of both natures in Christ, he says:

"If the nature of the Word and flesh are one, how is it that since the Word is everywhere, the flesh also is not found everywhere? For when the flesh was on earth, surely it was not in heaven; and because it is now in heaven, surely it is not on earth. And it is so far from being on the earth, that we look for Christ to come from heaven according to the flesh, whom according to the Word, we believe to be with us on earth. Therefore, according to your opinion, either the Word is contained with his flesh in one place, or else the flesh with the Word is in every place — even though one nature does not receive into itself anything contrary to and unlike itself. But it is contrary and far unlike itself to be limited to a place, and also to be everywhere. And because the Word is in every place, but his flesh is not in every place, it is evident that one and the self-same Christ is of both natures; and that he is everywhere according to the nature of his Godhead; and he is contained in one place according to the nature of his manhood; that he is both created, and also without beginning; that he is subject to death, and also cannot die. One of these is agreeable to him by the nature of the Word, whereby he is God; the other is agreeable by the nature of the flesh, whereby the self-same God is man. Therefore, one and the self-same Son of God, being also made the Son of man, has a beginning by the nature of the flesh, and he has no beginning by the nature of his divinity. By the nature of his flesh, he is created; and by the nature of his divinity, he is not created; by the nature of his flesh, he is limited in place; and by the nature of his divinity, he is not contained in place; by the nature of his flesh, he is inferior to angels; and according to his divinity, he is equal to the Father; by the nature of his flesh, he died; but by the nature of his divinity, he did not die. This is the catholic faith and the Christian confession, which the apostles delivered, the martyrs confirmed, and the faithful even to this day, observe and keep." ⁵

Up to here we have repeated the words of Vigilius, martyr and bishop, to this end: that the most notable agreement of the holy scripture in this principle — as it is understood by the universal church, and by the most godly and learned fathers — in which we confess that the properties of both natures in Christ remain unconfounded.

Again, we must by all means take heed, lest through defending and retaining the properties of the two natures, we divide and pull asunder the unity of the person — as though there were two Christs, of which one is subject to suffering and is mortal, and the other is not subject to suffering and is immortal. For there is but one and the same Christ, who is acknowledged to be immortal according to his Godhead, and mortal according to his manhood. Nestorius denied that the blessed virgin Mary was the mother of God; for he said that God was unchangeable, and therefore he could not be born, and had no mother. From this sprang a suspicion that he would say the Lord was merely a man, and that he would maintain the heretical opinion of Paulus Samosatenus and Photinus. Socrates handles this at large in Historiarum, Lib. vii. cap. 32. ¹

But Nestorius was injurious to the scripture and to true faith. For Elizabeth, the wife of Zechariah and the mother of St. John the Baptist, being full of the Holy Ghost, salutes the holy virgin Mary in express words, and calls her the mother of the Lord — that is, the mother of God. And even though his heavenly nature is without generation and corruption, yet notwithstanding, it is most certain that the one whom Mary brought forth, was true God indeed. For "that which is born of her," says the angel, "is the Son of God." ^{Mat 1.20-23} Therefore, she brought forth God, and she is worthily called the mother of God. For if she did not bear God, she brought forth a mere man; nor has the Son of God coupled man inseparably to himself. In like manner, since God is immortal of his own nature, truly he cannot die. But if any man for that reason should absolutely deny that God was crucified and offered up — yes, and died for us — he would challenge Paul who said, "Had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory." ^{1Cor 2.8}

But who is ignorant that the God of glory, or glorious God, cannot be crucified? Meanwhile, since the one who according to the flesh suffered and was nailed on the cross was God, and not merely man, we rightly say that God suffered and was nailed on the cross for us; though he who suffered, suffered only according to that which could suffer. For Peter the apostle says, "Christ has suffered for us in the flesh." ^{1Pet 4.1} The first Toletan ² council, following him, decreed these words:

"If anyone says or believes that the Godhead may be born, let him be accursed. If anyone says or believes that the deity of Christ may be turned, changed, or subject to suffering, let him be accursed. If anyone says or believes that the nature of the Godhead and the manhood is one in Christ, let him be accursed." ³

² A synod at Toledo (Toletan), in the first half of the fifth century, professed "We believe in One God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit... and that the Spirit is the Paraclete who is neither the Father nor the Son, but proceeds from the Father and the Son." But the third council of Toledo in 589, made the Spanish Church the first to add the filioque ("and the son") to the Western form of the Nicene Creed. It indicates that the Holy Spirit proceeds from both the Father and the Son, as opposed to the Eastern churches which believe the Spirit proceeds from the Father alone. H.B. Swete, The Holy Spirit in the Ancient Church (MacMillan and Co., London, 1912), pp. 344-345.

And Damasus, bishop of Rome, says: "If anyone says that in suffering on the cross, the Son of God and God suffered pain, and not the flesh with the soul which he put on in the form of a servant, which he took upon himself as the scripture says, let him be accursed." ¹

Therefore, though Paul says, that "God has purchased for himself a church with his own blood," ^{Act 20.28} who is so mad as to believe that the divine nature has or ever had blood? Meanwhile, who is such a dor-head ² that he does not understand that the flesh which God took upon himself, has blood? And since God does not account that which he took to himself as another's, but as his own, we most truly say that God redeemed the world with his own blood. Thus Theodoret also, bishop of Cyrus, Dialog. Eran. 3, says a little before the end:

"If Christ is both God and man, as both the holy scripture teaches, and as the most blessed fathers have always preached, then he suffered as man; but as God, he was not subject to suffering. But when we say the body, or flesh, or humanity suffered, we do not separate the divine nature. For as it was united to his human nature — which was hungry, and thirsty, and weary, yes, and also slept, yes, and was vexed with sorrow and heaviness for the passion ³ he would suffer — indeed, it endured none of those, yet allowed that human nature to endure its affections and passions. Even so, this nature was joined to him when he was crucified, and permitted his passion to thoroughly come to an end, so that by his passion he might suffer death; yet [his divinity] did not feel grief truly by his passion. Rather, he made his passion agreeable and convenient for himself, as the passion of his temple or dwelling-place, and of his flesh which was joined to him. By this also, those who believe are called the members of Christ; and he himself is called the head of those who believe." ⁴

Some call this figure of speech αλλοιωσις (alloioosis, or alloying), i.e., alteration or changing. John Damascenus ⁵ calls it αντιδοσις (antidosis), a mutual giving or an interchanging of properties. It is usually called a communicating of properties, ⁶ when that property is given to one nature, which is proper to another. For example, "No man has ascended up into heaven (says the Lord) except he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man who is in heaven." ^{Joh 3.13} Truly, his human nature was not then in heaven when the Lord spoke this, but it was on earth. Yet notwithstanding, because flesh is taken into the fellowship of his Godhead, what is proper to the Godhead, is attributed to his manhood. Bishop Fulgentius, recognizing this interpretation in his second book to king Thrasimundus, has written this:

"He said this, not that the human substance of Christ is present in every place; but because one and the self-same Son of God and Son of man, very God of the Father just as he is very man of man, even though he was then locally on earth according to his true humanity, yet according to his divinity (which by no means can be contained in one place) he wholly filled heaven and earth."⁷ Thus Fulgentius says.

This is why these sentences, bearing witness of Christ in the writings of the evangelists and apostles, are to be diligently marked. For some properties are particularly referred to his divine nature, such as these: "I and the Father are one." Joh 10.30 "Before Abraham was, I am." Joh 8.58 "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and God was that Word." Joh 1.1 "He is before all things, the image of the invisible God, by whom all things are made." Col 1.15

And some are particularly referred to his human nature, or to the mystery of his embassy or ministration. ¹ Of this sort are these: "The Father is greater than I." Joh 14.28 "You made him a little inferior to the angels." Heb 2.7 "My soul is heavy even to the death." Mat 26.38 Again, there are testimonies which respect both natures, but do not sufficiently agree to either of them separately. Such are these: "My flesh is food indeed, and my blood is drink indeed." Joh 6.55 "I have power to forgive sins," Mat 9.6 "to raise to life whom I will," Joh 5.21 and to give righteousness and holiness. "I am the shepherd," Joh 10.11 the door, Joh 10.9 the light," Joh 8.12 etc. "I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man comes to the Father but by me." Joh 14.6 For these set forth and commend to us the very substance of Christ, the person, I mean, of our true Saviour and Mediator, God and man. For no man forgives sins, but God only. Again, they are not forgiven without death and the shedding of blood, as the apostle witnesses in the ninth chapter to the Hebrews. Heb 9.7 Again, there are testimonies which cannot aptly be declared except by figurative words.² Touching this, I hope this is sufficient.

Again, for the sake of the unity of his natures, if we do not extend his humanity so far as his divinity, we do not divide the person of our Mediator, God and man. For in the gospel of St. Matthew, the Lord does not bodily go into the house of the centurion; notwithstanding, there is no doubt that his Godhead being present and not absent, the servant of the centurion was cured of this disease. And who would therefore say that the person if Christ is divided by St. Matthew? For he has not extended the humanity of Christ even to his divinity? The angels speak to the women concerning the body of Christ risen from the dead and now glorified. They say: "He is not here; he is risen." Mar 16.6 We are not ignorant that his divinity is in every place. And yet the angels did not divide his inseparable person, in that they did not make the human body of Christ equal in all respects with his Godhead. The angels did not divide the person of Christ when his body was taken up from mount Olivet into heaven: standing on the earth, they testified that he will come again in the same manner as they saw him depart. Act 1.11 But who dares to deny that the Lord was then also present with them?

Therefore, in the manner of his very body, our Lord is in heaven and not on earth. But according to his infinite Godhead, he is everywhere, in heaven and on earth. Man consists of soul and body; and these are most contrary in natures. But between them, they make one person, not two; and whoever attributed and defends that which is proper to either of them, does not divide the person. The body sleeps, the soul does not sleep: these properties of each part do not make two persons. What Theodoret has written in his third Dialogue, seems to belong to this. He says: "

We do not divide the natural unity of the soul and the body, nor do we separate the souls from their own proper bodies: but we consider those things which properly belong to their natures. Therefore, when the scripture says, "And devout men carried Stephen to his burial, and made great lamentation over him;" Act 8.2 would you say that his soul was buried with his body? I think not. And when you hear Jacob the patriarch saying, "Bury me with my fathers," Gen 49.29 you understand that to be spoken about his body, not his soul. Again you read, "There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife," etc. Gen 49.31 In this statement, scripture does not mention the body, but in all points it signifies the soul and body together. But we rightly divide them, and say that the souls are immortal, and that only the bodies of the patriarchs are buried in the double cave. Even so, we also are prone to say that a man was buried in this or that place. We do not say, this or that man's body, but this or that man; for whoever has his wits, knows that we speak of the body. Even though the evangelists often mention Christ's body being buried, at length they set down the name of the person, and say that Jesus was buried and laid in the grave," etc. ¹

It is without controversy, that this faith and doctrine has flourished in the holy church of God, from Christ's time even to our own age, and it has remained most steadfast against innumerable assaults by Satan and heretics. And the self-same faith and doctrine is delivered and confirmed by testimonies of scripture and by the consents ² of holy councils. I therefore exhort you, dearly beloved, that calling on the name of Christ, you may persevere and continue in the same doctrine, and being joined by true faith and obedience to Christ, very God and man, you may give continual thanks, worshipping Him who reigns forever.

4-7. THE SEVENTH SERMON: OF CHRIST AS KING AND PRIEST.

OF CHRIST, KING AND PRIEST; OF HIS ONLY AND EVERLASTING KINGDOM AND PRIESTHOOD; AND OF THE NAME OF A CHRISTIAN.

I HAVE declared to you, dearly beloved, that Christ Jesus our Lord is very God and man. This will bring more plentiful profit, if we understand what the fruit of that thing is, which is chiefly known by the OFFICES of Christ our Lord. He is king and priest of the people of God; therefore he has a kingdom and a priesthood. If we somewhat more diligently consider these, they will declare to us the exceeding great benefit of the divinity and humanity of Christ.

Christ Jesus is a KING. Therefore he is Lord of all, ruler and governor of all things which are in heaven and on earth, and especially of the catholic church itself, which is the communion of saints. And insofar as he is King and Lord, truly by his royal or kingly office, he is the deliverer or preserver, the revenger and defender, and finally, the law-giver of his elect.

For he crushed the serpent's head, the strong and most cruel enemy of God's people; and when he had conquered him, he bound and stripped him. He delivered the elect out of the power of darkness, and set them into the liberty of the sons of God; that we might be his peculiar people, ^{1Pet 2.9} sanctified through the blood of our king — a purchased people, to serve him in righteousness and holiness. He is humble, loving, and gentle; which the history of the gospel recites about him, also out of Zechariah. ^{Mat 21.5; Zec 9.9} He watches for us, he defends and guards us, he enriches us with all manner of good things, and furnishes us against our enemies with spiritual armour, and gives us abundantly power to resist and to overcome. He has purged the temple of God, casting out the Canaanites;¹ he has cancelled unrighteous laws, he has delivered us from them; and now he rules and governs us with the sceptre of his mouth, proclaiming exceedingly good and most just laws. For he is God and man; therefore he is the only monarch, the King of kings, and the Lord of lords. ^{Rev 19.16} For he has all the kings and rulers in the world subject to him; some truly of their own accord being obedient through faith; and others, though striving and rebelling against him, are made subject by his power. And therefore the prophet David says: "Be wise, you kings, be learned, you who are judges of the earth; serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice unto him with reverence. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and so you perish from the right way." ^{Psa 2.12} For in another place the same prophet says: "The Lord said to my Lord, Sit at my right hand, until I make your enemies your footstool. The Lord will send forth the rod of his power out of Zion; be you ruler even in the midst among your enemies." ^{Psa 110.1-2} Isaiah also, bringing in the Lord speaking, says: "I will lift up my hands to the Gentiles, and set up my standard to the people; and they shall bring you their sons upon their shoulders: for kings shall be your nursing fathers, and queens shall be your nursing mothers." ^{Isa 49.22-23} Ecclesiastical histories declare these things more largely. Of this king Christ, the prophets prophesied, saying: "And in mercy the seat shall be prepared; and he shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging and seeking judgment, and making haste unto righteousness." ^{Isa 16.5}

And again: "Behold, the time comes, says the Lord, that I will raise up the righteous Branch of David, which king shall bear rule; and he shall prosper with wisdom, and shall set up equity and righteousness again in the earth. In this time 4 shall Judah be saved, and Israel shall dwell without fear: and this is the name that they shall call him, The Lord our Righteousness." ^{Jer 33.15-16}

¹ Cf. p. iii.45, n. 7, and p. iii.153, n. 8; and see Bullinger. in Apocalyps. Conc. xxi. p. 58, and Conc. xxviii. p. 76, and Conc. lxxviii. p. 245. Basil, 1557.

And because our Lord is a king, he must therefore have a kingdom. The realm and dominion subject to a king is called a kingdom, as well as principality, empire, power, and the manner of government itself. Therefore the church, the communion or fellowship of saints, being obedient and subject to their king Christ, is called the kingdom of God. For Micah says, "And the Lord shall reign over them in mount Zion." ^{Mic 4-7} Therefore Zion (which signifies the church) is the kingdom of God. And God is said to reign, when in the church he rules, governs, keeps, and defends those that are his, and endues and makes them fruitful with diverse graces. For Paul says, "The kingdom of God is not food and drink, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." ^{Rom 14.17} Moreover, the kingdom of God is that eternal glory and felicity which God communicates to his elect. For the Lord says in the gospel, "Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom which is prepared for you from the beginning of the world." ^{Mat 25.34} And the thief, making his prayer to the Lord even at the point of death, who was ready to die on the cross, and desiring to be a partaker of this kingdom, says, "Lord, remember me when you come into your kingdom." ^{Luk 23.42} Again, since the gospel teaches us how God reigns in us in this world, to translate us to himself in time into that other world — that is, since the gospel is that thing by which the Lord raises up his dominion — it is not unadvisedly called the kingdom of God by Matthew, in his thirteenth chapter.¹ In another place, for the same cause it is called "the word of the kingdom." In short, at present we understand the kingdom of God to be the congregation of saints itself (the catholic church, I mean); and the power or administration of God reigning in it — that is, preserving, governing, and glorifying it.

And there is truly but one kingdom of God only; for there is but one God only, one king Christ only, one church and life everlasting. But this one kingdom of God is considered in two ways, according to its dispensation. First, according to the omnipotence of God; for since he is the highest and omnipotent, he has and executes most just rule and equal power over all creatures, visible and invisible, whether they will be obedient or not. Secondly, according to his Spirit, by which he reigns in his elect.

And so the kingdom of God is again considered two ways. For either it is earthly, and called the kingdom of grace; or else it is heavenly, and called the kingdom of glory.

The earthly kingdom of grace is not therefore called earthly, as though it were carnal and earthly, like the kingdom of Babylon, Persia, Alexandria, or Rome; but because it is on earth. For a good part of the holy church of God is familiar on this earth, being partaker of flesh and blood while it lives on the earth, though it does not live an earthly life according to the flesh; for according to the Spirit, by which it is ruled, it lives a heavenly life. Not that the partakers of the kingdom of God do not sin: for "the just man falls and rises seven times in a day." ^{Pro 24.16} Thus it is also called the kingdom of grace: for as long as we live in this world, our king and Lord never denies his grace and mercy to us who crave pardon. And the faithful wholly hang upon the grace of their king: they embrace continual repentance, and endeavour to things of greater perfection; for they frame all that they do according to the laws of their king and prince. For he reigns in his elect by the word of truth, and by the Holy Ghost. By the word of truth, he teaches what the saints should do, and what they should avoid: by his Holy Spirit he moves their hearts, and gives strength to flee evil and follow what is good. For truly, our king reigns not so much for himself as for us: for he makes us also kings, so that being delivered from the devil, damnation, sin, and the curse, we may be lords over the devil, damnation, sin, and the curse — indeed, over all things — and joint-heirs with the Son of God himself.

¹ Our Lord's phrase in Matthew is, The kingdom of heaven: in the other Evangelists, of God.

For these reasons, the kingdom of God is called a spiritual kingdom. For the partakers of the kingdom of God, endued with the Spirit of God, bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, not the works of the flesh; and in short, they are governed by the Spirit of God. Nor truly does our Lord reign in the manner of the kings of this world, saying to Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world." ^{Joh 18:36} Some abuse this statement, gathering that there is no outward government in the church of God. Under this name they also remove the office of a magistrate; and speak so subtly about the kingdom of God, that a man cannot tell where the kingdom of God is, or who are partakers of this kingdom. They do not understand that the meaning must be gathered on the occasion of that saying. The Jews, accusing the Lord before Pilate, laid to his charge that he ambitiously sought after a kingdom. The Lord, clearing himself of this crime, shows Pilate that his kingdom will not be such a one that, after he had cast out Tiberius Caesar, would be gotten and kept with arms, and be governed in the manner of this world. Declaring this, he adds: "If my kingdom were of this world, then my servants would surely fight, so that I would not be delivered to the Jews." Therefore he infers, "But now, my kingdom is not from here:" and therefore they do not fight for me, to place me in the throne of the kingdom, Tiberius being cast out. And shortly he says: "For this cause was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth: and all that are of the truth hear my voice." ^{Joh 18:37} Therefore, by truth (and not by lying, deceits, and crafty practices, like the princes of this world) Christ prepares a kingdom for himself; so too by truth he both retains and governs his kingdom. And whoever embraces truth is a partaker of Christ's kingdom, whether they are princes or of the commonalty. All these obey the voice of their King, and serve their highest Prince.

Nevertheless, we expressly add here that kings can serve their Lord and King in no other way than as kings — that is, in doing those things which kings ought to do; namely, to execute judgment and justice.

For even though they are in the world, they do not rule after the world, because they are now governed by the Spirit of their King Christ. And they direct all their doings to the prescribed rules of God's word, and in all things yield themselves to be guided by the Spirit of God. And to that extent, surely their kingdom is not of this world. About these things, I have elsewhere cited much out of St. Augustine according to the scripture.¹ And our King Christ defends his church and his ministers. Sometimes it is by the aid of princes; and sometimes he preserves and spreads them abroad — lying open to persecutions through infirmity and weakness.² For the church is pressed down, but not oppressed, or still kept under.³ Christ, the mightiest prince, always reigns and overcomes in those who are his.

Now the bounds of this earthly kingdom of Christ reach to the uttermost parts of the earth; for all the kingdoms of the world and all nations relate to the kingdom of Christ. To this belong all the testimonies of the prophets touching the calling of the Gentiles. You may find many of them in Isaiah and Zechariah, who excellently describe the kingdom of Christ on earth. From these the Jews took occasion to pretend I know not how great and glorious things about the majesty and victories of the Messiah, which nevertheless were long since abundantly fulfilled in Christ — but more spiritually than carnally. But while they dream of and look for carnal things, they loathe the spiritual, and thus they lose both. But the faithful, through the bountifulness and liberality of Christ their King, most abundantly obtain those good things which the prophets promised:

² 2Cor 12:10 Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in needs, in persecutions, in distresses, for Christ's sake. For when I am weak, then I am strong.

³ 2Cor 4:8-10 We are hard pressed on every side, yet not crushed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; ⁹ persecuted, but not forsaken; struck down, but not destroyed — ¹⁰ always carrying about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life of Jesus also may be manifested in our body.

namely, plentiful peace with both God and men, and all kinds of felicity — always to be blessed, always to be safe from all enemies, visible as well as invisible (though they fight continually), and to enjoy everlasting salvation.

The prophets have presented these things in their writings in a very grand kind of style, yet understanding nothing more than what we just said: that the faithful shall be most happy, and shall possess in Christ all good gifts of both soul and body; indeed, as much as is necessary and healthful for the saints. And this is that kingdom (meaning that of grace as well as glory) which Joseph of Arimathea, just Simeon, and Anna the prophetess, with all the other saints, awaited and looked for. Philip the deacon preached this same kingdom to those of Samaria; and St. Paul the apostle preached it to those of Rome. This is what Luke testifies about in the Acts of the Apostles, chapters 8 and 28.

But the seat, or throne and ¹ palace of our king, is heaven. For he ascended a conqueror into heaven, and sits at the right hand of God the Father almighty. From there, as the sun of righteousness, he shines to all who live in his church, or in his kingdom; yes, and he chooses for himself the hearts of the faithful in whom he may dwell.² Furthermore, so that we may understand our king, though he is not corporally present on earth but ascended into heaven, he is not therefore absent from his kingdom. In his word, he truly compares himself to the head and us to the body or the members. Now therefore, just as the body is never without the head, so the kingdom of God is never without Christ the prince. Just as the vital spirit from the heart, and the power or virtue of feeling and moving is poured from the head into the body, so too we are quickened or made alive by our prince Christ — justifying, preserving, comforting, confirming, and defending us from all evil. Just as all the members are ruled by the head, so all the faithful in the kingdom of Christ are governed by their king Christ. Paul therefore says:

"God raised Christ from the dead, and set him on his right hand in heavenly places, far above all rule, and power, and might, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in the world to come; and has put all things under his feet, and gave him to be the head over all things to the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that fills all in all." Eph 1.20-23

There are very many others of this kind to be found in the writings of the apostles. Especially that "Christ is the head of the church, and it is he who gives salvation to the body; for he gave himself for the church, to sanctify it when he had cleansed it in the fountain of water in the word, that he might present it to himself a glorious church," etc. Eph 5.23-27 This much up to here about the kingdom of Christ on earth, which is called both the Kingdom of Grace, and the CHURCH MILITANT.

Moreover, the kingdom of God is called the Kingdom of Heaven and of Glory for this occasion: because those whom our Lord and king has sanctified on earth and guided with his Spirit — yes, and also justified — being delivered from the flesh and taken out of this world, he glorifies in heaven, and he receives them into joy and into the fellowship both of himself and of all the saints. For the souls of the faithful, as soon as they depart out of their bodies, are immediately received into heaven, to reign with Christ the everlasting King, and to forever rejoice with all the saints. But in the last judgment, at which we believe the quick and the dead shall be judged by Christ our king, the bodies of the saints will be raised up, glorified, and coupled again to their souls. And however many have clung to Christ their king, since the beginning of the world, shall live forever and reign in glory together with Christ their king and prince. The prophets and apostles have spoken much about this kingdom of the saints, and chiefly the apostle St. John in his Revelation.

² Alioqui nullam in terris sedem vel palatium regni habet, Lat. omitted; Otherwise, he has no seat or palace of his kingdom upon earth.

The kingdom of God, or of Christ, is an everlasting kingdom. For just as the church shall be on earth even to the world's end — however this world and the prince of the world may rage — so after the judgment, the faithful shall live and reign with Christ, happy forever in both body and soul.

For the Lord says in the gospel: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against the church." ^{Mat 16.18} Also, the last times will be like the days of Noah. Though the wicked far exceeded in number the church of the faithful, yet Noah and his [family] were saved in the ark, but the wicked were destroyed with the flood. In such a way, iniquity will by all means surely prevail to the end of the world; but meanwhile, those who are elected into the kingdom of Christ will be saved by Christ, whom they will look for to be their judge; and they will see their Redeemer coming in the clouds of heaven.

Also Daniel describes in his prophecy the rising and falling of all kingdoms and of antichrist too; but he attributes no end to the kingdom of the saints or holy people, but witnesses that it will be everlasting. ^{Dan 7.26-27}

The prophet Zechariah does the same in his twelfth chapter. For the saints reign on the earth by Christ; and being translated from the earth into heaven, they will reign together with their king Christ forever. And the scripture often speaks of only one of these kingdoms. But we understand many places in scripture speaking of both these kingdoms. First of all, is that which is spoken by our Saviour: "When you pray, say, Our Father, which are in heaven, hallowed be your name, your kingdom come." ^{Mat 6.9-10} For we pray that he would reign in us while we live on earth, that we may also reign over the world and the prince of the world; and that we not be ruled by Satan, nor have sin reign in us; but rather, that being governed by him here, we may in the time to come, reign with Christ in heaven.

Contrariwise, what manner of kingdom the kingdom of the world is, appears by considering the head or the king and prince of it, who is the devil — the author of sin, of uncleanness, and of death. He reigns in the world, doubtless the prince of the kingdom of darkness. Not that God's Christ is not king of all things; but because unfaithful apostates, through their own proper malice, revolting from God to the devil, appoint him as their prince. He is the one to whom, of their own accord, they submit and yield themselves to be governed, living in all ungodliness, wickedness, and uncleanness; framing themselves like their head, the devil; with whom they shall be punished everlastingly in the world to come, because in this world, they have allowed themselves to be governed by him, doing his will.

Christ, the true king and monarch of the world, has overcome the "prince of this world," ^{Joh 12.31} who is elsewhere also called "The god of this world." ^{2Cor 4.4} And Christ has destroyed his kingdom — not that he should not exist as long as this world endures, but that he should not hurt the elect. Satan lives and shall live forever, yet in misery (which life indeed is death); but he has no power against those who are redeemed by Christ the prince. He has and shall have a kingdom even to the end of the world, but only in the children of unbelief.

This kingdom that is also in this world, is decaying; it is momentary and for a short time — for the world passes away, and all worldly things perish. But all the elect of God are true strangers from this kingdom; indeed, they are sworn enemies of this kingdom. Nor can the prince of darkness, by his power, pull away the partakers of the kingdom of Christ, into his kingdom of iniquity. Truly, he goes about this diligently, and he vexes the elect with diverse temptations — but they overcome through Him who in time past vanquished that false king and prince of thieves. He taught us that, despising this filthy prince and the world and the lusts of the world — giving our minds to innocence — we should yield ourselves to that good Spirit, to be governed by Him.

I have thus far declared these things, as briefly as I could, touching the KING Christ and his only and everlasting kingdom.

And now, Christ our Lord is a PRIEST. Yes, he is that chief, only, and everlasting priest, whom the high priests of the olden people prefigured and foreshadowed. For in his song that is altogether divine, David says: "The Lord swore, and will not repent him, you are a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek." ^{Psa 110.4} The blessed apostle, alleging and expounding these words in his epistle to the Hebrews, has written these words:

"The forerunner has entered into heaven for us, made a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek. For this Melchizedek, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham coming from the slaughter of kings, and blessed him, to whom also Abraham gave a tenth of all things; who first indeed is called by interpretation the 'king of righteousness,' then also 'king of Salem,' which is 'king of peace;' of an unknown father, of an unknown mother, of an unknown kin, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life, but likened to the Son of God, remains a priest forever." ^{Heb 6.20-7.3}

Surely our Lord Jesus Christ is both a righteous and peaceable king, and the righteousness and peace of the faithful. And he is that everlasting priest who according to his humanity, is believed to be born of the virgin without seed of man, and therefore of an unknown father; and according to his divinity, he is begotten of the Father, and therefore of an unknown mother; and he is unspeakably begotten from everlasting, and therefore of unknown kin, having neither beginning nor end of life.

For even though he was dead and buried according to his humanity, yet according to his divinity, he remains God immortal and everlasting. The self-same who is a king, is also acknowledged to be a priest, not according to the order of Aaron, but according to the order of Melchizedek. For as the scripture remembers this one as a priest, so one Christ remains priest forever, having an everlasting priesthood. But high priests in time past were called and anointed; they did not thrust themselves into such an office by force or deceit. Thus the apostle said:

"No man takes the honour to himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. So also Christ did not take glory to himself to be made high priest, but is made and confirmed by Him who said to him, 'You are my Son, this day have I begotten you.' As he also says in another place: 'You are a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek.'" ^{Heb 5.4-6}

But nowhere do you read that our priest was anointed with visible oil: for he was anointed with invisible oil — namely, with the fulness of the Holy Ghost. As the prophet witnesses: "Your God has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your fellows." ^{Heb 1.9} And again: "The Spirit of the Lord upon me: for the Lord has anointed me, and sent me to preach good tidings to the poor." ^{Luk 4.18; Isa 61.1}

Furthermore, we read that the office of priests in times past, was to serve in the tabernacle, to teach the people, to make intercession between God and men, to pray for the people and to bless them, to sacrifice also, and to consecrate or sanctify. And now, it is manifest that Jesus Christ is the lawful priest; and it is certain that he is tied not only to these self-same offices, but indeed to so much more excellent offices than these, by how much more he has obtained an excellent priesthood. Those priests, according to the order of Aaron, served in the corruptible and figurative tabernacle. But our Lord, being taken up into the true tabernacle, heaven itself, ministers to all the saints of God. For heaven and the church of saints is the true tabernacle and temple of our high priest. Christ our priest is the only and everlasting teacher and master of his universal church. For not only has he so taught that age which lived in the days of his flesh, but the Spirit of Christ was in the prophets, by whom also he now rules all the seats of his catholic church. ¹

Christ himself still speaks to us, and will speak even to the end of the world, by the mouth or writings of the holy apostles, and all teachers preaching the doctrine of the apostles. And this doctrine is sufficient for the catholic church; for it fully comprehends all those things of Christ which pertain to a holy and happy life. Christ our high priest makes intercession for all the saints in his own temple. For being the only advocate and patron of all the faithful, he prays to the Father for us on the right hand of God; for he ascended to the right hand of God the Father, that he should always appear there in the presence of God, to faithfully follow all our suits. ² I have spoken of this more at large in my last sermon,³ where I treated invocation and intercession. The same Lord only blesses us. For he was made a malediction and curse for us, that we might be blessed in him, according to that notable and ancient prophecy: "In your seed shall all the nations of the world be blessed." ^{Gen 22.18} Moreover, Christ our Lord sacrifices for us: for he offers incense when he makes supplication for us, and appears on the right hand of God. And he offers a sacrifice for sins to the living God — not a sacrifice of a beast, but of himself, always an effectual sacrifice, to make satisfaction for all the sins of the people. Since I have abundantly treated this in the treatise about ceremonies,⁴ I am being purposely briefer here. Again, since our Lord Jesus Christ is the holy of holiest, doubtless he sanctifies and consecrates his catholic church, anointing it with the oil of the Holy Ghost, that we may be made both holy and priests, to offer spiritual sacrifices to God. For we read that that holy ointment, poured on Aaron's head, ran down to his beard, and even to the skirts of his clothing. For Christ, the high priest of his universal church, pours his Spirit upon those who are very far off, as well as upon those who are near at hand. For he cries in the gospel: "If any man thirsts, let him come to me and drink. He that believes in me, as the scripture has said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of the water of life." ^{Joh 7.37-38} And again: "For their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified in the truth." ^{Joh 17.19}

To be short, when we say and confess that Jesus Christ is the priest or bishop ⁵ of the faithful people, we say this: that Christ is our chosen and appointed teacher and master, to govern and teach his universal church, to make intercession for us, and to plead all our suits faithfully before the Father in heaven. He is the only patron, mediator, and advocate of the faithful with God — who by the sacrifice of his body, is the perpetual and only satisfaction, absolution, and justification of all sinners throughout the whole world. ⁶ He consecrates as priests those who believe, that they also might offer to God the Father through Jesus Christ acceptable sacrifices, and might be the house and tabernacle of God.

Out of this, it will be easy to judge what manner of priesthood Christ's is, who is our high priest and bishop. His priesthood is the very office or very function and working of the priest, by which Christ, himself the priest, executes all things in heaven and in the catholic church, which belong to his priestly office. Therefore, it must be that this priesthood of Christ our high bishop, is not visible and corporal, but altogether spiritual. For Paul says very well, "Christ would be no priest if he were on the earth:" ^{Heb 8.4} where those who are of the tribe of Levi minister in the tabernacle or temple; where there is a temple or tabernacle with manifold holy garments and vessels. But Christ our Lord is of the tribe of Judah, born, of a royal tribe, I say. Yet we are not ignorant, meanwhile, that the royal tribe, that is, the tribe of Judah, and the priestly tribe, that is, the tribe of Levi, were mingled together. For we read that Elizabeth, who was of the daughters of Aaron, was cousin to the Virgin, who was the mother of God, and of the line of David. Nor is our Lord at any time said to have used the temple or the holy vessels in his ministry. For although he sometimes taught in the temple, he did not teach only in the temple. He never sacrificed in the temple at the holy altars, either of incense or of burnt-offerings. He never used priestly garments, which were figurative — of which I spoke when I expounded the ceremonial laws.¹

Therefore, when he would sacrifice for the satisfaction of the sins of the whole world, he suffered outside the gate, and offered himself a living and most holy sacrifice, according to the shadows or types, prophecies and figures foreshown in the law of Moses. In like manner, I treated this in the discourse about the ceremonial laws. And when he had offered the sacrifice of his body, he ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand of the Father, that from there he may give light to his church, and always appear there for us, in the presence of God the Father. And therefore he does not now corporally execute his priestly office on earth, teaching us in a like way as he taught the men of his age, in the days of his flesh. For now he illuminates with his Spirit the minds of his people, and he daily repairs or renews the evangelical doctrine of the apostles. And yet, for all that, he himself speaks by the mouth of those who teach and preach the gospel. He blesses us from heaven, that is to say, he enriches us with all heavenly blessings. Speaking of him, the apostle says: "And the anointing, which you have received of him, dwells in you: and you do not need any man to teach you; but as the same anointing teaches you about all things, and it is true and not lying, and as it has taught you, you shall abide in it." ^{1Joh 2.27} Speaking about him, the divine prophet says: "I will pour water upon the thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground: I will pour my Spirit upon your seed, and my blessing upon your stock (or buds). They will grow together as the grass, and as the willows by the water's side." ^{Isa 44.3-4} By these words we learn that Christ our high priest has no need of a bishop, suffragan, ² or vicar in his church; for he himself is present with his church, and governs it by his Spirit. The self-same Christ, at the right hand of the Father in heaven, does not humbly fall on his knees and make intercession for us, as often as we sin. For, "In the days of his flesh, when he offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, he was heard once" ^{Heb 7.27} in that which he feared." ^{Heb 5.7}

For now he always appears for us in the presence of God. All our matters are manifest in his sight; and the Father beholds the face of his Christ, for whose sake he is pleased with all his members, hearing them and giving them whatever healthful things they require, according to that saying of our Saviour: "Truly, truly, I say to you, Whatever you ask the Father in my name, he shall give it you." ^{Joh 15.16} Therefore, here we must imagine no turmoils, no molestation, no labour with which he should be wearied who is the intercessor, advocate, and priest of all before God the Father in heaven. I also put you in mind of this in my last sermon, where I treated invocation and intercession.³ Therefore, in executing his office before God in heaven, our priest needs no altar of incense, no censer, no holy vessels or garments, much less the altar of burnt-offerings; for on the cross, which was his altar, he offered himself up but once for all. Nor was there any mortal man worthy to offer the living Son of God, to the living God. And that solitary sacrifice is ever effectual to make satisfaction for all the sins of all men in the whole world.

And though I alleged in the discourse about the ceremonial laws, many testimonies touching these things, I cannot stay myself here, but must cite to you some that are notable. For this matter, in which the fruit of Christ's divinity and humanity — to be short, in which all our salvation consists — cannot worthily and diligently enough be imprinted in men's hearts. Paul says to the Hebrews, speaking of the priests of the old Testament, and comparing Christ our high priest with them — indeed, by all means preferring him:

"And among them many were made priests, because they were not allowed to endure because of death. But Christ, because he endures forever, has an everlasting, (or unchangeable) priesthood; for it does not pass over to another by succession. Therefore he is able also perfectly to save those who come to God by him, seeing that he ever lives to make intercession for them. For such a high priest it became us to have, (who is) holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sins, and made higher than the heavens. He did not need daily, as those high priests did, to offer up a sacrifice first for his own sins, and then for the people's; for he did that once, when he offered up himself." Heb 7.23-27

And again he says:

"Christ has not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the likenesses of the true sanctuary, but into heaven itself, to appear now in the sight of God for us: not that he should offer himself often, as the high priests entered into the holy places every year in strange (or with other) blood; for then he must have often suffered since the foundation of the world. But now at the end of the world he has appeared once, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. And as it is appointed to men that they shall once die, and after that comes the judgment, even so Christ, once offered to take away the sins of many, shall be seen the second time without sin by those who wait for him unto salvation." Heb 9.24-28

And again the same Paul says:

"Every priest appears daily ministering, and often offers one manner of offering, which can never take away sins. But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, sits forever at the right hand of God, and from then on waits till his enemies are made his footstool. For with one offering he has made perfect (or consecrated) forever those who are sanctified." Heb 10.11-14

All these sayings up to here are the apostle Paul's. And I think that these testimonies are not to be made manifest and agreeable to our purpose by a larger interpretation; for they are all most evident, even without any exposition of ours, and very aptly apply to the matter which we have in hand. For they plainly set forth and lay before our eyes the whole priesthood of Christ, especially that which belongs to the intercession and the only and everlasting sacrifice or satisfaction for sins. It also belongs to the same priesthood to consecrate all the faithful as priests unto God. Not that we should offer for the satisfaction of sins, but that we should offer our prayers, thanksgivings, and ourselves, and the duties of godliness, every moment. For St. John the apostle and evangelist says: "Jesus Christ, prince of the kings of the earth, loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God and his Father." Rev 1.6 We may find the same sentence in the epistle of St. Peter also. 1Pet 2.5, 9

So that in these we may see what fruit rises and flows to us from the divinity and humanity of Christ our king and high priest. For he could not be prince of kings and high priest, unless he were God and man.

Here this place requires us to say something about the name of a Christian, and of the duties of a Christian man.

We have the name of Christians from Christ, to whom, being inseparably knit, we are members of that body of which he is head. And Christ is not his proper name (for he is called Jesus), but a name of office, derived from the Greek word chrisma, which signifies anointing; ¹ thus Christ signifies anointed. Therefore, Tertullian says, it is not a proper name, but an attributed name. And he adds, "Anointed is no more a name than clothed or apparelled, which are incidental to the name." ² But the kings and high-priests were anointed with oil; and therefore Christ signifies to us the one who is king, high-priest, or bishop. And because we are named Christians from Christ, who has anointed us with the Holy Ghost, we are also truly kings and priests. Here you may see how great a benefit we received from Christ, God and Man; for he has made us kings and priests.

We see what the duty of Christians is: namely, to maintain this dignity even to the last gasp, lest it be taken from us again by Satan. ^{Rev 2.10} Furthermore, if we are kings, we are lords over things, and are free and ruling, not ruled or in subjection. We are free, I say, from sin and everlasting death, and from all uncleanness; lords over Satan, prince of this world, and over the world itself. For we rule the world and the flesh: we are not ruled by them. To this belong those words of the apostle: "Do not let sin reign in your mortal body, that you should obey the lusts of it. Neither give your members as instruments (or weapons) of unrighteousness to sin. But give yourselves to God, as those who are alive from the dead, and your members as instruments (or weapons) of righteousness unto God. For sin shall not have power (or dominion) over you." ^{Rom 6.12-14}

And therefore, when the prince of this world — yes, and the world itself, and the flesh, and sin, and the wicked affection of it — do what they can to draw us out of freedom into bondage again, we must (because we are kings) valiantly resist them, and continuing in conflict, we must vanquish and overcome them by the virtue of Christ reigning in us. For St. John the apostle says: "All who are born of God overcome the world; and this is the victory which has overcome the world: even your faith." ^{1Joh 5.4} To this belongs the doctrine of freedom and bondage, which I treated in the former Decade.³ By all these we gather that the principal duty of Christians is always to stand in battle array, and to keep their place, to watch and endeavour by all force and means, lest at any time being overcome by their enemy Satan, they are robbed of their royal or kingly dignity, and hauled down into the bondage of hell. Truly, if we overcome in Christ and with Christ, we will reign together with him; that is, we will live with him and all the saints in glory for ever and ever. And thus we are kings in Christ; thus we are Christians.

Again, because we are Christians, that is to say, anointed, surely we are priests also. And therefore, according to our priestly office, we teach, admonish, exhort, and comfort all our brethren, and all men committed to our charge. Notwithstanding, we necessarily distinguish between the Christian priesthood and the ecclesiastical ministry. All Christians truly, men as well as women, are priests; but we are not all ministers of the church. For we cannot all, one with another, preach publicly, administer the sacraments, and execute other duties of pastors, unless we are lawfully called and ordained to it. Our priesthood, common to all, is spiritual; and it is occupied in the common duties of godliness, not in the public and lawful ministries of the church. Thus, one may and ought to instruct and admonish another privately; and while he does so, he executes a priestly office — as when the good man of the house ⁴ instructs his children at home in godliness; or when the good wife of the house teaches and corrects her daughters; to be short, when every one of us exhorts every neighbour of ours to the desire and study of godliness.

For the apostle Paul says: "Exhort one another daily, while it is called today; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin." ^{Heb 3.13} Moreover, since we are priests, we must offer sacrifices worthy of our God. And we have sufficiently testified that besides Christ, our high and only priest or bishop in all ages and in the whole world, none offers a satisfactory sacrifice to take away sin. For when he offered up himself, he offered a sacrifice but once, yet ever effectual to cleanse the sins of all. Therefore, we offer him thanksgiving and praise, celebrating the memory of that one and only sacrifice: we offer prayers: we offer ourselves, that is to say, our bodies, a living and a reasonable sacrifice to God, ^{Rom 12.1} together with all kinds of godliness and well-doing. For Paul says: "By Christ we offer the sacrifice of praise always to God, that is, the fruit of lips confessing his name. Do not forget to do good and to distribute; for with such sacrifice God is well pleased." ^{Heb 13.15-16} But touching these sacrifices, I have spoken more in my former sermon,¹ in which I treated what true service of God is. But since all sanctification is and rises from one high priest, Christ Jesus, we can sanctify ourselves in no other way than with honest and pure conduct of life. This is required at our hands: namely, that we be holy, and that we sanctify the name of our God with an innocent life, that it is not spoken evil of through us by men, but that they may see the good works of the faithful, and glorify the Father which is in heaven. ^{Mat 5.16} There is none who may not see that all the duties of a Christian man are comprehended in these points; unless we exercise ourselves earnestly in them, I do not see that we are worthy of so excellent a name.

Luke is witness that this most holy name was first given to the faithful at Antioch in Syria. Yet, let no man so understand this, as if previously that name had been altogether unknown to all men. For now it has become most common; but in times past, it was the name only of the most excellent and holy men, those who were so indeed rather than so accounted; though they were also in some manner acknowledged as such by this name. For in his Ecclesiastical History, Eusebius mentions that the ancient fathers Adam, Seth, Noah, Abraham, and others like these, were all Christians; and therefore Christian religion is the very purest, most perfect, and most ancient [of religions].

The words of Eusebius, if any require them, are these:

"The nation of the Hebrews is not new, but famous to all men in antiquity, and known to all. Their books and writings contain ancient fathers, whom they report about before the flood, rare indeed and few in number, yet most excellent in godliness and righteousness and in all kinds of virtues; and after the flood, they report about others of the sons and nephews of Noah, such as of Terah and Abraham, of whom the posterity of the Hebrews boast as their captain and progenitor. So that if any man says that all those were Christians from Abraham himself even to the first man, were beautified with the testimony of righteousness through their works, though not in name, truly he would not stray from the truth. For "Christian" signifies a man who excels others in the knowledge and doctrine of Christ — with moderation of mind, and righteousness and continence of life, and through fortitude of virtue, and confession of godliness toward the one and only God of all creatures. And those ancient fathers no less esteemed this name than we do. Nor did they take care about the corporal circumcision, as we also have not; nor of keeping the Sabbath-day, as we also have not; nor of abstaining from meats, nor other differences. Moses first ordained these things afterwards, and figuratively delivered them to be performed. Such things even today do not pertain to Christians. But they plainly saw the Christ, the anointed of God. Also, as it was already declared before, he appeared to Abraham, and answered Isaac and Israel, and spoke to Moses, and to the prophets after him. Whereby you will find that these godly men also obtained the name of Christ, according to that saying spoken of them — namely, 'Do not touch my Christs (or my anointed ones), and do my prophets no harm.'¹ ^{Chr 16.22} Therefore it is manifest that this godly invention of those men who lived holily in the time of Abraham, which is preached to all nations of late by the doctrine of Christ, is the first, most ancient, and eldest of all."¹ This much from Eusebius.

Furthermore, if we behold ourselves in this mirror of a Christian name, we will see that very few today are worthy of this name. Truly, all of us are commonly so called, and we would be named Christians; but few of us live a life worthy of our profession. We are named Christians by a holy anointing. The holy anointing is the Holy Ghost himself. "Upon whom shall my Spirit rest?" says the Lord; "even upon him that is poor, and of a lowly troubled spirit, and stands in awe of my words." But we set lightly by the word of God; we have very troublesome heads; we are corrupt with evil affections and lewd lusts; we swell with pride; and therefore we lack the ointment of holy oil, or are void of the Holy Ghost. Who therefore can say that we are Christians? We are all of us in manner, ruled by wicked desires, by the flesh, the world, and the prince of this world; few of us rule the world, and the flesh, and those things which are in them. Therefore, it is not the Spirit of God that bears rule in us, but the spirit of the world and the flesh.

The devil, the world, and the flesh have dominion over us; for in them we live, and them we obey. Thus being estranged and let loose from all righteousness and holiness, we have become slaves, serving a most vile and filthy slavery. For not desiring to be delivered, we neither seek a redeemer; nor do we rise and rebel against them, being impatient of their tyranny. But like faint hearted cowards, we yield ourselves to be brought in subjection, and to be kept under their tyranny. Indeed, these irk us and turn us from our labours, watchings, prayers, and from all our duties of godliness; and being careless, we lie lurking in a place of voluptuousness. But who would grant such swine the most holy name of a Christian, except someone who is both exceedingly foolish and wicked? It is no marvel then if such are thrust down into hell, there to burn eternally, and there to be yoked eternally to the one whom they have most wickedly chosen for themselves to follow.

And now, which one of us is there who teaches, admonishes, and exhorts those who boast and brag of this Christian name? I say nothing here concerning the doctors or teachers of the church; but my talk touches the office and duty of a Christian man. Truly, most of us are slow in instructing our families and fellow-brethren. For either it grieves us to take the pain, or else we fear danger. Therefore we turn the office of admonishing and instructing upon the public ministers of the church, as though nothing at all of this matter were required of us. For this reason, statements are heard uttered by men, in a manner that is unseemly to be spoken: "I do not have the office of a minister, I am no (pfaff) priest. Therefore, why should I instruct? Why should I admonish?" And these do not care how blasphemous and filthy things are spoken either at home or abroad; for they live to themselves, and think that the glory of God and the soul's health of their neighbour does not belong to them at all. But what sacrifices do we offer that are worthy of God and of our name? Where are prayers and thanksgivings? Where is the mortification of our flesh, and the denials of this world? Where is compassion, or well-doing? Where is a holy and harmless life? The contrary (if the need were so required) I could reckon up in a long catalog. But to what end would it be to make a large discourse about those things that are manifest to all men?

¹ Euseb. Hist. Eccles. Lib. i. cap. 4. Tom. i. pp. 31, 32. ed. Burton. Oxon. 1838.

For who, I ask you, denies that the life of this present age (of those men, I mean, who brag and boast of their Christian name) is filthy, stinking, and pestilent? Since these things are too true and evident, I have done nothing amiss in saying a little earlier, that today there are few Christians. Those who are wise and desire to live according to their name, let them hear our Saviour speaking in the gospel of Matthew: "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leads to destruction, and there are many who go in there. Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leads to life, and there are few who find it." ^{Mat 7.13-14}

Furthermore (this should have been said first of all), those who commit those things which by all means obscure and darken the kingdom and priesthood of Christ, very greatly offend against religion and Christian profession — because, just as they do not sincerely acknowledge the priesthood and kingdom of Christ, so they boast that they are to be chiefly praiseworthy, commendable, and catholic. Christians, being content only with this title and name, do not ambitiously seek or admit to another name. But these men, as though "Christian" were but a light and trifling name, never rest until they are also called by other names; as though they were baptized into the name of Brion,¹ Benet,² Robert,³ or Francis.⁴ Christians, clinging only to their law giver, master, and teacher Christ, do not acknowledge the voice of strangers, nor do they go a straw's breadth from the divine scriptures. But these other men charge you with heresy unless you receive and worship as heavenly oracles, all kinds of constitutions of the Romish church, even though they are flat contrary to the words and teaching of Christ. Christians acknowledge themselves to have one king, one deliverer, one Saviour, and one head in heaven. But these men worship his vicar on earth, and attribute salvation not only to trifling things, but to very stinking and loathsome things.

Christians put all their trust in God, to whom they offer all their vows and prayers by Jesus Christ, whom they believe to be the only high priest and most faithful patron and advocate of all who believe. But these others make their prayers to creatures and men's imaginations, and choose for themselves as many patrons and intercessors as there live saints in heaven. Christians know that the sacrifice of Christ once offered, is always effectual to make satisfaction for all the sins of all men in the whole world, and of all men of all ages. But these men, with frequent complaints, say that it is flat heresy not to confess that Christ is daily offered by sacrificing priests, who are consecrated to that purpose. Therefore, the name of a Christian is common to all; but the thing signified and meant by the name is common only to the faithful who cling to one Christ.

Now, I conclude my whole discourse about Christ, a king and a priest, with these words of St. Augustine:

"The Son of God who made us, is made among us; and being our king, he rules us. And therefore we are Christians, because he is Christ. He is called Christ a Chrismate — that is to say, by anointing. Kings and priests were also anointed; and he was anointed king and priest. Being a king, he fought for us; being a priest, he offered himself for us. When he fought for us, he was overcome, as it were; and yet, by right he has overcome indeed. For he was crucified; and on the cross on which he was nailed, he slew the devil — and then he was our king. But why is he a priest? Because he has offered himself for us. Let a priest have something to offer. What could man find to give? A clean sacrifice? What sacrifice would that be? What clean thing can a sinner offer? Wicked sinner! O ungodly wretch! Whatever you bring, it is unclean. Seek within yourself what to offer: you will find nothing. Seek outside of yourself what to offer: he is not delighted in rams or goats or bullocks; they are all his, though you do not offer them. He found nothing clean among men, which he might offer for men. Therefore, he offered himself: a clean offering, an undefiled sacrifice. Therefore he did not offer that which we gave to him, but that which he took of us; and that he offered pure and clean. He took flesh in the womb of the virgin, that he might offer pure and clean flesh for us who were unclean. He is a KING; he is a PRIEST. Let us rejoice in him." ¹

4-8. THE EIGHTH SERMON: OF THE HOLY GHOST.

OF THE HOLY GHOST, THE THIRD PERSON IN TRINITY TO BE WORSHIPPED, AND OF HIS DIVINE POWER.

It remains that, after we have expounded the mysteries of the Son of God our Lord Jesus Christ, we consequently speak of the Holy Ghost and of his divine power and operation. For unless he inspires our minds and rules our tongue, we will never be able to either worthily or profitably speak or hear anything concerning him. For just as no man knows those things which are of God, but the Spirit of God, so men fetch their understanding of heavenly things and their knowledge of the Holy Ghost, from nowhere else than from the same Spirit of God. Let us therefore pray and beseech God the Father, that by his Son Jesus Christ he would grant to enlighten our dark and misty minds, by sending his holy Spirit into our hearts, and to direct us in the sincere way of truth according to the holy scriptures.

And first of all, it seems not unprofitable to expound the word spirit, because in the scripture it is variously taken and often used — so that one who is ignorant of the force of that word, will not seldom greatly err. Properly, spirit is the signification of an element — it signifies air, wind, breath. In that signification, we read this spoken by our Saviour: "The wind blows where it lusts, and you hear the sound of it, but cannot tell where it comes from, and where it goes." ^{Joh 3.8} And Paul says: "If I pray with an unknown tongue, my spirit prays, but my understanding is made unfruitful." ^{1Cor 14.14} Look, the apostle uses spirit for the breath or voice; for he joins it to the tongue, and he contrasts it with the mind. By a metaphor, it is translated to every bodiless substance, and used in contrast to the body. Therefore, spirit signifies an angel, either good or bad. For the prophet (whose words Paul has repeated) says: "Who makes his angels spirits, and his ministers a flaming fire." ^{Psa 104.4} And again: "Are they not all ministering spirits?" ^{Heb 1.14} These testimonies are understood about good angels. When the scripture speaks of evil angels, commonly it adds something, such as an evil spirit, or an unclean spirit. We also call spirits or ghosts, which have taken some shape that cannot be well-discerned, spirits. So when the apostles saw Christ, not believing that the Lord was risen again with his true body, they thought they had seen a spirit. Showing his feet and his hands to them, he says, "A spirit does not have flesh and bones as you see me have." ^{Luk 24.39} Again, spirit is taken for the breath of life; as with the Latins, to breathe is to live, to stop breathing is to die. David says: "When you give it to them, they gather it; when you open your hand, they are filled with good. When you hide your face, they are troubled; when you take away their breath, they die, and are returned again to their dust." ^{Psa 104.28-29} And the Lord in Moses ¹ says: "I will destroy all flesh in which there is breath of life." ^{Gen 6.17} Also, the reasonable soul of man is specifically called spirit, insomuch that spirit is often taken in the holy scripture for the reasonable soul of man.

For in the gospel you read, "Jesus, when he had bowed down his head, gave up the ghost" (or the spirit). ^{Joh 19.30} And you read of the holy martyr Stephen, "They stoned Stephen, calling on and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." ^{Act 7.59} Solomon said previously: "The dust will be returned to the earth from where it came, and the spirit shall return to God who gave it." ^{Ecc 12.7}

And sometimes spirit signifies the affection and motion, the readiness and provocation of the mind. For Solomon says: "A man who does not refrain his appetite" or spirit, "is like a city which is broken down." ^{Pro 25.28} You may often find in the scriptures the spirit of pride, anger, lust, or envy, taken for a proud, angry, lustful, or envious affection. Also in Luke 13.11, the very sore disease, or source of sickness, is called the spirit of infirmity. The spirit also signifies those spiritual motions which the Holy Ghost stirs up in the hearts of the saints, yes, and the very gifts that are poured into the hearts of men by the Spirit; which is to be seen everywhere in Paul. Elsewhere, spirit is opposed to the letter, body, figure, type, or shadow. And it is used for a higher or mystical meaning, and for the very pith of the thing; as when Paul says: "The circumcision of the heart is the circumcision which consists in the spirit, not in the letter." ^{Rom 2.29} And again: "The Lord has made us able ministers of the new Testament, not of the letter, but of the spirit. For the letter kills, but the spirit gives life." ^{2Cor 3.6} Therefore, you may find spirit taken for inspiration, revelation, and doctrine. For John says, "Do not believe every spirit, but prove the spirits, whether they are of God or not." ^{1Joh 4.1} And again: "Do not quench the Spirit; do not despise prophecies." ^{1The 5.19-20} Last of all, God is called that unmeasurable and unspeakable power of the Spirit. "God," says our Lord, "is a Spirit, and those who worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." ^{Joh 4.24} By this means, the word spirit is common to all the persons of the reverend Trinity — though it is particularly applied to the third person in the Trinity, about whom we make this sermon.

And though the Holy Ghost, as he is God, cannot be compassed within limits (for by his own nature he is unspeakable, immeasurable, incomprehensible, and everlasting), yet notwithstanding — that I may say something in a certain order concerning him — if it will not be otherwise, I will at least shadow out that which the scripture, the inspiration of the Holy Ghost himself, very largely declares about him.

The Holy Ghost is the third person in Trinity, to be worshipped, very God, proceeding from the Father and the Son. He enlightens, regenerates, sanctifies, and fulfills the faithful with all good graces. But I think it is sufficiently declared at large in the third sermon of this Decade, that the Holy Ghost is the third person in the holy Trinity. Surely this single sentence of our Saviour, "Baptize them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," ^{Mat 28.20} abundantly confirms to godly minds, that the Holy Ghost is the third person in Trinity.

Moreover, that he is very God — of the same power, glory, majesty, and being with the Father and the Son — that verse especially proves, because he is the third person in the holy Trinity. Nor must we think that he is lesser than the other two, just because he is counted in the third place. For though the blessed Trinity is remembered by us in order, yet notwithstanding, there is no degree, time, place, or number in the blessed Trinity. For blessed Athanasius made his confession according to the scripture,¹ and said:

"The catholic faith is this: that we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity; neither confounding the persons, nor dividing the substance. For there is one person of the Father, another of the Son, and another of the Holy Ghost: but the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is one; the glory is equal, the majesty co-eternal. As the Father is, such is the Son, and such is the Holy Ghost. The Father uncreated, the Son uncreated, the Holy Ghost incomprehensible. The Father eternal, the Son eternal, and the Holy Ghost eternal — and yet are they not three eternal, but one eternal," etc.

And Augustine too, in his fifteenth book, de Trinitate, cap. 26, says: "In that high Trinity which is God, there are no intervals of time by which it may be shown or at least demanded, whether the Son was first born of the Father, and afterward the Holy Ghost proceeding from them both," etc.

Truly, we confess that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost are one God, and that the same is eternal. Therefore let it trouble no man, that the Spirit is put in the last place. For when the apostle framed his blessing in his epistle to the Corinthians, he said: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." ^{2Cor 13.14} He mentions the Holy Ghost in the last place. But the same Paul says, "There are diversities of gifts, but it is the self-same Spirit: and there are differences of administrations, but it is the self-same Lord: and there are diverse manners of operations, but it is the self-same God, who works all in all." ^{1Cor 12.4-6} This sets the Spirit in the first place, teaching that the order of names does not make any difference in their dignities. In this manner also, in the previous testimony (2Cor 13.14), he placed the Son before the Father; this did not overthrow the order which the Lord set down in Matthew, but it shows the equality of the Trinity in honour.¹ For what can you say more plainly than what the scripture says: that the Holy Ghost sanctifies, renews, regenerates, gives life, and saves? And these are operations agreeable to God only. By operations, therefore, we manifestly acknowledge that the Holy Ghost is God; he is of the same essence and power with the Father and the Son. For the Holy Ghost, from the beginning — before all creatures, visible and invisible, — is a Creator, not a creature, as Job witnesses: "His Spirit has garnished the heavens." ^{Job 26.13} Again: "The Spirit of God has made me, and the breath of the Almighty has given me life." ^{Job 33.4} Zacharias, the priest and father of St. John the Baptist, says: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for he has redeemed his people: as he spoke by the mouth of his holy prophets, who have been since the world began." ^{Luk 1.68, 70}

And ² St. Peter says: "For the prophecy did not come in olden times by the will of man, but holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." ^{2Pet 1.21} I ask you, who cannot gather from this, that the Holy Ghost is God? For God spoke by the mouth of the prophets; and the Holy Ghost spoke by the mouth of the prophets: therefore the Holy Ghost is God. In express words, the same Peter has also called the Holy Ghost God, when he accused Ananias of theft, yes, and also of sacrilege. For when he had said, "How is it that Satan has filled ³ your heart to lie to the Holy Ghost?" ^{Act 5.3} He then adds, "You have not lied to men, but to God." ^{Act 5.4} Those things which St. Paul taught, the doctor of the Gentiles, agree in all points to the doctrine of St. Peter. For he called believers, the temples of God. "Do you not know that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwells in you?" ^{1Cor 3.16} And again: "Do you not know not that your bodies are the temple of the Holy Ghost who is in you, whom you have from God, and that you are not your own?" ^{1Cor 6.19} To be the temple of God, and to be the temple of the Holy Ghost, Paul takes to be one and the self-same thing. It follows, therefore, that the Holy Ghost is God. For in his epistle to the Corinthians, he expressly names the Holy Ghost "God." For after he had said, "There are diversities of gifts, but it is the self-same Spirit," ^{1Cor 12.4} and had reckoned up the kinds of gifts, he then adds, "And all these things, one and the self-same Spirit works, distributing to every man severally even as he wills." ^{1Cor 12.11} And he himself said a little before, "There are diverse manners of operations; but it is the self-same God, who works all in all." ^{1Cor 12.6}

But Didymus Alexandrinus,⁴ a man of excellent learning, knits up a most evident argument of the Godhead of the Holy Ghost, also declaring that his nature altogether differs from the nature of angels. For in Lib. i. de Spiritu Sancto, he has written this (St. Jerome translating):

³ seduxit, Lat. — deceived or seduced.

⁴ Didymus the Blind (c. 313-398) — a Christian theologian in the Coptic Church of Alexandria. He led his famous Catechetical School for about half a century. Bullinger says Didymus is of the "Grecian churches" (p. iv.310).

"If the Holy Ghost were a creature, he would have at least a limitable substance, which all things have which are made. For although invisible creatures are not limited within place and bounds, yet they are limited in the property of substance. But the Holy Ghost, since he is in many places, does not have a limitable substance. For in sending out the preachers of his gospel, Jesus filled them with the Holy Ghost. But all the apostles did not go to all the nations together, but some went into Asia, some into Scythia, and others dispersed into other nations, according to the dispensation of the Holy Ghost which they had with them. This was even as they heard the Lord saying, 'I am with you always, even to the end of the world.' ^{Mat 28.20} This agrees with it: 'You shall be witnesses to me, even to the utter most parts of the world.' ^{Act 1.8} Being sent into the furthest parts of the earth to bear witness of the Lord, they were therefore severed from one another by a very great distance; and yet they had the Holy Ghost present with them, dwelling within them, whose substance is not limitable. Therefore, it is manifest that the power of angels far differs from this power of the Spirit. For example, the angel which was present with the apostle when he prayed in Asia, could not at the same time be present with others who were abiding in other parts of the world. But the Holy Ghost is not only present with men who are severed from one another, but he is also a continual dweller in every angel, principality, throne, and dominion," etc. ¹

Now, who cannot gather by this, that the Holy Ghost is true and very God? The same author has gathered many ² arguments for the true Godhead of the Holy Ghost; and next to him is the holy father Cyril;³ and holy Athanasius has absolutely discoursed to Theophilus on that matter, *Lib. de Trinitate ii.*⁴ These few testimonies, thus far recited, we think will suffice those who obey and love the truth.

Those who steadfastly believe these things, are not moved by any strange opinions and questions, curiously (indeed, wickedly) brought in about this matter by ill-occupied persons. For some are reported to have denied that the Holy Ghost is Lord; for they have taught that he is a minister, and as it were, a certain instrument of the Father and the Son.⁵ But Christ our Lord joined the Holy Ghost to himself and to the Father, when he delivered the form of baptism; for he says, "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." ^{Mat 28.19} And yet it is manifest that a creature is not joined to the Creator in baptism, nor that there is any servile condition in the Godhead. Therefore, the council of Constantinople in their creed ⁶ use certain terms for the Holy Ghost, by which they might destroy certain errors, calling him "Lord, and Giver of life." For when it calls him Lord, it makes him equal to the Son, and excludes the condition of a servant or minister. Beside that, it denies that he is their instrument; for there is one Lord: there are not many lords; and the Son is not lord of the Holy Ghost; but the lordship is common to the three persons, who are only one Lord. And seeing that the Holy Ghost is the Lord, surely he is not appointed to a servile ministry, but is endued with lordly authority; nor is he an under-servant to do the work, but a joint worker with the Father and the Son; yes, and he himself works as Lord.

Again, certain others are reported to have taught that the Holy Ghost is not a substance or a person, but an accident as it were; ¹ that is say, a stirring up, a provocation, or a motion of a godly and renewed mind. And indeed, our mind being illuminated with the Holy Ghost is often called spirit; but we must wisely distinguish the creature from the Creator, and the accident from the substance. The blessed apostle distinguished our spirit from the holy Spirit of God, when he said; "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. The Spirit itself bears witness to our spirit, that we are the sons of God." ^{Rom 8.14, 16} And the same apostle says: "The flesh lusts contrary to the spirit, and the spirit contrary to the flesh." ^{Gal 5.17} And who does not understand that the mind of man, instructed by the Holy Ghost, is here called the spirit; and not the third person himself in the reverend Trinity? And that mind, as touching illumination, is not of itself, but it proceeds from the Holy Ghost illuminating it. Nor does it come from any other than him who is the third person in Trinity. That mind is not the very person of the Holy Ghost — imagination proceeds from the soul, and yet it is not the soul itself. That stirring of the spirit in us is an accident, but God is not an accident, nor is he mingled with the accident. We must therefore confess, according to the scriptures, that the Holy Ghost is a person subsisting — co-equal in nature or essence — with the Father and the Son. And therefore he is to be worshipped and glorified by us as very God and Creator. Again, a godly and holy motion stirred up in the minds of holy men by the Spirit, is the effect and working ² of this Holy Spirit, and is called a holy spirit, but in a way proper to it. Otherwise, we do not deny that the Holy Ghost himself, being promised, is communicated to us, but according to our capacity, and as He wills. For who is the one among men, who is able to comprehend the fulness of the everlasting and incomprehensible God?

Furthermore, touching the proceeding of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, the divines have disputed curiously, subtly, and busily. For the question is asked, Whether he proceeds from the Father alone, or from the Son also?

In this question, the Latinists seem to disagree very much from the Grecians. The question is also asked, What manner of proceeding this is? Omitting many curious questions, we will briefly declare those things to you which are wholesome and agreeable with the holy scriptures. For who would be able to canvass all the questions of curious men, and all the bold and unclean thoughts of idle heads, without offence to good men, and especially of the simple hearers?

The scripture manifestly teaches that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and from the Son, which most plainly shows that he is the Spirit of either or both of them. For he is the one of whom the apostle says: "Because you are sons, God has sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts." ^{Gal 4.6} And the Son says, speaking of the same Spirit: "For it is not you who speak, but it is the Spirit of your Father who speaks in you." ^{Mat 10.20} Again, the same Son says of the Holy Ghost, "Whom I will send to you from the Father." ^{Joh 15.26} And again, he says elsewhere, "Whom the Father will send in my name." ^{Joh 14.26} Therefore, he proceeds from both — from the Father as well as from the Son. For although this is said about the Holy Ghost, "Which proceeded from the Father;" ^{Joh 15.26} yet it is not denied that he proceeds from the substance of the Son also. But what is more, Cyril, a Greek writer expounding the gospel of St. John, and interpreting this same place, says:

"When he had called the Comforter the Spirit of truth, that is to say, his Spirit (for he is the truth), ^{Joh 14.6} he adds that he proceeds from the Father. For as he is the Spirit of the Son naturally in his abiding, and proceeding through him, so also he is surely the Spirit of the Father. But to whom the Spirit is common, surely they cannot by any means be dissevered in substance." ¹

Again, St. Augustine in his fifteenth book, De Trinitate, cap. 26, says:

"The Son says, 'as the Father has life in himself, he gave that life to the Son.' ^{Joh 5.26} Who may understand by this, that the son was then without life? Rather, the Father so begat the Son outside of time, that the life which the Father gave to the Son in begetting him, is co-eternal with the life of the Father who gave it to him. Let him understand that, just as the Father has power in himself that the Holy Ghost might proceed from him, so he has given power to the Son that the same Holy Ghost may proceed from him, both without beginning. Thus it is said that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father, that what proceeds from the Son might be understood to be from the Father and the Son. For if the Son has anything, he has it from the Father: and surely he has it from the Father, that the Holy Ghost proceeds from him." ²

By all this, we gather that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father as well as from the Son.

Now, concerning the manner of proceeding, we say,³ that the proceeding of the Holy Ghost is two-fold or of two sorts: temporal and eternal. Temporal proceeding is that by which the Holy Ghost proceeds to sanctify men; eternal proceeding is that by which from everlasting he proceeds from God. The Spirit proceeds from both these ways, and from the Father as well as the Son. Nor does he proceed from the Father into the Son separately, and from the Son into creatures: for I say the nature and substance of the Father and the Son is one and the self-same, inseparable, and co-everlasting too.

Temporal proceeding is commonly called sending and a gift. For the Holy Ghost is sent to men in two ways. He is sent visibly, that is to say, in some visible form, such as a dove, or fiery tongues. It says in the gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, that he was given to Christ and the apostles this way. And he is sent invisibly; he is daily and every moment, as it were, given to the faithful — the Spirit of Christ waters us with his grace, and gives us faith, hope, and charity.

Moreover, the eternal proceeding of the Holy Ghost, by which he proceeds out of the substance of the Father and the Son, is unspeakable, such as the begetting of the Son by the Father. For this reason, it is not said in the gospel that he has proceeded, or, shall proceed, but he "proceeds." For so the Lord declares his eternity of proceeding, and that the substance of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost is co-eternal, and unseparable, and not differing at all. St. Augustine says in his fifteenth book De Trinitate, twenty-sixth chapter: "He that is able to understand the begetting of the Son by the Father outside of time, let him also understand the proceeding of the Holy Ghost from them both outside of time." ⁴ And if anyone asks this question, Since the Holy Ghost proceeds from the substance of the Father and the Son, how does it come to pass that he is not called the Son? I answer, that the scripture calls the second person the Son, and testifies that he is the only-begotten of the Father; and that nowhere is there any mention that the Holy Ghost is begotten, or that he is called the Son. Nor have the ancient fathers given any other answer to this question.

I like the similitude which is expressed here: if one stream were to flow from two springs, it might well be said to flow from them both, and yet it could not be said to be the son of either of them. It will not seem unfruitful or beside the purpose to add to this, the disputations of Didymus concerning this sending — so is to avoid anyone understanding perversely, and according to the flesh, what is to be spiritually interpreted by faith:

"The Holy Ghost the Comforter is sent by the Son, not according to the ministry of angels, or prophets, or apostles, but as it becomes the Spirit of God to be sent by the wisdom and truth of God, having an unseparable nature with the self-same wisdom and truth. For the Son, being sent by the Father, abiding in the Father, and having the Father in himself, is not separated nor sundered from the Father.

And the Spirit of truth also, being sent by the Son in the aforesaid manner, proceeds from the Father, not from elsewhere leaving toward other things; for this is likewise impossible and blasphemous.¹ For if this Spirit of truth is limited within a certain space, according to the nature of bodies, then leaving one place he goes to another. But even as the Father is far above and beyond the nature of all bodies, not consisting in any one place, so also the Spirit of truth is not limited to a place, seeing that he is bodiless, and as I may more truly say, excelling all and every reasonable creature. Therefore, because it is impossible and wicked to believe of him these things which I have said are true of bodily creatures, we must understand that the Holy Ghost so went out and came from the Father, as our Saviour bears witness that he himself went out and came from the Father, saying, 'I went out and came from God.' And just as we distinguish places and changing places, from bodiless things, so also we distinguish these statements inwardly and outwardly, from the nature of intellectual things. For these two words pertain to bodies that may be touched and have bigness. Therefore, we must believe the unspeakable word, which faith only and alone makes known to us: that our Saviour is said to come out from God, and the Spirit of truth proceeds from the Father," etc.²

I pass over other questions that are both scrupulous, and very many untouched. In these things I require a religious mind, and not a curious one; a faithful mind, and not a subtle one.

Now, there is but one Holy Ghost, because he is always one and the self-same God. It is the same Spirit, therefore, who spoke to the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, and who today speaks to us in the church. Therefore, the council of Constantinople is said to have confessed their faith thus: "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord;" and shortly after: "Who spoke by the prophets. And I believe one catholic and apostolic church."³ These sayings are taken out of the holy scripture. For St. Peter testifies in express words, that the Spirit of Christ was in the prophets, and there was no other spirit in the apostles than the Spirit of Christ.^{1Pet 1.11} And Paul the apostle says: "Seeing then that we have the same Spirit — as it is written, 'I believed, and therefore I have spoken,' — we also believe, and therefore speak."^{2Cor 4.13}

From this testimony Tertullian infers, and (no doubt) soundly: "It is one and the self-same Spirit therefore, who was in the prophets and the apostles."⁴ He promises that the self-same Spirit will be always in the church. They erred therefore, yes, they erred foully, whoever among those of old feigned one God and Spirit of the old Testament, and another of the new Testament.⁵ Didymus

Alexandrinus, the bright light in his age of all the Grecian churches, in his first book entitled De Spiritu Sancto, says this:

"Neither should we think that the Holy Ghost is divided according to substances, because he is called by a multitude of good graces.¹ For he cannot suffer, he cannot be divided, nor yet be changed; but according to his various workings and understandings, he is called by many names of good graces, because he does not endue his partakers with his communion, in one and the self-same power,"² etc.

Furthermore, the Holy Ghost in man increases or fills, and diminishes or departs: not that there is any change to be found in God (who, as commonly and truly said, neither receives more or less); but because man, according to his capacity, either receives the Spirit plentifully and liberally, or else measurably and sparingly, even as it pleases the Holy Ghost.^{1Cor 12.11} The portion of the Spirit of Elijah was given double to Elisha from heaven.^{2Kng 2.9} And it is said of our Saviour, that "the Father gave him the Spirit not by measure."^{Joh 3.34} For the Lord himself elsewhere says: "Whoever has, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whoever does not have, from him shall be taken even what he has."^{Mat 13.12} Saul had received excellent graces; but because he did not use and exercise them, the good Spirit of God departed from him, and the evil spirit succeeded and tormented him.^{1Sam 16.14} And the Spirit of God departs even as it comes, in an instant. For when we are forsaken by the Lord, the Spirit of God departs from us. Thus David prayed: "Do not cast me away from your presence, and do not take your holy Spirit from me." And again: "Establish me with your principal Spirit."³

After these things, it seems that next we must diligently search out what the effect and what the power of the Holy Ghost is. The power of the almighty and everlasting God is unspeakable; therefore, no man can fully declare what the power of the Holy Ghost is. Yet I will say something, making those things manifest which he works chiefly in men.

For the Father works all things by the Spirit. By him God creates, sustains, moves, gives life, strengthens, and preserves all things. By the self-same Spirit, he regenerates his faithful people, sanctifies them, and endues them with diverse kinds of graces. Thus, in the description of him mentioned above, his principal powers and effects which show themselves by their working in men, are comprised in four members. I said that he illuminates, regenerates, sanctifies, and fulfils the faithful with all good graces. That these things may be better understood, it will be good, first of all, to declare (as well as we can) the appellations or names of the Holy Ghost, which the holy scripture gives him; and then to recite one or two places from the old and new Testaments, to set forth and declare the power of the Holy Ghost.

First, he is called the Holy Spirit of God, because those creatures which are sanctified, are sanctified by Him. The heavenly Father sanctifies with his grace, but through the blood of his beloved Son; and sanctification is derived to us and sealed by the Spirit. Therefore, the holy Trinity, being one God, sanctifies us. It is a wicked thing to therefore attribute sanctification to strange and foreign things. It is a wicked thing to translate purification and justification from the Creator to the creature. Moreover, the Spirit is called holy, to differentiate him from other spirits. For we read in the scriptures, that there was and is a spirit of the world, a spirit of infirmity,⁴ a spirit of fornication and uncleanness, and a spirit of pride. The Holy Ghost is separated from all these, which inspires into us the contempt of this world; which opens the scriptures to us, and confirms us in truth; which purifies our hearts, and makes our minds chaste, and thus preserves them; finally, which makes us lowly and gentle, and drives away from us all maliciousness.

The same Holy Ghost is called the Spirit of God, and of the Son of God, to distinguish it from the spirit of Satan; and it is called the Spirit of the Son, because it is the proper and natural Spirit of the Son, which he also communicates to us, so that we also might be the sons of God.

For Paul says: "You are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwells in you." ^{1Cor 3.16} Again: "If any man does not have the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." ^{Rom 8.9} And again: "Because you are sons, God has sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father." ^{Gal 4.6}

Moreover, our Lord himself, in the history of the gospel, calls the Holy Ghost a Comforter, saying: "I will pray the Father, and he will give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever; even the Spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive, because the world does not see him, nor know him: but you know him; for he dwells with you, and shall be in you." ^{Joh 14.16-17} For παρακλητος (paracletos) signifies a comforter, a stirrer up or provoker, an exhorter, an advocate or patron who pleads the cause of his client. For the Holy Ghost is the mouth, the eye, the heart, the counsel, the hand, and the foot of all the faithful. Didymus, in his work entitled De Spiritu Sancto, says:

(Christ), "giving the Holy Ghost a name corresponding to his working, calls him the Comforter. This is because he not only comforts those whom he finds worthy of him, and sets them free from all heaviness and trouble of mind, but He gives them a certain incredible joy and gladness, insomuch that a man, giving God thanks because he is counted worthy of such a guest, may say, 'You have given me gladness in my heart.' For everlasting joy and gladness is in the heart of those in whom the Holy Ghost dwells." ¹

Truly, the Holy Ghost alone makes the consciences of men void of care — quiet and at peace before God in the matter of justification and in all temptations of the world. Paul says: "This only I desire to learn of you, whether you have received the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the preaching of faith." ^{Gal 3.2} The apostles being beaten with rods, when they were endued with the Holy Ghost and had that Comforter present in their minds, went rejoicing from the presence of the council, because they were counted worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Christ. ²

So we read in the ecclesiastical history, that the martyrs of Christ, being full of the Holy Ghost, even in extreme torments and the most bitter deaths, were most patient, and sang praises and gave thanks to God.

Furthermore, we have heard that the Holy Ghost is called by the Lord, the Spirit of truth. For in another place also, he beautifies him with that name. For he says, "When the Comforter comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father, he will bear witness of me." ^{Joh 15.26} And he is called the Spirit of truth, because there is another hypocritical spirit, ³ an erroneous and lying spirit in the mouth of all false prophets. Our Spirit works in his worshippers sincerity, gentleness of mind, and integrity. He teaches them all truth. For our Lord elsewhere in the gospel says: "That Comforter, who is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatever I have said to you." ^{Joh 14.26} Therefore, the Spirit of truth has taught the apostles all truth that is to be believed, and all godliness; and they have fully delivered the same to the church. For the Holy Ghost drives away all errors, destroys all heresies, confounds all idolatry and ungodliness, and pours true faith into our hearts, and establishes true religion in the church. The Acts of the Apostles afford us very many examples. By this Spirit of God, the apostles foretold things to come, shadowing out among other things the antichrist and the corruption of this our last age, and admonishing the church lest the elect be entangled in errors and blasphemous wickedness.

Now, he is called the Spirit of promise, for he was promised of God by the prophets through Christ to the fathers, to the apostles, and to all who believe the apostles' doctrine, ¹ and at length was fully given and performed through Christ.

This word puts the godly in mind, that they should not ascribe having so great and healthful a gift to their merits, but to the mere grace of God, And the Holy Ghost is granted, yes, given to us, by the promise of God. From this it follows that all the gifts of God are freely given — which the apostle Paul principally proves, and earnestly beats into our heads, in his epistles; especially those to the Romans and the Galatians.

In Luke, the Lord says: "If with the finger of God I cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God has come upon you." ^{Luk 11.20} St. Matthew, repeating the same words, says: "If I by the Spirit of God cast out devils, then is the kingdom of God come upon you." ^{Mat 12.28} Therefore, the Holy Ghost is called the finger of God, namely, the might and power of God. Men of occupations ² work with their fingers. God works his works by his divine power, I mean, by his Spirit — whose power is so great, that even his little finger (give me leave to speak this way) surpasses all the power and strength in the world. That appeared in those sorcerers of Egypt. ³ Didymus repeats a parable touching the unity of the divine substance, and admonishes diligently and conveniently, so that we would not from corporal things, forge and feign for ourselves a corporal meaning for spiritual things. For he says:

"But beware lest, being cast down to base things, you imagine in your mind diversities or corporal actions, and begin to forge for yourself magnitudes, and distinctions, and other members of the body, greater and lesser. Or saying that the finger is apart from the hand, and the hand apart from him whose hand it is, and that it differs by many inequalities, just because the scripture now speaks of bodiless things — it is purposing to show the unity only, and not the measure of substance also. For just as the hand is not divided from the body by which it works and brings all things to an end, and is in him whose hand it is, so also the finger is not separated from the hand whose finger it is. Therefore, away with such distinctions and measurings when you think of God; and understand the unity of the finger, of the hand, and of the whole substance, by which finger the law was written in tablets of stone." ⁴ This far from Didymus.

Now the Holy Ghost in the writings of the prophets as well as that of the apostles, is shadowed by water, and a living or continual running fountain. The Lord says by Isaiah, "I will pour out waters upon the thirsty, and rivers upon the dry ground." ^{Isa 44:3} And by interpretation, he immediately adds: "I will pour my Spirit upon your seed, and my blessing upon your stock." And in the gospel, the Lord says: "If any man thirsts, let him come to me and drink. He that believes in me, as says the scripture, out of his belly shall flow rivers of water of life." ^{Joh 7:37-38} To which the holy evangelist ¹ adds by way of exposition: "But this he spoke of the Spirit, which those who believe in him would receive." ^{Joh 7:39}

Surely water makes barren grounds fruitful, cleanses defiled things, gives drink to those who are thirsty, and cools those who are in a heat. So the grace of the Holy Spirit makes barren minds fruitful, to bring forth fruit to the living God. And by that self-same grace, our hearts are cleansed from all uncleanness; it quenches the thirst of the soul, comforts it when afflicted, and fulfills all its desires.

Fire is simple and pure. It consumes some bodies, and purges others, making them finer and cleaner. It also warms, and has many profitable and necessary operations in man. Therefore, the Holy Ghost is rightly shadowed to us by fire. For he is pure and simple; he consumes the ungodly, cleanses the faithful from the filthiness of sins, and makes them burn with the love of God and of their neighbour — doubtless setting them on fire with the fire of his love.

When he was given to the apostles on the day of Pentecost, a sound was heard as if it had come with the force of a mighty wind. What was signified by this, was that the doctrine of godliness would be spread throughout the whole world by the power of God with wonderful success, despite ² the might of the whole world setting its shoulder against it in vain. For the wind (no man staying it) blows through the whole world, pierces all places, and no man can keep it out; it also has wonderful effects on bodies to change them. And the Holy Ghost pierces all things, softens men's hearts; and makes froward, stubborn, and rebellious men, into the most lowly, modest, and obedient of men.

Fiery tongues appear on the heads of the apostles and disciples endued with the Holy Ghost; doubtless this signified the operation or working of the Holy Ghost, of which these were signs and assurances. For he instructs, exhorts, and comforts the faithful. Nor does he arm his faithful apostles with cold tongues, but fiery tongues. When they preached the gospel, the apostles seemed not to speak, but to sound like lightning and thunder, for which two of them were called "the sons of thunder" by our Saviour. ^{Mar 3:17}

Furthermore, the Holy Ghost appears in the likeness of a dove upon the Son of God, when he was baptized by John the Baptist. ^{Joh 1:32} For a dove is mild and gentle, without malice or harm: from which sprung the proverb, "manners like a dove, dove-like simplicity;" and "gentler than a dove." For a dove among birds is like a sheep among four-footed beasts, which thinks no hurt to any living creature — thus Christ is also called a sheep or a lamb. Therefore, the wise man says very well about the Spirit of God:

"The spirit of wisdom is holy, one only, manifold, subtle, quick, moving,³ clear,⁴ undefiled, plain,⁵ sweet, loving what is good, sharp, cannot be limited, doing good, kind to man, steadfast, sure, free from care, having all power, circumspect in all things, and passing through all understanding, pure, yes, and the most subtle, spirits." ^{Wis 7:22-23}

Again, those who are endued with the Holy Ghost are called the anointed of the Lord, for the Holy Ghost is called both oil and anointing. Unless we are watered by the Holy Ghost, we grow barren and waste away — for we are void of living and heavenly moisture, and of our own nature, we always wither and grow dry. There was a notable figure of this anointing, in the ceremonial anointing of kings and priests. St. John says:

"And the anointing which you have received from him dwells in you, and you do not need any man to teach you; but as the same anointing teaches you of all things, and it is true, and not lying, and as it taught you, abide in it." ¹

For the Lord also says in Jeremiah 31.33-34:

"This shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days: I will plant my law in their inward parts, ² and write it in their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people. And from then on, no man will teach his neighbour or his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for they will all know me, from the lowest to the highest, says the Lord. For I will forgive their misdeeds, and never remember their sins any more."

But we showed a little earlier that the Holy Ghost is the universal teacher of all truth. What St. Paul says seems to belong to this: "It is God who has anointed us, who has also sealed us, and has given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts." ^{2Cor 1.21-22} For now the Holy Ghost is not only called anointing, but also the sealing up or earnest of our salvation: for ἄρρα (arra), or ἄρραβων (arraboon), is a part of payment, which assures that the whole sum will be paid; namely, a pledge. And surely the Holy Ghost now testifies, yes, it seals and assures us, that we are the sons of God, and that when the time comes, we will be received into the everlasting inheritance. Paul again says: "You are sealed with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, unto the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory." ^{Eph 1.13-14} That assurance marvellously confirms and comforts the minds of the faithful in temptations; it encourages them (besides that) to patience in adversity, and to holiness of life. For St. John said of this, "Little children, you are of God, and have overcome them; for greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world." ^{1Joh 4.4}

And again: "Now we are the sons of God, and yet it does not appear what we shall be: but we know that when he appears, we will be like him, for we will see him as he is. And every man that has this hope in him, purges himself, even as He also is pure." ^{1Joh 3.2}

And just as the Holy Ghost is an unspeakable knitting together, by which the three persons are inseparably coupled with one another in everlasting love and concord — even so, he couples the spouse of Christ with her spouse, with a knot that cannot be loosed; and he joins together all the members of his mystical body in an everlasting covenant between them. For just as the members of our body are joined together whole and sound by the benefit and enjoying of life,³ so the mystical body of Christ is united together by the Holy Ghost. Therefore, it is no marvel that he is called by the name of love, who pours love into our hearts. ^{Rom 5.5}

And even though the operation of the Holy Ghost may be understood by these names, I will add certain testimonies of scripture, out of which his power or effect, especially in us, may be more fully understood. Isaiah almost in the beginning of his prophecy, describing the person of the King our Messiah, says among other things: "The Spirit of the Lord will rest upon him; the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord; and shall make him of deep judgment in the fear of God." ^{Isa 11.2-3} Though he declared many of the powers of the Spirit, he has not reckoned up all of them. Therefore, it is not for us to bring the powers of the Spirit into a strait, and with the common sort, to limit them to seven in number. For we have heard up to here that there is the spirit of promise, of doctrine, of humility, and gentleness, etc. Beside these, there are reckoned up many others with them; for he is the spirit of wisdom. But how great this is, and how far it reaches, is manifest even in the words ¹ of Solomon. To wisdom is joined understanding, which is said to be the action and application of wisdom, ordered or standing. framed to things, places, times, and persons. Counsel is required and given in doubtful matters, and shows what we may most conveniently do.

Strength ministers sufficient force and constancy to execute and perform — yes, and to patiently bear — whatever we have learned by counsel, either to be done or to be suffered. And now, knowledge is an experience obtained and gotten by long time and use. Fear is added to these, that is to say, godliness and true religion. Unless we refer all our sayings and doings to this — that is, to wisdom, understanding, counsel, strength and knowledge — nothing will profit us. To be short, whoever is endued with the Spirit of God, whatever he either does or says, will savour of the fear of God; finally, he will say and do all things to the glory of God. And all these things truly are freely and fully drawn out of the only fountain of the Holy Ghost.

Paul the apostle says in his epistle to the Romans, describing the wonderful force of the Holy Ghost working in us after being new-born:

"Those who are in the flesh cannot please God. But you are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if the Spirit of God dwells in you. If any man does not have the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. And if Christ is in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the spirit is life for righteousness' sake. But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, even he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies, because that his Spirit dwells in you." ^{Rom 8.8-11}

The same apostle teaches in his epistle to the Corinthians, that by the revelation of the Holy Ghost, the mystery of the kingdom of God is manifestly opened to us.

"God has revealed them to us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searches all things, yes, the deep things of God. For what man knows the things of man, save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so, no man knows things of God, but the Spirit of God. And we have not received the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things which are given to us by Christ." ^{1Cor 2.10-12}

To this pertain these words of our Lord and Saviour out of the holy gospel:

"I tell you the truth, it is expedient for you that I go away; for if I do not go away, that Comforter will not come to you; but if I depart, I will send him to you. And when he has come, he will rebuke the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment: of sin, because they do not believe in him: of righteousness, because I go to the Father, and you see me no more: of judgment, because the prince of this world is judged already." ^{Joh 16.7-11}

And it is evident that in all these clauses, the whole sum of religion is contained, which the Holy Ghost has most plentifully delivered to the church. We also touched of these in the exposition of the names of the Holy Ghost. It follows in the gospel:

4-8. THE EIGHTH SERMON: OF THE HOLY GHOST.

"I still have many things to say to you, but you cannot bear them now. However, when he has come, who is the Spirit of truth, he will lead you into all truth. He will not speak of himself; but whatever he hears, he will speak, and he will show you things to come." Joh 16.12-13

And since it is certain that the Holy Ghost has come, it is evident that he led the apostles into all truth — insomuch that whatever does not agree with their writings is worthily suspected of a lie. Otherwise, I do not doubt that he speaks today in the church, by those who are his. But it is without controversy that the Holy Ghost does not contradict himself. And in the exposition of the names of the Holy Ghost, we touched that things to come were revealed to the apostles by the Spirit. Nor is it doubtful that today he reveals many things to the saints in the church, even those things which pertain to the preservation of the gospel of Christ, and the saints.

Again, we read in the epistle of Paul to the Corinthians:

"The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit with: for to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom, to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another is given faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another power to do miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another diverse kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues. But one and the self-same Spirit works all these, distributing to every man individually, even as he will." 1COR 12.7-11

All these things are manifest, and do not need any further exposition.

These are great and evident gifts of the Holy Spirit. If we also add to these, those words which the same apostle set down concerning the Spirit of God, we will make an end: "The fruit of the Spirit," he says, "is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." These I say, and all other virtues, the Holy Ghost (who works all good things in all men) grafts, plants, preserves, defends, and brings to full ripeness in the minds of the faithful.

To all these we will now add, instead of a conclusion, the most notable treatise of Tertullian touching the Holy Ghost. It is this:

"Because the Lord was departing into heaven, he necessarily gave his disciples a comforter, lest he leave them orphans in a way (which was not convenient), and forsake them without a certain advocate and tutor. He is the one who strengthened their minds and understandings; who distinguished ¹ the sacraments of the gospel; who was in the disciples the giver of light in heavenly things; by whom — being strengthened and established — they neither feared imprisonments nor chains for the name of the Lord; but rather treated the very powers and torments of this world as nothing, now being armed and emboldened through him. They have in themselves the gifts which this self-same Spirit distributes and directs certain ornaments to the church, which is the spouse of Christ. For it is he that appoints prophets in the church, instructs the teachers, guides tongues, works miracles, and gives health, brings to pass wonderful works, shows the discerning of spirits, establishes governments, endues with counsel, ministers and orders and disposes all other spiritual gifts. And therefore, he makes the church of God perfect and absolute, on all sides and in all things. It is he, in the likeness of a dove, who descended and remained on the Lord after he was baptized, dwelling fully and wholly only in Christ, not maimed or diminished in any measure or portion, but plentifully received into him with his whole abundance — that others might obtain from him a certain distribution of gifts, as the fountain of the fulness of the Holy Ghost wholly remaining in Christ — that from him might be derived veins of gifts and miracles, the Holy Ghost most abundantly dwelling in Christ. For Isaiah said the same thing, prophesying: 'And the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and strength, the spirit of knowledge and godliness, rests upon him. And the spirit of the fear of the Lord filled him.' ¹ Isa 11.2

The Lord himself in another place also says the self-same thing: 'The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he has anointed me; to preach the gospel to the poor has he sent me.' ¹ Isa 61.1 Likewise David says, 'Wherefore your God has anointed you with the oil of gladness above your fellows.' ¹ Psa 45.7 The apostle Paul speaks of this Spirit: 'For he that does not have the Spirit of Christ, is none of his.' ¹ Rom 8.9 'And where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.' ² Cor 3.17 He is the one who works by water the second birth of regeneration, being a certain seed of heavenly generation; and the one who consecrates the heavenly nativity, being a pledge of the promised inheritance; and as it were, a certain handwriting of everlasting salvation; who makes us the temple of God, and brings to pass that we should be his dwelling-house; who performs the office of an advocate, making intercession for us in the hearing of God, with sighs that cannot be uttered; and pouring forth his gifts of defence, he is given to be a dweller in our hearts and a worker of holiness; exercising that in us, he brings our bodies into everlastingness and to the resurrection of immortality, while he accustoms the disciples to be partakers in him of his heavenly power, and to be coupled with the heavenly eternity of the Holy Ghost.

For our bodies are trained up in him, and by him to proceed to immortality, while they learned to behave themselves moderately according to his ordinances. For it is he that lusts contrary to the flesh, because the flesh fights against him. ¹ Gal 5.17 It is he that bridles insatiable lusts; who tames immoderate concupiscences; who quenches unlawful desires; who vanquishes flaming affections; who abhors drunkenness, who banishes covetousness; who abandons riotous banquetings; who knits the knot of love and charity; who subdues the affections, drives away sects, shows the rule of truth, convinces heretics, casts out the wicked, and is a defence to the gospel. The apostle also says of him: 'For we have not received the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God.' ¹ Cor 2.12 Of this Spirit he triumphs, and says: 'And I think truly that I have the Spirit of God.' ¹ Cor 7.40 He says of him: 'And the Spirit of the prophets is subject to the prophets.' ¹ Cor 14.32

He says again of him: 'Now the Spirit speaks evidently, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to spirits of error and doctrines of devils, which speak false in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron.' ¹ Tim 4.1-2 'No man being guided by this Spirit calls Jesus execrable;' ¹ — no man denies that Christ is the Son of God, or forsakes God the Creator; no man utters any of his own words against the scriptures; nor does any man establish other wicked decrees; no man commands contrary laws.

'Whoever blasphemes against this Spirit shall never have forgiveness, neither in this world, nor in the world to come.' ¹ Mat 12.31-32 It is he that, in the apostles, bears witness to Christ, that shows constant faith of religion in martyrs, that plants marvellous continence of assured love in virgins, that keeps the laws of the Lord's doctrine uncorrupted and undefiled in others, that confounds heretics, reforms the froward, reproveth the unfaithful, reveals dissemblers and punishes the wicked, and preserves the church chaste and unstained in pureness of perpetual virginity and holiness of truth." ² This much from Tertullian.

4-8. THE EIGHTH SERMON: OF THE HOLY GHOST.

Thus far, and not without trembling, we have treated the most holy mystery of the reverend Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, which we have learned out of the scriptures. And now, here we will stay, humbly worshipping this Unity-in-trinity and Trinity-in-unity.

Let us keep in mind and acknowledge this distinction or division most manifestly declared in the scriptures, and the unity also commended to us with exceeding great diligence. For in the scripture, the beginning of doing, and the flowing fountain and well-spring of all things, is attributed to the Father. Wisdom, counsel, and the very dispensation in doing things, is ascribed to the Son. And the force and effectual power of working, is assigned to the Holy Ghost. Nevertheless, let us take heed lest through the distinction, we separate the unity of the substance of God; for there is but one God in whom those properties exist. It is but one fire, even though there are three things seen in it: light, brightness, and heat. For these rise together, and cease all at once. The light does not go before the brightness, nor the brightness before the heat. And though one thing is attributed to the light, another to the brightness, and a third to the heat; yet they work inseparably. Therefore, when we read that God created the world, we understand that the Father from whom are all things, by the Son by whom are all things, in the Holy Ghost in whom are all things, created the world. And when we read that the Son became flesh, suffered, died, and rose again for our salvation, we believe that the Father and the Holy Ghost, though they were not partakers of his incarnation and passion, yet notwithstanding, they wrought our salvation by the Son, whom we believe never to have been separated from them. And when sins are said to be forgiven in the Holy Ghost, we believe that this benefit and all other benefits of our blessedness, are inseparably given and bestowed upon us from one, only, true, living, and everlasting God, who is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. To whom be praise and thanksgiving for ever and ever. Amen.

4-9. THE NINTH SERMON: OF ANGELS AND DEVILS.

OF GOOD AND EVIL SPIRITS; THAT IS, OF THE HOLY ANGELS OF GOD, AND OF DEVILS OR EVIL SPIRITS; AND OF THEIR OPERATIONS.

NEXT, to this sermon of the Holy Ghost I will add a treatise about good and evil spirits; that is, about the holy angels of God, and about devils or wicked spirits, and about their operations. Since the holy scripture delivers to us an assured doctrine about them, and it is profitable in all points, it seems that we should not lightly regard it, but bring it to light with as much faith and diligence as we can. It would be a foul fault in someone who studies after godliness, to be ignorant of the dispositions of good and evil angels, of whom mention is made so often in the holy scriptures; yes, it would be a most dangerous thing, not to know what manner of creatures the devils are, which under that name might easily deceive and spoil us. But first we will speak of holy angels, and then of devils or spirits.¹

The word angel some say is a name of office,² not of nature. This is common to the Latins and Greeks, from whom it is borrowed; and it signifies an ambassador or legate, and therefore it has a larger signification. For the preachers of the truth are called angels, as in Malachi, ^{Mal 2.7} and in the apostle Paul;³ for they are the ambassadors or "messengers of the Lord of hosts." ^{2Cor 5.20} St. Peter also calls evil spirits angels;^{2Pet 2.4} as Paul also does, saying that the faithful shall one day judge the angels;⁴ and that the angel or messenger of Satan was sent to him.^{2Cor 12.7} Nonetheless, the scripture particularly calls angels the blessed spirits of God, ministers, and messengers, and heavenly armies.⁵

But the Sadducees denied that there are angels; for Luke in the Acts of the Apostles says: "The Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit; but the Pharisees confess both." ^{Act 23.8} And indeed, the whole scripture testifies that there are angels, mentioning in many places that they have appeared to men, and revealed to them the will of God, or otherwise accomplished His work. Truly, the Lord Jesus reasoning against the Sadducees in the gospel says: "You err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven." ^{Mat 22.29-30} Let us therefore believe that there are angels. For the authority of the Son of God, and the irrevocable truth of the holy scriptures, should worthily win more credit with us than the toys of all the Sadducees and wicked men. What, have not the heathenish poets and philosophers confessed that there are angels, whom they call gods? ⁶ For pretending that gods in the likeness of men were lodged and entertained by righteous men, they seemed to all learned men to have meant nothing else than what the holy scriptures mention: how Abraham and Lot received angels into their houses resembling strangers. But however the case stands, it is most certain, both by the holy scripture and by manifold experience, that there are blessed spirits of God — that is to say, good angels.

Now, what the nature of angels is, cannot be thoroughly declared by any man. For there are many things in the order of creatures, whose nature cannot be directly and perfectly expounded. They may nevertheless, in a way, and according to our capacity, be shadowed out. There are some, therefore, who say that angels are good spirits, ministers, of a fiery nature, created for the ministry or service of God and good men. Others say angels are heavenly spirits, whose ministry and service God uses to execute all things which he has determined. Therefore, we will not seem to miss the mark much, if we say that angels are good spirits, heavenly substances (I mean incorruptible), created for the ministry or service of God and men.

The writings of the prophets and apostles witness that angels are created by God. For Paul cites that saying of David, "Who makes his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire." ^{Psa 104.4} The same apostle says: "By Christ all things are created that are in heaven and that are on earth, visible and invisible, whether they are majesties ¹ or lordships, either rules or powers." ^{Col 1.16} This is why heretics have set forth toys, saying that angels are workers in the creation of all things and co-eternal with God: for in time, God by the Son created angels as well as all other creatures.

Now, touching the time when angels were created, whether with the light before man, or after man, and after all the works of God, let him who can, tell us. The holy scripture passes it over with silence, and pronounces no certainty of it. Epiphanius ² and Augustinus,³ ancient interpreters of the scriptures, learnedly and truly confess that there is nothing delivered in the scriptures about that matter: and that which is not delivered in the scriptures cannot without danger be inquired after; but without danger, we may be ignorant of it. It is sufficient to acknowledge that angels were created, at whatever time it seems they were created. Let us rather give God thanks that he has created for mankind such excellent ministers. Let us live a holy and angel-like life in the sight of God's holy angels. Let us watch lest he deceive us, who transfigures and turns himself into an angel of light, under a good show and likeness.

Now we must further see what manner of creatures angels are: they are heavenly spirits, and incorruptible and most swift substances. We say expressly that angels are substances — that is to say, creatures having essence or being. For some deny that they are substances subsisting in their proper essence or being; for they imagine that angels are nothing other than qualities, motions, or inspirations of good minds. But the canonical scripture calls them ministers. Our Saviour says that those who rise again, will be like the angels of God. ^{Mat 22.30}

St. Paul declares that the Son of God is more excellent than the angels, for they worship him as God their creator. ^{Heb 1.6} The self-same apostle says: "For you read in no place that the Son takes on himself the angels, but he takes on himself the seed of Abraham." ^{Heb 2.16} These testimonies most manifestly teach that angels are substances, not qualities or motions in men's minds — I say nothing now about how they have often appeared to men in the likeness or shape of men. Let us therefore hold and confess that angels are substances.

Furthermore, others have perhaps better declared what substances angels are, for which I begrudge no man. I confess that there are good spirits, to differentiate them from those that are evil; this will be spoken of later. I confess that they are good, not so much for the goodness of their nature in which they continued, as for their operation or working; for they always stir up and further us to that which is good. I also confess that angels are spirits, that is to say, spiritual, heavenly, incorruptible, and exceedingly swift substances. For the scripture says and witnesses,

"Who makes his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire." ^{Psa 104.4} The scripture, I say, terms angels spirits and a flame of fire — not that angels are corporal fire of their own nature and substance, but because fire in a way resembles those which in clearness, beauty, and incorruptibleness, and also in swiftness, quickness, and brightness, are the most beautiful and excellent creatures. The schoolmen's definitions say generally enough that the angels are bodily substances, but of their own kind; for God only is without body. In these words, they have thus set it down:

"Every creature is bodily; angels and all heavenly powers are bodily, even if they do not consist of flesh. Now, we believe that they are bodily by this: because they are limited in place, just as the soul also is, being clothed with flesh. (Angels perhaps today are more aptly said to be local or in place, not circumscriptively, but definitively ¹). We must believe that nothing is bodiless and invisible by nature, except God; that is to say, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. God therefore is rightly believed to be bodiless, because he is in every place, and he fulfills and conserves all things; and therefore he is invisible to all creatures, because he is without body." ² This much from the schoolmen.

But those bodies either of young men or old men, in which angels oftentimes appeared to the fathers, were not their proper or natural bodies, but were taken upon themselves, borrowed from elsewhere as it were — for a time and for the weakness of our capacity. And what manner of bodies those very same bodies were which they took, or where they were taken from, or where they were bestowed when they had ended their business, it is very hard to declare. St. Augustine, in his Enchiridion ad Laurent, cap. 59, says this:

"Who can declare with what manner bodies they have appeared to men, that they might not only be seen but touched, and again, convey certain visions — not with sound substance of flesh, but by spiritual power; not to the bodily eyes, but to the eyes of the spirit or mind; or to tell something, not outwardly in the ear, but inwardly in the mind of man. They may even be inward, as it is written in the book of the prophets, 'And the angel said to me, who spoke in me' (for he not only says who spoke to me, but in me;). Or they may appear even in one's sleep, and talk together with us in the manner of dreams. For we have in the gospel, 'Behold the angel of the Lord appeared to him in his sleep, saying,' etc. ^{Mat 1.20} For by these means, angels declare as it were, that they do not have bodies which can be handled. And they raise a very hard question: how the fathers washed their feet; ³ how Jacob by laying fast hold on him, wrestled with the angel.⁴ When these things come into question, and everyone gives his conjecture as he is able, their heads are not unfruitfully occupied, if a moderate disputation is taken in hand, and the error is removed of those who think they know what indeed they do not know. For what need is there, that these and similar things be affirmed or denied, or defined with danger, since without blame we may be ignorant of them?" ⁵

In these and similar causes let us acknowledge his omnipotence and wonderful dispensation, who does what he will — to whom truly it is not hard to create substances fit and agreeable for his purpose and appointment, since he made all visible and invisible creatures out of nothing.

Moreover, we affirm that angels, through the grace and power of God, are incorruptible substances; yes, and unchangeable in their felicity, without burden and hindrances. For also St. Augustine says, ad Pet Diac. de Fide, cap. 23, "that unchangeableness was not by nature grafted into angels, but freely given by the grace of God." ¹ The same Augustine, De Vera Religione, cap. 13, says:

"We must confess that, if only God is unchangeable, then angels are changeable by nature; but in that will, with which they love God rather than themselves, they remain steadfast and stable in him, and they enjoy his majesty, being subject most willingly to him alone." ²

These words agree with those in Augustine's Definit. Eccles., cap. 61, thus:

"The angelical powers, which continued steadfast in the love of God when the proud angels fell, received this by way of recompense: that from then on, they would never feel the fretting bite of the tooth of sin to seize them, and they would continually enjoy the sight of their Creator without an end of felicity — so created in him, that they would continue in everlasting steadfastness." ³

Truly the scripture, showing the incorruptibleness of angels, affirms that in the resurrection we will be like the angels; for we will rise incorruptible: therefore, angels are incorruptible. For thus says our Saviour:

"The children of this world marry wives, and are married: but those who will be counted worthy to enjoy that world, and the resurrection from the dead, do not marry wives, nor are they married, nor can they die anymore; for they are equal with the angels, and are the sons of God, insomuch as they are the children of the resurrection." ^{Luk 20.34-36}

Theodoret, In Divinis Decretis, has thus inferred from this:

"We do not therefore count the angels among the number of gods, as the poets and philosophers of the Grecians do; nor do we divide the natures of those who are without bodies, into male and female. For to an immortal nature that cannot die, division by kind is superfluous: for they have no need of increasing, since they feel no diminishing," etc. ⁴

The scripture in many places declares that the angels are most free and swift, and without impediment, burden, and hindrance. Thus, in the Acts of the Apostles we read:

"The priests put the apostles in the common prison; but the angel of the Lord by night opened the prison-doors, and brought them out, and said, Go and stand and speak to the people in the temple, all the words of this life. But when the officers came, and found they were not in the prison, they returned and told, saying, Truly, we found the prison shut with all diligence, and the keepers standing outside, before the doors." ^{Act 5.18-23}

In the same book, we again read thus:

"Herod put Peter in prison; and Peter slept between two soldiers, bound with two chains, and the keepers before the door kept the prison. And behold the angel of the Lord was present there," or stood by him, "and a light shined in the prison; and he struck Peter on the side, and stirred him up, saying, Arise quickly; and his chains fell from his hands. And shortly, when they were past the first and second watch, they came to the iron gate that leads to the city, which opened to them of its own accord." Act 12.6-10

Behold, no impediments or obstructions, however strong and mighty they were, hindered or stayed the angel of the Lord, that he might not execute most speedily the commission which he had from God. All things give place and make way to the Lord's ambassador. The iron chains fell from Peter's hands of their own accord; he walks safely through the thick troops of soldiers, the angel going before him; the lock of the prison-door, no man opening it, is unlocked; and when the servants of God had gone out, it is shut again. These angels, that is to say, these heavenly ambassadors, being of their own nature most swift and speedy spirits, are now resident in heaven, the power of God so willing and working. But as soon as it pleases the Lord of all, they are later present with men on earth, to whom they are sent by God from heaven. And they are present on earth, sometimes with one, and sometimes with another — not that they are not contained in their proper place. For when the angel told the women about Christ's resurrection, he was not at the same instant both in heaven and by the grave or sepulchre. For only God is not contained in place, for He is present in every place. But angels do not go forward fair and softly, nor are they moved by labour or toiling, in the manner of corruptible bodies.

Yet in the scriptures they are expressly said to ascend into heaven, and from there to descend to us. Gen 28.12 We very rightly believe that our souls, as soon as they depart out of the bodies, immediately enter into the kingdom ¹ of heaven. For the Lord has said in the gospel, "But has escaped from death to life;" Joh 5.24 and, "Today you shall be with me in paradise." Luk 23.43 And you read of Lazarus the beggar: "And it came to pass that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom." Luk 16.22 Now, to this also that saying of Daniel seems to belong: "As I was still speaking, making supplication, and confessing my own sin and the sin of my people Israel, and pouring forth my prayers before the Lord my God for the holy hill of my God; yes, while I was still speaking in my prayer, the man Gabriel, whom I had seen before in the vision, came flying hastily to me." Dan 9.20-21 Look, our souls are carried up into heaven by the angels, which notwithstanding, are elsewhere said to be taken up into heaven in an instant. Afterward, as soon as Daniel had prayed to the Lord, the angel, without any further delay, flying speedily (for so the scripture says for our capacity,) is present with him, and shows him that he is heard by God. Angels therefore are swift and surpassing speedy, being kept down with no weight, nor hindered or stayed from performing those things for which they are sent from heaven; even though they are contained in place as creatures (though not limited), and are moved with a certain order and manner agreeable to that spiritual nature.

This treatise requires perhaps that something also be spoken about the might, power, and strength of the angels. But what need is there for many words in such a manifest matter? For since the Lord, who sends forth his angels, is almighty, there is nothing that angels cannot do in their embassages ² and ministries. There is nothing in the whole course of nature, that is able to withstand the ministers of the almighty God. For angels are not called powers and virtues for nothing. I will show one example among many, and yet not the chief. One angel in one night, without any furnishings or much ado, slew in the tents of the Assyrians, at the walls of Jerusalem, a hundred eighty-five thousand of the most valiant soldiers. 2Kng 19.35

In Daniel we have such a description of an angel, by which both the power and excellence of angels may be gathered. "His body," he says, "was like the Turkish or jasper stone, his face to look upon was like lightning, his eyes as lamps of fire, his arms and feet were like polished brass in colour, and the voice of his words was like the voice of a multitude." ^{Dan 10.6} So that, it is not necessary to make a long discourse about the knowledge and wisdom of angels; for this is not a thing that surpasses our capacity, seeing that angels are creatures. But in what pertains to their embassages and ministries, surely they are most wise, in all points furnished, and in no part diminished. For He that sends them is everlasting wisdom itself, and he furnishes his ambassadors most perfectly.

Furthermore, touching the multitude and order of angels, certain divines have wittily and wisely enough disputed. The Scripture simply affirms that angels are innumerable. For Daniel says: "A thousand thousands ministered to him, and ten thousand thousands stood before him." ^{Dan 7.10} It is also read that Christ said to Peter: "Do you think that I cannot pray to my Father, and he shall send to me more than twelve legions of angels?" ^{Mat 26.53} Paul also says: "You have come into the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels." ^{Heb 12.22} Many distinguish that innumerable multitude into nine companies; and these again they bring into three hierarchies or holy principalities, of which they affirm that each of them has three orders: the first, seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; the second, lordships, virtues, and powers; the third, principalities, archangels, and angels. They add how they differ between themselves, and what is proper to every one of them. But St. Augustine, in his Enchir. cap. 58, says: "Where lordships, principalities, and powers differ between themselves, let those who can, tell us — if they are yet able to prove what they say. I confess myself to be ignorant of these matters." ¹

And the same Augustine says, Ad Orosium contra Luscillianistas:

"Truly the apostle says, 'whether seats (thrones), whether lordships, whether principalities, whether powers...' ^{Col 1.16} And therefore I steadfastly believe that there are seats, lordships, principalities, and powers in the hosts of heaven; and I hold it as an undoubted truth, that they differ somewhat between themselves. But what they are, and how they differ between themselves, I do not know. Nor truly do I think myself endangered for my ignorance of it, as I am for disobedience if I neglect the Lord's commandments." ²

And shortly after, in the same place, he shows that we must not busily and curiously search after these things. We willingly obey his counsel, perceiving that the scriptures, which minister to us all things necessary and healthful, have set down nothing concerning them.

Yet this we cannot deny: that those terms (or if you will so call them, orders of angels) are expressed in the holy scriptures. For this reason, and for our weakness, it is fitting in a way, to expound them as we may. These blessed spirits of heaven seem generally and simply to be called angels, because they are the messengers and ambassadors of the most high God. It appears they are called archangels, when they are sent with a message in God's greatest matters, to show or do things that are altogether hard and heavenly. For so we read in Paul, that "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of an archangel, and with the trump of God." ^{1The 4.16} That we may compare small things with great, we see that kings and princes in weighty affairs appoint none but noblemen to be their ambassadors. It appears that they are called thrones, because they always stand at the throne of God; or else, as we read in the prophets, it is because God had made and placed his own seat with angels, to be carried by them as if it were in the coach of a king.

As David says: "He bowed the heavens and came down, and there was darkness under his feet. He rode upon the cherubims," or was carried upon the cherubims, "and flew: he came flying upon the wings of the wind." ^{Psa 18.9-10} Furthermore, the description of the chariot and throne of God in Ezekiel is known. ^{Eze 10} They seem to be called lordships, principalities, and powers, because God executes his government, and exercises his own power in the world, by the ministry of angels. For so too they are called powers and armies, or the host of heaven: for they encompass the Lord as his guard; and he who is called the God of Sabaoth, or of hosts, the Lord, I say, of all angels, spirits, and creatures, whose ministry he uses when, where, how, and as much as it pleases him, also uses them as his soldiers. St. Jerome thinks they are called cherubims, from their exceeding knowledge.¹ Others expound them from swift. Seraphims have their name from ferventness; or because they are compared to most pure and clear fire; or because they are burning in the love of God.

By these names, in the meanwhile, are shadowed the manifold offices and diverse operations of angels; being desirous to comprehend these in few words, we have said that angels are created by God for the ministry of God himself and men. For David said: "Who makes his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire." ^{Psa 104.4} And again in another place: "praise the Lord, all you angels of his; you that excel in strength, you that fulfil his commandments, and hearken to the voice of his words. O praise you the Lord, all you hosts; you servants of his, that do his pleasure." ^{Psa 103.20} And Paul also says of angels: "Are they not all ministering spirits, who are sent out into the ministry for the sakes of those who will be heirs of salvation?" ^{Heb 1.14} But God uses the ministry of angels out of no necessity, but of his own good-will.

For he might be without them, since by his own word ² he brings to pass what he will: "For he spoke, and they were made; he commanded, and they were created;" ^{Psa 33.9} not one of all the angels jointly working with him. So today also, he is able without the help of angels, to bring to pass what he will. But because of his special goodness, he created them to partake of everlasting life and salvation. He uses their ministry toward us, as he also uses the service of other creatures, to whom they declare their faith and obedience toward God. And God exercises his unspeakable good-will both toward those whom by grace he has made partakers of everlasting joy, and also toward us, whom he has granted to honour with the service of so excellent a company. For among other countless benefits, and the greatest benefits of God, at which we are astonished (not without cause), this is not to be accounted the least: that he has given us angels to be our servants. Truly this is an exceeding great token of his fatherly care and regard toward us; especially because he frames himself so sweetly to our capacities and dispositions.

In times past, the Lord spoke with his own mouth at mount Sinai, to the church or congregation of the Israelites. But when he understood that they would rather He speak by their interpreter Moses, he took their wish and offer, and afterward spoke by Moses, using his ministry toward them. ³ Truly, God is able to pour most perfect faith into our minds by his Holy Spirit without any joint working of men. But because he knew it was profitable for us that it should be so, he instituted the ministry of his word; and he implants the faith of the apostles by the preaching of the gospel. And once that ordinance is made, he so precisely observes it that, when he might have done the same thing by angels, yet (by the angels) he sends those who are to be instructed in the faith, to the apostles. For it is manifest what the angel of the Lord did with Cornelius in the Acts of the Apostles. He sent him to the preaching of Peter. ⁴ Therefore, when God sees that the ministry of angels is convenient for us, out of His good-will, and upon no necessity, He uses their ministry toward men.

And doubtless angels love men exceedingly; and what they do, they do of their own accord, not under constraint or unwillingly. For they cannot but exceedingly love those whom they see to be so dear to their Creator, and that for their sakes he did not spare his only-begotten Son, but delivered him up into most bitter death for them. I make no mention here of the most ready obedience which they perform to their God, who wills and commands them to serve him and men. The Lord in the gospel witnesses that "the angels in heaven rejoice at the conversion and turning of men who are sinners." ^{Luk 15.10}

In Zechariah, the angel of the Lord is brought in very sorrowful for the misery of the captives in Babylon, and full of care for their deliverance from their captivity. All these things commend to us the love and affection of angels toward mankind. For otherwise, those blessed spirits are not moved with affections, care or sorrow, as we are in the flesh; but they are glad, and they rejoice as blessed spirits can rejoice, in whom there is no human affection. Such affections nevertheless are not only attributed to them, but to God himself, tropically ¹ or by a figure, and as they say ανθρωποπαθως (anthropo-pathos), that is, according to the affection of man, to the end that our minds may better understand and more easily conceive spiritual and heavenly things by parables. Even so, let us not think that parables always contain all things: therefore our minds must be lifted up to higher things, and spiritual things must be spiritually judged.

The ministry of angels extends very far; which I will declare by reciting certain kinds of them as briefly and as plainly as I can.

First, they do service to God himself in all things; which I think is sufficiently declared in what was said before. They all magnify God together, with everlasting praises, worshipping, glorifying, and rejoicing in him. For Theodoret, repeating certain testimonies of scriptures concerning this matter, says:

"The ministry or service of angels is the praising of God, and the singing of hymns or songs. For the holy prophet Isaiah says of the seraphim, that they cried and said, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God of Sabaoth; heaven and earth are full of his glory.' ^{Isa 6.2-3} And of the cherubim, the heavenly prophet Ezekiel says that he heard them saying, 'Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place.' " ²

The whole host of heaven also sings a birth-song to Christ their prince, when he was born, as seen in St. Luke, saying: "Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, and among men good-will." ^{Luk 2.14} So they go before them, with an example for men to follow, teaching what they too should do; that is, offer praise and thanksgiving to God on high, whom the angels also reverence and worship with us.

Moreover, the angels love the truth, and desire to have it spread abroad, and the glory of God furthered by all means; and therefore they lay blocks in the way of false prophets, hating them with their accursed doctrine and antichrist. For St. Peter testifies that the angels desire to behold the gospel of the Son of God.³ In the Revelation of Jesus Christ, made to John the apostle, the angel of the Lord binds Satan; ^{Rev 20.2} and the angels, furthering the gospel of Christ,⁴ set themselves everywhere against false Christians and false teachers. For even at the end of the world, "the Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and those who do iniquity, and will cast them into a furnace of fire." ^{Mat 13.41-42} They themselves stand in the presence of the Almighty God, awaiting his commandment. As soon as he commands them to go and execute his commandments, they make speed. Therefore, they come to men to declare the will and commandments of God. So the angel Gabriel came first to Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist; afterward he came to the blessed virgin, to show her the incarnation of the Son of God. Innumerable examples of this kind are found everywhere in the holy scriptures.

They watch for our safety, being careful for us, and yet without molestation — which I told you about before. They notify the faithful in convenient time, foreshowing dangers to come; and they also comfort the afflicted. For the wise men, being warned by the angel that they should not return to Jerusalem and to Herod, avoid great peril. Joseph also being commanded by the angel, flees into Egypt, delivering the Christ or anointed of the Lord ¹ out of the bloody hands of Herod. Christ also, at the mount of Olivet, being in a bloody sweat, is comforted by the angel. ^{Luk 22.43-44} And Hagar, the handmaid of Sarah, being in extreme danger, is refreshed by the consolation of an angel. ^{Gen 21.17} Also the apostle St. Paul, being very near shipwreck, hears this voice of the angel of the Lord: "Fear not, Paul; you must be brought before Caesar: and look, God has given you all those who sail with you." ^{Act 27.24}

Again, angels are sent for revenge on mischievous persons; I mean, to punishment those who are wicked and impenitent. For the first-born of the Egyptians are struck by the angel. ^{Exo 12.23, 29} In the Acts of the Apostles, the angel of the Lord strikes Herod Agrippa. ^{Act 12.23} It is said that, in the camp of the Assyrians, many were struck and slain by one angel. And David saw an angel with a sword drawn hovering between heaven and earth, afflicting the people with a most grievous plague. ^{1Chr 21.16} So we believe that the holy angels will come with the Son of man to judgment; as Paul witnesses and says: "Our Lord Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven, with the angels of his power, in flaming fire, rendering vengeance to those who do not know God, and who do not obey the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." ^{2The 1.7-8} For in the Revelation of Jesus Christ also, the angels pour out vials full of the wrath of God ^{Rev 16.1} upon the heads of false Christians.²

Moreover, they take upon themselves the charge and defence of us, God so commanding. They are our keepers, ready at hand, watching over us so that no adversity happens to us, and guide our ways. For to this belong the testimonies of the Psalms, and very many examples of the scripture. David says: "This poor (or afflicted) man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles. The angel of the Lord pitches his tents round about those who fear him, and delivers them." ^{Psa 34.6-7}

And in another psalm he says:

"No evil shall come to you, nor shall any plague come near your tabernacle (or dwelling). For he will give his angels charge over you, to keep you in all your ways. They will bear you in their hands, that you not hurt your foot against a stone. You shall go (or walk) on the lion and adder (or asp); you shall tread the young lion and the dragon under your feet." ^{Psa 91.10}

And the Lord plainly says in the gospel, that without doubt, little children have angels as their keepers. ^{Mat 18.10} Jacob the patriarch, greatly fearing his brother Esau, sees angels coming to meet him; and understands that angels were given to him as guides and to keep him on his way against the fierceness of his brother. ^{Gen 32.1} In the affairs of Elisha we read that the king of Syria besieged the city Dothan with a great host, in which Elisha led his life at that time, whom the king had purposed to take. When the servant of Elisha perceived that, and was troubled in mind, and lamented his master's case, Elisha said, "Do not fear; for those who are with us are more than those who are with them." The prophet also prayed and said, "Lord, I beseech you, open his eyes, that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the servant, and he looked, and behold, the mountain was full of horses and fiery chariots;" ^{2Kng 6.12-17} that is to say, he was armed and defended with the guard of a host of angels. Abraham also says to his servant: "The Lord God of heaven, who said to me, I will give this land to your seed, he shall send his angel before you," ^{Gen 24.7} namely, to direct your way, to defend you, and bring it to pass, that you may obtain your desire. For the Lord himself said to Moses in Exodus: "Behold, I will send my angel before you, to keep you in the way, and to lead you to the place that I have prepared." ^{Exo 23.20} In the Acts of the Apostles you often read that angels served the apostles, furthered their purpose, and defended them against their adversaries.

In Daniel, angels are introduced for princes, and presidents or governors of kingdoms: such as Michael with Gabriel, princes of the Israelite kingdom; another of the Persian kingdom; another of the Grecian kingdom; and each of them debate the matter touching his own kingdom, and fight for it. ^{Dan 10.5 ff} Not that there is any variance or disagreement in heaven, where doubtless there is plentiful peace, everlasting concord and quietness.

Nor that there are conflicts or battles fought between the angels, as there are between those gods whom the poet Homer describes. But by parable and allusion, heaven is compared to the court of some powerful and renowned prince, where ambassadors of various countries debate their diverse causes. This is done in consideration of our weak wit and slender capacity. For thus we ought to conceive in our mind: that God, who is the only Lord of all kingdoms, hears all men's suits, and takes in hand all men's matters; and that angels, at the word and will of God, minister to and serve God, when it pleases him to use their ministry and service. For so Nebuchadnezzar, also in a vision, saw a watchman coming down from heaven, and foretelling the destiny of the tree that was to be cut down.

Nevertheless we must take heed here lest, contrary to the nature of true religion, we attribute too much to angels. We must take heed that we not worship them; that we not call upon them, nor serve them. Indeed, when men hear that angels are given to them by God as ministers, and that God does good to us by them, they later think that some honour is to be ascribed and given to them. But sincere religion teaches us to acknowledge God as the author of all good things; that the angels are the ministers of God, and instruments as it were, by whom God works — just as we see the sun, the moon, and the stars, the patriarchs, the prophets, and the apostles, to be and to have been. But who in his right mind has worshipped, called upon, or served, the sun or the stars, even though they are very excellent creatures, and beneficial to men? And I ask you, what partaker of true faith and belief has worshipped, called upon, or served the patriarchs, the prophets, and the apostles, even though they were endued with most precious gifts, and wonderful in working miracles? We all worship, call upon, and serve God; and we confess that God — who works by his saints, together with the holy angels of God — requires nothing less than to be worshipped, called upon, and served by us. For Lactantius truly said:

"Angels, since they are immortal, neither allow nor yet are willing to be called gods: whose only office is to attend upon God with their service, to be at his beckoning, and to do nothing at all but at his commandment.

For we say that God so governs the world, as a king rules his kingdom — whose officers no man would say are fellows with him in ruling his kingdom, even though his affairs are dispatched by their ministry and service." ¹

And thus we read that St. Augustine also said: "When the angels of God hear, he himself hears in them, as in his true temple not made with hands." ² Truly, if we look more narrowly into and weigh the holy scripture, we will find in more than one or two places that the name of God and angels are set down without difference. For angels are more distant causes, yet they are instrumental, as they term them; but God is the nearest and most principal cause. For in the Acts of the Apostles we read that Stephen said, "And when forty years had expired, an angel appeared to him in the wilderness of mount Sinai." ^{Act 7:30} And then he adds, "And the voice of the Lord came to him saying, I am the God of your father," etc. ^{Act 7:32} He calls the self-same Lord, whom he had called an angel a little before: namely, because he believed that an angel both says and does all things at God's commandment; that the word and the work is proper to God, and the angels are like instruments. Likewise in the book of Judges, chapter 6, he is called Lord, who just now had been called an angel. ^{Jdg 6.11-13} Hagar, the hand-maid of Sarah, received a great benefit in the desert by the angel of the Lord; yet she does not account it as received from the angel, but from the Lord: she does not give thanks to the angel, nor does she consecrate the memory of it to the angel; much less does she worship and call upon the angel; no, she rather refers her speech to God. For so the holy scripture witnesses: "And she called the name of the Lord who spoke to her, you God look on me," etc. ^{Gen 16.13} The children of Israel, before whom the angel of the Lord went in the wilderness, never offered sacrifice to their guide or captain, never worshipped or served him.

So too, the servant of Abraham, being committed to the angel, does not make supplication to him, desiring him to prosper his purpose; but he prays to God, and asks him to reveal and test his mercy toward his master Abraham. ^{Gen 24.10-14} In Daniel, the angel of the Lord appears walking among Daniel's fellows who were cast into the burning oven; but when they were delivered from the violence of the flame, they do not praise the angel, nor do they account the benefit of their delivery as received from him, but from God only: for they sing, "Blessed are you, O Lord God of our fathers; right worthy to be praised and honoured in that name of yours forevermore."³ In like manner, Paul confesses in express words, that it is God to whom he belongs, and whom he worships; though meanwhile he had mentioned an angel. For so he says in the Acts: "There stood by me this night the angel of God, whose I am, and whom I serve," that is to say, God. For in another place, John wanted to worship at the angel's feet, but the angel cries, "See that you do not do it; for I am your fellow-servant, and of your brethren the prophets, and of those who keep the words of this book." ^{Rev 22.9} These plain and manifest testimonies of holy scripture evidently teach us that although God uses the ministry of angels toward us, yet they are to be acknowledged and confessed by us to be ministers of God and fellow-servants; and therefore they are not to be worshipped or called upon, but God only must be worshipped, called upon, and served.

From this holy doctrine of scripture, certain ministers and ecclesiastical writers of the ancient church have not swerved. For in that book which we cited a little earlier, Lactantius says: "Angels will have no honour given to them, whose honour is in God. But those who revolted and fell from the ministry of God, because they are enemies of the truth and offenders, they go about claiming for themselves the name of God and the worship of gods." ⁴

And now, St. Augustine, being of the same judgment in this matter, has left this written:

"Whom might I find" (he says, speaking to God) "to reconcile me to you? What, should I go to angels? With what prayer, with what vows? Many endeavouring to return to you, and not being able to do that by themselves, have assayed ¹ (as I hear) these ways, and have fallen into a desire and longing after curious visions, and are counted worthy to be deceived." ²

These things are extant in Lib. x. Confess, cap. 42. After this, he shows at large that Jesus Christ is the only Mediator and Intercessor for all the faithful. The same Augustine, in his tenth book de Civitate Dei, cap. 16, declares in many words, that the good angels of God do not require sacrifices for themselves but for God. ³ In the last chapter of his book de Vera Religione, he says:

"Let us believe that the best angels will that God be served with the best and most excellent ministry; that together with them, we should worship one God, in the contemplation and beholding of whom they are blessed. For we are not blessed by seeing the angels, but by seeing the truth — by which we also love the angels, and rejoice together with them. This is why we honour them — for love, and not out of duty. Nor do we build temples to them; for they are unwilling to be honoured by us in such a way: because they know that we ourselves, if we are good, are the temples of the most high God. It is well written, therefore, that an angel forbade a man to worship him, but wanted him to worship one God only, under whom he also was a fellow-servant with him." ⁴

The same Augustine, in his catalogue of heretics, therefore reckons worshippers of angels among heretics, naming them angelici, angel-worshippers. ⁵ For in his disputation against Maximinus, bishop of the Arians, Lib. i., proving the Holy Ghost to be God, he manifestly calls worshippers of angels "sacrilegious persons," cursed by Christ and his church. The words of the author, if anyone requires them, are these:

"If we were to make a temple of wood and stone to the holy angel, ⁶ that is most excellent, would we not be accursed by the truth of Christ and the church of God, because we do that service to a creature, which is due only to one God? If therefore, by building a temple to any kind of creature, we rob God of his honour, how is He not the true God to whom we do not build a temple, but we ourselves are his temple?" ⁷ Thus says Augustine.

Up to here I have briefly said these things about the holy or good angels of God. Now I pass on to discourse about evil spirits, I mean wicked and revolting angels — that is to say, of evil spirits, or devils. I will briefly and plainly say of this, what the holy scriptures minister to me.

The Sadducees in times past denied that there are devils; and today, some who are scarcely religious, no indeed, rather epicures, also deny this. ⁸ Unless they repent, they will one day feel to their exceeding great pain and smart, both that there are devils, and that they are tormentors and executioners of all wicked men and epicures. For the whole scripture, and all godly and wise men — as many as have lived from the beginning of the world even to this day — have confessed that there are evil spirits or devils.

Now, what devils are, is no less hard and doubtful to exactly define by reason, than I said it was difficult to fully describe the nature of angels. However, I will shadow them by one kind of description or another, to the end that I may treat them in a certain order. Evil angels are corrupt and wicked spirits; and for their revolting or falling away, they are everlastingly condemned. They are indeed to subject God, yet they are nevertheless adversaries to God and men, for they turn all their travails and studies toward the contempt and despising of God, and to the deceiving and destruction of men.

First, it is manifest that the devil is a creature, because there is but one creator only, namely, God in Trinity and Unity. He created all spirits; and the devil is also reckoned among spirits. We said before ¹ that the time of their creation is not set down in the scripture, when we showed that it was nowhere expressed at what time angels were created, whether before man or after man. To this we now add that evil angels became evil, not by creation, but by their own revolting and falling away. For all things which God created were and are exceeding good; all angels were therefore, in like manner as men, naturally created good. But they did not continue steadfast in this goodness granted, given, and grafted in them by God. Rather, they fell from heaven, being corrupt with their own malice, as men also are; and by the most just God, they were thrown out of heaven, and out of the felicity or happiness which was given to them. Now when or at what time this was done, again the scripture does not express. However, it seems to have been done before the fall of man; for the devil egged our parents to sin by the serpent, and he drew them into misery and death. Gen 3.1 Neither does the scripture particularly define what manner of sin the devil's was; nor does it expressly and particularly show how they were cast out of heaven. It says generally, that there was folly or wickedness found in the angels, and they were therefore thrown down headlong into hell. For we read in the book of Job: "Behold, He found no truth in his servants, ² and there was folly (or wickedness) in his angels." Job 4.18

St. Peter, not disagreeing with this, said, "God did not spare the angels which sinned, but cast them down into hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be kept until judgment." 2Pet 2.4 And Jude also, the brother of James, the apostle of the Lord (surnamed Thaddeus), recited the same sentence in a way: "The angels which did not keep their first estate (namely, the nature in which they were created), but left their own habitation (namely, their station, their office, and their faith) the Lord has reserved in everlasting chains unto darkness, ³ until the judgment of the great day." Look, our Lord and Saviour Christ, speaking of the devil, says this: "He was a murderer from the beginning, and did not abide in the truth." Joh 8.44 From this we may gather that the devil at some time abided or was in the truth; but he shrunk back and forsook it by faithlessly falling away.

Those testimonies, which witness that an angel sinned by revolting, and was thrown down headlong into hell, are sufficient for godly minds and those are not given to doubt. Furthermore, there are testimonies recited by others, from Isaiah ¹ and Ezekiel, ² which support the same thing. We do not reject these, and we do not doubt that by allegory, they may be applied to these of ours. What is alleged out of Luke, "I saw Satan as it had been lightning falling down from heaven," ^{Luk 10.8} is not so properly expounded about the first fall of angels. For there is another fall of the devil — namely, that by which he fell from his own tyranny (whereby he had possessed the minds of men, and ensnared them with wickedness and sin). This fall came through Christ's coming into the world, and through the sincere preaching of the gospel. Now there is no doubt that all angels were created good, and that the evil ones fell through their own fault and folly, and not through God's.

I also spoke of this somewhat in the tenth sermon of the third decade, where I treated the beginning of sin.³ To this I will now add the most notable and evident declaration of Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, taken out of the secrets of the scriptures, who says in his Epitome Divin. Decret.:

"Let us consider whether the devils justly suffer punishment, since they received it from Him who made them a nature like his. And how can he which is good be called the creator of wickedness? And how is he righteous and just, who punishes the nature, who can do nothing that is good, but is tied and bound with fetters of wickedness and vice? But we know that the God of all things, and the fountain of justice and righteousness, is righteous and just. Therefore he would not punish the devils unjustly. And we know that God was their guide and captain, and that the good angels are his workmanship, and that he is called good, by all who are right-minded. He therefore did not make that nature which could do nothing that is good, travelling and bringing forth only wickedness, and doing things contrary to His will and mind. If God therefore neither made the evil nature (for he is the maker and worker of all good things, as he himself is good), then not so much as once does he think to punish unjustly. For he is just and the lawgiver of justice or righteousness, and He will punish the devil and all those who serve and are under him. Therefore, the devil is evil of his own will and accord, and also those who take his part. For God made man good in the beginning, and with free will of mind, these doubtless (namely, good angels) kept their nature which they received pure and uncorrupt; but those (namely, men) declined and fell into the worse, and corrupted their heavenly shapes; and those who were like God made themselves brutish. So too, the devil and rout of devils, with other bodiless creatures, did not follow the good will of the good angels toward the Lord God; but being puffed up with the disease of haughtiness and pride, they took themselves to what was worse, and fell from their former state and condition." ⁴ This far from Theodoret.

St. Augustine agrees with Theodoret, in his book entitled de Vera Rel. cap. xiii. saying: "The devil is not evil inasmuch as he is an angel, but inasmuch as he is perverse and wicked of his will. For setting more by himself than by God, he would not be in subjection to Him, but, swelling through pride, he fell from his chief essence and excellent being." ⁵ And again, in his treatise upon Job 42: "Do you demand to know where the devil is from? From where the other angels are also from. But the other angels continued constantly in their obedience; and by disobedience and pride, he fell from being an angel and became a devil." ⁶

Now, what I affirmed touching those wicked spirits who for their revolting and falling away are adjudged to damnation, I see it denied by some. They promise condemned spirits will be redeemed from their punishments a little before the judgment-day. But very many doctors of the church have disputed against these, all and every one of them condemning with one voice an opinion which the scriptures long ago condemned.

For the judge at the end of the world, pronouncing definitive sentence against Satan and all the wicked, will say: "Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels." ^{Mat 25.41} And shortly, the apostle and holy evangelist, a witness of the truth, adds this: "And these shall go into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life everlasting." ^{Mat 25.46} For in Mark the Lord also said: "In hell their worm does not die, and the fire is not quenched." ^{Mar 9.46} And John says in more plain and pithy words: "Those who have done good will come forth to the resurrection of life, and those who have done evil to the resurrection of condemnation." ^{Joh 5.29} He does not say they will go either into life or into condemnation, but into the resurrection either of life or condemnation — that is, to remain everlastingly in life or death. For Daniel, from whom the Lord borrowed these words, has said: "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some to everlasting life, and some to shame and perpetual contempt." ^{Dan 12.2} For John the apostle says that the smoke of those that are condemned and thrown headlong into hell forevermore shall ascend up. ^{Rev 14.11} It is certain, therefore, that the condemnation of the wicked will be altogether without end and everlasting.

Furthermore, in calling the revolting angels spirits, we do not understand by "spirit" the wicked affection of the heart, or the quality or passion of the mind, or corruption and sin. For the world is not without some who think the devil is nothing more than a mischievous man, or a mischievous and sinful commotion or outrage of the mind. ¹ By spirits we therefore understand spiritual substances, endued with feeling and understanding. For in the first chapter of Job, Satan came and showed himself among the children (or servants) of God, speaking with the Lord. The gospel also reports to us, that devils, being cast out of a man, entered into the herd of swine, and drowned them in the depth of the sea or lake of Gadarene. ² Moreover, the gospel records that the devil sinned from the beginning, that he did not continue in the truth, that he is a liar and a murderer. ^{Joh 8.44} Jude mentions that the angel fought with the devil. ^{Jud 1.9} In Mark, the devils cry out and say: "What have we to do with you, you, Jesus of Nazareth? Have you come to destroy us?" ^{Mar 1.24}

Yet for all that, our Saviour, being already appointed and made judge, will say to the devils: "Go into the everlasting fire." All these testimonies agree to substances subsisting by themselves, and not to qualities. Devils are therefore spiritual substances. But what bodies they often take, and in which they appear to men, I think no man can perfectly tell. We told also told you this a little earlier, when we treated the bodies which good angels took. For truly, the history of Samuel being raised by a witch, manifestly proves that devils put on bodies and shapes differing from their own. ^{1Sam 28.8} It was not Samuel that was raised from the dead, but the chief-coiner of lies; counterfeiting Samuel, he deceived king Saul. ³ And Paul witnesses that Satan transforms himself into an angel of light. ^{2Cor 11.4} Histories also declare that the devil is a marvellous juggling ⁴ deceiver, in taking on diverse forms and shapes.

And as I said about good angels, that they are speedy in their ministry, without burden or hindrances; so there is no doubt that devils in their kind and work, are well-prepared. For the scriptures declare that they have a thousand shifts, wonderful craftiness and subtlety, and that their knowledge is surpassing quick and reaches very far; finally, that they are very ready and never weary to attempt and perform all things. They pass through the whole world with exceeding swiftness, they handle all their matters very craftily; and therefore marvellous names are allotted to them, shadowing out their force and power. For he is called "Satan the old serpent, a deceiver, the prince of this world, the prince of darkness, who has power over the air, a roaring lion." ¹ Of these and others not unlike it, I will speak more at large shortly, when I have first told you this: that there are an infinite throng of devils. For seven devils are cast out of Mary Magdalen. ^{Mar 16.9} That devil, of whom Matthew speaks, no sooner being cast out, mutes and consults how he may be wholly restored again, taking with him seven other spirits worse than himself. ^{Mat 12.45} Moreover, in Mark's gospel mention is made of a legion — for the unclean spirit, being asked by the Lord what his name was, answered, "My name is legion, because we are many." ^{Mar 5.9}

Therefore, when mention is made of Satan elsewhere in holy scripture, it is not to be taken as though there were but one substance or person of the devil; for they are comprehended as the members under the head, and as particularities under generalities. Elsewhere the scripture truly mentions the prince of the devils; for the enemies of Christ often cry out: "He casts out devils by the prince of devils." ^{Mat 9.34 DRA} Yet that saying does not express what manner of principality that is, and whether those evil spirits are distinguished orderly among themselves. And it is certain that all the ungodly are under one head, as all the godly are under one Christ the Lord. It is certain that all the devils are of the self-same corrupt will, bending all their force only to this end: to be adversaries of God and hurtful enemies of men. But I will speak of the operations, works, or effects of devils where I expound, by the way, their names or attributes.

Corrupt and wicked spirits generally are called devils, which is the same as saying slanderers or false accusers. For δίαβολη (diabole) with the Greeks signifies slander, etc.; and the word devil is fetched from the Grecians. ² For he sows slanders by accusing men to God, and in setting men at variance between themselves. Now, I say nothing about how he goes about bringing God and his works into suspicion among men. Therefore, he is elsewhere called a liar, and the author of lies, and the father of all hypocrites; and thus the spring of all errors, heresies, and wickednesses. And because Judas was a hypocrite, a liar, a false accuser, and traitor, the Lord rightly gave him the name of a devil. ^{Joh 6.70}

The apostle Peter called the devil an adversary. ^{1Pet 5.8} For the Lord himself also called him, "The envious man," ³ who sowed tares in the Lord's field. ^{Mat 13.25f} For he is the enemy of God and men, setting himself against the will of God, whose glory also he labours to take away, and hinders the salvation of men, and sows infinite offences in the Church of God. And truly the Hebrews call him Satan, whom we call an adversary. ^{Mat 4.10} That word is translated to men. For in Peter setting himself against the counsel and purpose of God, he hears this voice of the Lord: "Get behind me, Satan." ^{Mat 16.23} And David also said to his nephew ⁴ Abishai, the son of Zeruia: "What have I to do with you, you sons of Zeruia, that today you should be adversaries to me?" ^{2Sam 19.22} For Abishai challenged the counsel and decree of David.

The devil is called daemon, meaning knowing, crafty, and cunning in many things — ἀπο τοῦ δαίω (apo tou daioo), which signifies, I know. Plato in Cratyl, according to the opinion of Hesiodus, thinks that devils, whom we commonly call daemons, were named δαημονας (daemonas), to signify wise, prudent, and knowing.¹ The word serpent must be referred to this. "The serpent," says the scripture, "was subtler than all the beasts of the field." Therefore the devil chose the serpent to be his dwelling-place, by whom he might put his guileful devices into practice and deceive our first parents. For he is called the deceiver, the beguiler, and seducer of the world, the old serpent and dragon. For whatever seducing there is in the world, whatever wicked devices and deceitful practices, they flow from this one fountain: from all his mischief. In secular writers, this word is used in a far contrary signification. For in Plato, Socrates says: "I affirm that every man is daemon, that is to say, wise; and whoever is good, he is daemonicus, that is to say, wise and happy, both alive and dead."² Therefore it is used often and very much by Homer, to adorn noble personages with this name.³ But in the history of the gospel, daemonicus are those who are possessed with a devil. In his first Epistle to Timothy, Paul reduces and draws to this head, the whole body of deceits and doctrines that are coloured with a show of false wisdom. ^{1Tim 4.1}

St. Peter says: "Be sober and watch, for your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walks about, seeking whom he may devour; whom resist steadfastly in faith." ^{1Pet 5.8} By the lion, he shadows to us the nature or disposition of the devil; for the devil has exceeding great strength; he is full of greedy ravening and most cruel fierceness, for which he is also called by some a cruel beast. The Lord calls him a murderer: ^{Joh 8.44} for he inspired into Cain and all manslayers, horrible murders; and today too he sounds the alarm to all wars, to all broiling battles, to all slaughters and seditions.

To be short, he kindles wrath, he sows hatred, and nourishes envy. He is named "a tempter," for he is always egging men to mischief, sparing nothing whatever that he thinks can entice and draw us to things that are most wicked.

In the history of the gospel, and in the writings of the apostles, the devil has well-nigh ⁴ the name of an unclean spirit, of a mischievous or malignant, of a filthy and wicked spirit. For he did not fall from his pureness only through his own fault, in which he was first created by the most pure God; but even now also, he is delighted with impureness, and allures all men to uncleanness. From this master of mischief proceed all filthy lusts, all whoredoms, adulteries, all excess, drunkenness and surfeiting, all beastliness and vanity, pride and arrogance, etc.

Now the devil is also called Beelzebub in the gospel, because sometimes those of Ekron in Palestine, thinking they worshipped God, worshipped indeed the devil. St. Paul says: "What agreement has Christ with Belial?" ^{2Cor 6.15} He sets Belial against Christ, namely, the devil against God. But Moses put cogitation about Belial as a wicked and evil thought. ⁵ Therefore the devil is wicked and ungodly, rebellious and obstinate against God. For they say that Belial signifies the same as lawless, without yoke and without discipline. There are also some who think that in the Book of Job, the devil is figured or signified by Behemoth and Leviathan. Job chapters 40 and 41.

St. Paul gives the devils diverse names, saying, that the godly battles "against principalities and powers, against worldly governors of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in heavenly (places), against the governor that rules in the air, against the spirit that now works in the children of disobedience." ¹ In another place, he also calls him "the god of this world." ^{2Cor 4.4}

God exercises his power in the world and in the good, for the most part by good angels; and for that reason, I said, they are called principalities and powers. And the same God, of his just judgment, allows the devil to rule over the wicked; and for that reason, those devils are also rightly called principalities and powers. It is not that God delivers to the devil the bare and chief rule (for all power belongs to God only), but because He allows him to execute his tyranny. For He plainly says that the devil is the "prince of the world," namely, of the wicked. For by interpretation it follows, "He is the prince of the darkness of this world;" ^{Eph 6.12} and who does not know that in the scriptures, darkness signifies ignorance, blindness, unbelief, ungodliness, and wickedness — to be short, ungodly men who are drowned in these vices? And again, there is added that which declares the true meaning: "Which works in the children of disobedience." ^{Eph 2.2} Therefore, the faithful and obedient, who are in the kingdom of Christ and not in the kingdom of the devil, are exempted from this rule and government.

Nor is Satan called "god" on any other consideration; for there is added, "of this world." ^{2Cor 4.4} Indeed, the devil is not a god; but because certain madmen are found in the world, who take him for god, he has the name of God. The blessed father Augustine expounded this in no other way; for in his treatise on John 12 he says: "God forbid that we should think the devil is called the prince of the world, that we might believe he is able to rule over heaven and earth. But 'the world' (for he is called the prince of this world) is said to be in wicked men, who are dispersed throughout the whole compass of the earth." ² And again, the same Augustine says in his first chapter of de Agone Christiano:

"The prince of this world is cast out; ^{Joh 12.31} not that he is cast out of the world, but out of the minds of those who cling to the word of God, and do not love the world of which he is prince; because he has dominion over those who love temporal goods which are contained in this visible world. It is not that he is lord of this world, but prince of those concupiscences by which everything that is transitory is coveted. By this concupiscence, the devil reigns in man, and holds man's heart in possession." ³

The same doctor, in his treatise on John 12, asks the question, "Whether Satan was not cast out of the minds of the prophets and patriarchs, since it is reported in the gospel that he is cast out by Christ?" And Augustine answers:

"Truly, he is quite cast out. How is it therefore said that he shall now be cast out? How, we think, is because that which came to pass in very few men, is now foretold that it will shortly come to pass in many and mighty people. This is like that statement, 'But the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified.' May it not have a similar question and answer? For the abundance of spiritual grace was not yet given, which afterward was indeed given." ⁴

Furthermore, when the apostle says, that "we fight against spiritual wickednesses in heavenly places," ^{Eph 6.12} by "heavenly" he does not mean heavenly joys, placing the devils in heaven again; but the air, that is, the lower part of the world, yes, and the world itself. For he says elsewhere:

"According to the spirit that rules in the air." Eph 2.2 And truly, the princes of this world are in the air — above, beneath, and about us — assaulting us on every side.

Otherwise, neither heaven nor the lower region of the air is subject to the rule of devils, that they may do what they will in it, or abuse it as they wish; but only so far as God permits, of his just judgment. For in this disputation we must always hold for a confessed and undoubted truth: that our Lord God is king and governor of all creatures, and that he still keeps his dominion over all creatures, and exercises it in a most just and equal manner.

And although it might be gathered out of all these things, how great the devil's rule is and what manner of operation it is, I will add something more to this, lest anything seem to be lacking in this matter. In the description of the devil, I drew into two heads all of his effects, works, or operations. For devils are adversaries to God and enemies to men — whose whole endeavours and drifts, tend to the despising of God, and to the deceiving and destruction of men. The sum is therefore this: They bend all their force to the contempt of God and the destruction of men. And we have heard once or twice already, that their power to hurt is not small, and their understanding is also quick to bring all their purposes to effect. There is no reason why any man should doubt that they have a will to do hurt. For the Lord said to his disciples in the gospel: "Behold, Satan has earnestly desired to sift you like wheat." Luk 22.31 And again: Watch and pray, lest you enter into temptation." Mat 26.41 And St. Peter says: "Your adversary, as a roaring lion, ranges up and down, seeking whom he may devour." 1Pet 5.8 And the scripture everywhere testifies that he stands against God, and questions God with continual labour, and stirs up all creatures to hate and despise God. He wickedly instilled into the minds of our first parents, an opinion that was altogether unworthy of God, as though he maliciously envied their blessed state. For the devil said by the serpent: "Has God said you shall not eat of that tree?" Gen 3.1 And immediately: "You will not die the death. For God knows that the same day you eat of it, your eyes will be opened, and you will be as gods, knowing good and evil." Gen 3.4-5 When they gave credit to these deceitful words, they themselves perished, and drew with them the whole world into ruin and destruction. Nor today, truly, does the devil cease to slander and speak evil of God himself, as well as his works, with the intent that he might draw us together with him into hating God, into distrust and desperation, and to everlasting destruction; for he envies us our salvation to which we are ordained by Christ. But it is better to speak somewhat more distinctly about this thing.

Satan hurts men in their minds, in their bodies, and in their goods. For he entices and provokes our minds to sin. Furthermore, he also troubles the minds of men, and drives them into an outrage; and being out of quiet in their outrage, he miserably vexes, torments, and dispatches ¹ them. You may have read that some physicians call this madness or outrage, an evil spirit or a wicked devil. But he diversely plagues their bodies too, chiefly with diseases. We have the most holy man Job for an example. And in the gospel of St. Luke, it is said that the woman who was bowed together, was bound by Satan eighteen years. Luk 13.11 Again, in the gospel of St. Mark we read of a child which had a dumb spirit: "And whenever he takes him, he tears him, and he foams, and gnashes with his teeth, and pines away;" Mar 9.18 and throwing himself on the ground, he lies grovelling. This self-same evil spirit takes away from men their goods; he wastes and diminishes their substance and worldly wealth. This again is manifest in the history of Job and of the gospel: for Job is robbed of all his substance, Satan so ordering the matter by soldiers and robbers. The herd of swine also, being drowned and strangled in the sea, wrought great loss to the Gergesites; being violently carried away by the devils, they tumbled headlong into the sea. Furthermore, this mischievous miscreant accomplishes these things somewhat by himself and his fellow wicked angels, and somewhat by other creatures. He works outwardly and inwardly, by tempting and provoking men. For he casts before our eyes counterfeit and deceitful shapes. Changing himself into an angel of light, he winds himself into the minds of men. He speaks to us, setting before us happy promises and most grievous threatenings, and yet all of them are coloured with deceits and lies. For oftentimes he brings reasons that are indeed probable and apparent; and yes, places of scripture that are very agreeable at a blush, and yet maliciously twisted to his own purpose.

And by this means, the devil either hinders and maims true faith in the minds of men; or else he takes it away and utterly overthrows it, and later possesses them wholly, and then drives them into most certain perdition. So it is said that when he had entered into Judas' heart, he cast him wholly headlong into everlasting destruction. ¹ The heart of man is open to God only, for he only is the searcher of the heart and reins. But the devil, by circumventing men with his guileful practices, and by putting wicked persuasions into their hearts, is said to enter into men's hearts. And he works against man by other creatures also, such as by elements, when he raises fire, winds, waters, hail, and similar calamities against us. Furthermore, he stirs up men against us: our friends to vex and betray us, and our enemies to consume and bring us to our end with persecutions, battles, and bloodsheds. The history of Job yet again bears witness of these things. From this you may reckon the persecutions that are laid upon the worshippers of God. Now, the devil also eggs false prophets and enchanters against us. To this belong deceitful jugglings and all kinds of sorcery and witchcraft. The works of the sorcerers of Egypt, and of Simon the Magician, and the passage from Moses in Deu 13, testify these are most effectual. To this chiefly belong false miracles and corrupt answers or oracles. Truly, in times past the devil did much hurt to the church of God by these, as histories testify, nor does he cease to do hurt today. Experience itself teaches and verifies this.

For though it is certain that Satan is not cast out by the power of Satan; ^{Mat 12.26} yet one gives way to another for a time, to this end: that they may deceive men more easily, and obtain a kingdom. Christ and the apostle Paul foretold truly that the last times would be wonderfully bewitched with deceitful signs and powers. Most evident places touching this are found in Matthew 24 and 2Thess. chapter 2. More might be said at large, dearly beloved, concerning the operations or workings of the devil; but I trust that these things are sufficient, being gathered together in brevity, and they give occasion to muse about higher things.

But let no man so understand these things, as if the devil were able to do all things, and that whatever he wills, he can also do later. For his power is definite, or limited and restrained, so that he cannot do as much as he would: otherwise all things would have been overthrown and perished long ago. Therefore, not without consideration, I added in describing the devil, that he is subject to God; for he can do nothing without God's permission. Now God permits him either to exercise and try the patience of those who are God's, and to hasten their salvation. This is manifest in the history of Job 1.10-11; and in the words of Paul to the Corinthians, saying, "Lest I be exalted out of measure through the abundance of the revelations, a thorn in the flesh was given to me, the messenger of Satan to buffet me." ^{2Cor 12.7} Nor is it doubtful that he exalts many notable martyrs in the most grievous torments of persecutions; yes, today and in times past, he has exalted them to glory and everlasting rest. Or else he gives the devil leave to execute violence and cruelty upon men, and by that means to chastise their wickedness or to punish their unbelief. For truly the devils are the instruments of God's wrath, to execute his vengeance. For Paul says:

¹ Luk 22:3 Then Satan entered Judas, surnamed Iscariot, who was numbered among the twelve. Joh 13:2 And supper being ended, the devil having already put it into the heart of Judas Iscariot, Simon's son, to betray Him... Joh 17:12 ...none of them is lost except the son of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled.

"The coming of antichrist is according to the working of Satan, in all power, and signs, and wonders of lying, and in all unrighteous deception in those who perish; because they did not receive the love of truth, that they might be saved. And therefore, God will send them a strong delusion, that they should believe lies; that they might all be damned who did not believe the truth, but took pleasure in unrighteousness." ^{2The 2.9-12}

And this, in a way, is the strength and power of sorcery and enchanting, though this power is feeble in the faithful.

This is why there is no reason why any man should miserably fear the devil: "But rather sanctify the Lord of hosts (says Isaiah); let him be your fear and your reverence." ^{Isa 8.13} Some say that certain nations of the East worshipped the devil for this reason: that he would not hurt them.¹ But these are stark staring mad. For if it is not God's will, which I just began to tell you, or if he gives no leave, then Satan cannot touch so much as a hair of yours. For he could not enter into the herd of swine which were feeding near lake Gennesaret at Gadara,² and destroy them, except by the Lord's permission.

Also St. Augustine, expounding the Psalm 32, alleges in these words the history of Job:

"What could the devil do? Dare he take away one silly sheep from the holy man Job before he said to God, Lay your hand on me, that is to say, give me power? He was willing, but God did not allow him. Once God gave him leave, then he was able: therefore the devil was not able unless God gave him leave. Therefore, being well instructed, Job did not say, as we now are prone to say, The Lord gave, and the devil has taken away; but, The Lord gave, and the Lord has taken away." ³

And these things exceedingly comfort the godly in temptations, who understand that nothing can happen to them without God's permission, and that He permits nothing but that which makes for our amendment and salvation. And therefore we are always preserved by the providence and bountifulness of God. For whatever has been said up to here concerning the power and workings of the devils, it was not meant to discourage us or cast us down — but to make us more vigilant or watchful. The Lord, who overcame the devil and shows us the way to overcome him, commands us to watch. For he encountered Satan the first, second, and third time, to instruct us how we should fight against the enemy of mankind. He overcame him for us, that we should not despair of having the ability and power to easily overcome him, since he is already weakened and wounded. Doubtless, by faith we will overcome him: for by faith we are knit to Christ, and by faith we draw the Spirit of Christ — by the force and virtue of which we shall triumph. Truly, for that reason St. Peter wills us "to resist by faith." ^{1Pet 5.9}

St. Paul, exhorting us to this conflict, and furnishing us with excellent complete armour, says:

"Take on the whole armour of God, that you may be able to resist in the evil day, and having finished all things, to stand fast. Stand therefore, having your loins girded about with the truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and your feet shod that you may be prepared to the gospel of peace; above all things taking the shield of faith, with which you may quench all the fiery darts of that wicked one. And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit,

To this also belongs what the apostle witnesses here: "God does not allow us to be tempted beyond what we are able to bear, but with the temptation he will make a way to escape." ^{1Cor 10.13} Let us therefore reverence this God; let us beseech him, that through his power and might, we may overcome. Amen.

4-10. THE TENTH SERMON: OF MAN'S SOUL AND SALVATION.

OF THE REASONABLE SOUL OF MAN; AND OF HIS MOST CERTAIN SALVATION
AFTER THE DEATH OF HIS BODY.

ALL men confess that the reasonable soul of man has an affinity or likeness to spirits; nor is there any wise man, I think, who denies that the knowledge of the reasonable soul of man (about which the scripture teaches so many things, and does so diligently) is most wholesome and necessary to all the godly. The order therefore, the profit, and also the very necessity of things, ¹ requires that I likewise say something about the reasonable soul of man. In this, I will follow the plainness of the scripture and of its interpreters, leaving physical or natural points to be expounded by those to whom it belongs by duty and profession — except that we will deal with them so far as we cannot ignore them in this discourse. The holy scripture and its interpreters neither ask curious questions about the soul of man, nor satisfy curious heads when they desire to know those things which cannot be declared; or if they could, it would always seem to them that nothing was more aptly spoken to them.

For they always stagger; they are always learning and yet they doubt; they never come to the knowledge of the truth with a quiet mind; ^{2Tim 3.7} they never abide in the plain truth when it is found; they search after many other more subtle matters than they can understand. But we know that all things which are necessary for our salvation are simply and plainly delivered in the holy scriptures, and that we must simply, reverently, and religiously rest in them. Therefore, those things that are not delivered in the scriptures touching the matter of our salvation, we know are not to be sought after by us, and that they do not hinder our salvation if we are ignorant of them.

The word anima, which we call soul, is diversely taken in the holy scripture. First of all anima, the soul, is taken for every living thing; for the Lord says, "Let the earth bring forth living creature after its kind, cattle, worm, and beast of the earth after its kind." ^{Gen 1.24} For who does not know that there are three kinds or parts (allow me to speak this way for instruction's sake) or three principal powers of the soul? For there is the vegetative soul which works in plants; there is the sensitive soul, which is not without the vegetative soul — it gives life to brute beasts and other creatures that are endued with life and feeling; and there is also the reasonable soul with which men are endued, which is furnished with many powers or abilities, and comprehends both the others. Of this, anima, the soul, is taken in the scripture for breath which men draw in and let go out again, and also for the life of man, or of a living creature. Thus we read, Anima ejus etc., "His life is in him:" and, "I will do you no more harm (says Saul to David), because (anima mea) my life was precious in your eyes this day." ² The Grecians call anima, or the soul, pseuche, or ana pseuchen, because it refreshes by drawing breath.

The Hebricians call it Nephesh, of comforting. Again, anima, the soul, is taken in the scriptures for the thing itself that has life — for any, or rather, for the whole man. For it is said in the law: "The soul that works with a spirit, or that is a soothsayer, shall die." ^{Lev 20.6}

Likewise in Paul we read: "Let every soul be subject to the higher power." ^{Rom 13.1} And again, in Genesis, the king of Sodom says to Abraham: "Give me the souls, and take the substance or goods to yourself." ^{Gen 14.21} For the scripture usually names the whole by a part: for by the soul he means the whole man, repeating the nobler part; so also, by flesh he signifies the whole baser part. Moreover, since man and also other living creatures have an appetitive or desiring soul, soul is used in the scripture for affection, will, desire, or lust. For Ezekiel says, "They shall not satisfy their souls" (in Dutch, Sy werden iren glust nit bussen), "nor shall their bellies be filled." ^{Eze 7.19} Lastly, anima, the soul, signifies the reasonable soul of man, which we will treat at present (God assisting). Yet here I cannot dissemble, that there is controversy among very famous writers, about the soul and the mind, de anima, et animo, whether they are one and the self-same thing, or different — and there are reasons on both sides. Those who distinguish between them say that we live by the soul, and we understand with the mind, as Lactantius says in his 18th chapter, de Opificio Dei.¹ I know that all the best and most approved writers use them both indifferently, and take the one for the other.

For we must not think that there are two souls in man. For the school definitions ² have very well defined these words in the fifteenth chapter: "We do not say that there are two souls in one man, as Jacobus and certain of the Syrians write — one natural, by which the body has life and is mingled with blood; and the other spiritual, which ministers reason. Rather, we say there is one and the self-same soul in man, which both quickens the body with his fellowship, and orders himself by his own reason."³

Therefore we do not think that any consideration should be given to those who altogether deny that there is a soul; for these are as mad as those who deny that the sun shines. For all of us see and feel the sun, just as we also live by the benefit of the soul.

Furthermore, the wise heads of this world cannot yet define with one accord what the reasonable soul of man is. They so differ that a man will hardly find two who say the same thing; and the opinions of not a few, contradict each other. What, do the old interpreters of the scriptures not doubtingly proceed in defining the soul? Lactantius, in his book de Opificio Dei, denies that man can attain to the reason and nature of the soul.⁴ Therefore, those who thought that the soul could not be comprehended in any absolute definition in which his nature might be expressed thoroughly and in full, did not at all err from the truth; yet the nature or disposition of it might be shadowed out in a way, by its works or actions, and by such qualities as the scripture attributes to it.

There are some, therefore, who have said that the soul is the spirit of life, created after the image of God, and breathed into the body of man. There is one who describes it thus: The soul is a spirit, by which the body which is coupled to it lives, made apt for the knowledge of God through love, and hereby fit to be joined with Him to everlasting blessedness. Another defines it this way: A reasonable soul is an understanding spirit, one part of the substance of man; nor does it die when it departs the body, but is immortal. Cassiodore defines it thus: The soul of man is created by God to be a spiritual and unique substance, reasonable indeed and immortal, which quickens the body of the one who owns it.⁵ We will set down a description fetched from the scripture, to be weighed and considered by the godly, and to direct and rule our whole discourse. The soul is a spiritual substance, poured by God into man's body, that being joined to it, it might quicken and direct it; but being dissevered from the body, it would not die but live immortal forever.

Some deny that the soul is a substance; for they contend that it is nothing else than the power of life in man, and indeed a certain quality. But the holy scripture acknowledges that the soul is a subsisting substance. For the Lord witnesses in the gospel, that a soul may be tormented in hell. And by the self-same authority of the gospel, it is immediately shown that it may be viewed with our eyes, as in the soul of the rich glutton. ^{Luk 16.23} The same Lord, who cannot lie, said to the thief, "Today you will be with me in Paradise." ^{Luk 23.43} These words cannot be expounded about any other part in the thief, than his soul; for his body was nailed and hung on the cross. Also, the apostle and evangelist saw "under the altar, the souls of those who were slain for the word of God." He heard them "crying with a loud voice, and saying: How long will you tarry O Lord, who are holy and true, to judge, and to avenge our blood on those who dwell on the earth?" ^{Rev 6.9-10}

The same John saw long white garments given to every one of the souls, these words being spoken by the Lord: "Rest yet a little while, until the number your fellow-servants, and your brethren, who will be killed as you are, is fulfilled." ^{Rev 6.11} All of this truly does not agree to qualities, but to substances which have their being: therefore the souls of men are substances. That they might plainly and pithily express this, certain ecclesiastical writers, I think, have set down that the souls of men are bodily souls — that is, they are substances of their own kind, having their own proper being. Nor do I think, dearly beloved, I will be tedious if I recite word for word what St. Augustine reasoned about this matter (on both parts) in his epistle to St. Jerome, twenty-eighth in order:

"The soul is bodiless, though it is hard to persuade the duller sort of it; yet I confess that I am so persuaded. But that I may not create a controversy about a word to no purpose, I would willingly be silent; because where there is no doubt about the thing, there is no need to strive about the term we use for it. If every substance or essence is a body, or if that which is in some way, in itself, more aptly called some thing, then the soul is a body.

But if you would call that which is altogether unchangeable, and is wholly everywhere, only a "bodiless nature," then the soul is a body — because the soul is no such thing. Furthermore, if nothing is a body except that which, having some length, breadth, and height, is at rest, or may be moved in space, and the greater part of it takes up greater space, and the lesser part takes up less space, and the soul is less than the whole, then the soul is not a body. For that which gives the power of life to the body is extended through the whole body, not by the local spreading of itself, but by a certain living extension of itself. For the whole soul is present in all and every part of the body at once, and not the lesser in the lesser parts, nor the greater in the greater parts. But in some places, the soul is more vehement and lively, in some more remiss and faint; and yet it is the whole in all, and it is the whole in every part. For that which the whole soul feels in some parts of the body, and which it feels in some other parts, it feels wholly in itself, and not only in some part of itself. For where any part of the living flesh is pricked with a sharp thing, even though that place is not the whole body, not even most of the body, the whole soul feels that pricking. And yet the pain that is felt, is not dispersed over all the parts of the body, but is only felt where it is pricked.

How then does that which was not felt except in one place of the body, by and by happen to the whole soul, unless the whole soul is there where the pain is felt? And yet the soul does not leave the other parts of the body, so that it might be there wholly, and all in all. For those other parts of the body also live by the presence of the soul, where no such pricking is done. If the pain were in more places than one at the same time, then it would be felt by the whole soul in each place. Therefore, the whole soul could not be in all and also in every part of the body (which is its own body) all at once — not if it were so spread through those parts as we see bodies are spread in places, their smaller parts taking less space, and their larger parts taking greater space. Therefore, if the soul is to be termed a body, then surely it is not such a body in substance as the earth, or the water, or the air, or the celestial bodies. For all such bodies, if they are larger, are in larger places, and if smaller, in smaller places; and their entirety is not in any one part of theirs. Rather, each part of their bodies fills its own part of a place.

Thus the soul is perceived to have a certain proper nature, whether it is a body or whether it is called bodiless; it is created of a more excellent substance than all the elements of the earthly mould. This cannot be conceived of by any phantasy or imagination about bodily shapes, which we get by our fleshly senses. Rather, it is understood in the mind and felt in the life." ¹ This far I have repeated Augustine's words.

The scripture also aims chiefly at this mark: to teach that the soul is bodiless; for it advisedly and expressly calls the soul a spirit. For the Lord says in the gospel according to John: "I will put my life from me, and I will take it up again. No man takes it from me, but I put it away of myself." ^{Joh 10.18} And in the same evangelist you read: "And Jesus said, It is finished: and when he had bowed his head, he gave up the ghost." ^{Joh 19.30} For he cries out in another evangelist: "Father, into your hands I commend my spirit." ^{Luk 23.46} And Matthew says: "And Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost." ^{Mat 15.37} To this doubtless may be referred that which we read in the Acts of the Apostles about the first martyr, Stephen: "And they stoned Stephen, calling on and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." ^{Act 7.59}

I cannot more plainly and pithily express ² what manner of substance the soul of man is, than by these things. I believe it to be a spirit, having indeed a substance created by God proper, and unique to itself. For Augustine, whose words I alleged a little before, says yet again, 1 cap. de Quantitate Animae:

"I cannot name the substance of the soul, for I do not think it is one of the usual and known natures which we touch with the senses of our body. For I think that the soul does not consist of earth, nor of water, air, nor fire, nor yet of all these joined together, nor of any one of them. The nature of the soul may be called simple, because it does not consist of other natures." ³

Cassiodore was willing to recite and express these words of Augustine by imitation: "The soul of man created by God is a spiritual and unique substance." ⁴

Therefore, I simply affirm that the soul has a singular substance; indeed, it is a certain and more excellent one, differing from other spirits, having its true being and working always from its Creator;⁵ but we are not able to utter what we cannot compass in our speech.

Meanwhile, we do not agree with those who say that the soul is God, or else surely a part or portion of God, intending to express what manner of substance the soul is. ⁶ For the scripture reproves both of these. Truly the soul is a creature, and it is drowned in variableness and sins — but of itself, it is not a creator. And because God the Creator is immutable and indivisible, the soul cannot be a portion of God. Therefore, elegantly and truly, Aurelius Prudentius ⁷ in his Apotheosis, after he had confuted these filthy errors in many words, gathered at length all the meaning of the truth:

To say the soul is GOD, or part of him,
'Tis folly great, and too absurd a thing:

⁷ Aurelius Prudentius (348- c.413) Christian poet and hymnist.

Since chief and heavenly joys it tastes, which swim
 From always fresh and everlasting spring.
 Now it obeys, shortly it falls to sin;
 One while in joy, another while in pain:
 For due desert such guerdon it does win:
 Now punish'd 'tis, shortly 'tis free again.¹

To the end that we might overthrow this error, and discern the soul from other spirits and spiritual substances, we added in our description that "the soul of man is poured into the body of man by God:" by which every man understands without any ado, that the soul is created, and is also a spirit — not angelic but human; that is, breathed into man's body by God, of his own essence and nature.

Here again a new question touching the origin of souls offers itself to us to be expounded. For it is usually asked, Where do souls come from? When or how do they enter into their bodies?

St. Jerome is the author that said in time past, that there were many opinions touching the origin of souls, and most of those were contrary to themselves. For writing to Marcellinus and Anapsychias, he says:

"I remember your question — no, rather in truth, the question of the church — touching the state of the soul: whether it fell from heaven, as Pythagoras the philosopher, and all Platonists and Origen think; or whether it is of the proper substance of God, as the Stoics, Manicheaus, and the heresies of Priscillianus of Spain suppose; whether they are counted in God's treasury, long since laid up there, as certain church men think (who are foolishly persuaded); whether they are daily made by God and sent into bodies, according to what is written in the gospel, 'My Father works up to now, and I work'; whether they are ex traduce (that is, by the generation of the parents), as Tertullian, Apollinarius, and most of the western churches conjecture — that just as a body is born of a body, so a soul is born of a soul, and has its being as brute beasts have theirs." ²

But all those opinions are confuted by ecclesiastical writers with sound arguments. That opinion is received and avouched to be the truest, which holds that the soul is created out of nothing, and poured by God into the body when the child is made in the womb of his mother, perfect in shape and in every part of his body. For thus the ecclesiastical definitions declare: "We say that the Creator of all things alone knows the creation of the soul; and that the body only is sown by (carnal) copulation in marriage; that by the true appointment of God, it thickens in the womb, ³ becomes a substance and receives shape; and that when the body is fashioned, the soul is created and poured into it." ⁴

About which St. Jerome says — also to Pammachius, disputing against the errors of John, bishop of Jerusalem, after he had recited various opinions touching the origin of the soul:

"Whether truly God creates souls daily, in whom his will is his work, and never ceases to be a creator of them? This is an ecclesiastical opinion, according to the opinion of our Saviour, that the Father works up to now, and I work; and according to that saying of Isaiah, Who forms the spirit of man in him. And in the Psalms, Who fashions their hearts in every one of them." ¹

The scripture truly in express words teaches that the soul does not originate out of the earth, nor was it created before the body; but it proceeds out of the mouth of the Creator, namely, from the secret power of God, and it is poured into the body when it is fashioned. For Moses, describing the creation of God our Father,² first mentions that the body of Adam was fashioned and made, and that afterwards the spirit of life was breathed into his body being perfectly made and fashioned. "The Lord God," he says, "made man of the clay of the earth, and breathed upon his face or into his nostrils the breath of life, and man was made a living soul." ^{Gen 2:7} For the breath of life signifies the living and reasonable soul, that is to say, the soul of man, which is breathed or poured into the body when it is fashioned. And when the same Lord created the woman from Adam's rib, he did not take life from Adam, or out of his soul, and put it into Eve, but of his goodness and power, God poured it into her body when it was perfectly made.

And Job is a sufficient witness that we are not otherwise created by the Lord today, the soul being poured into the body when it is fashioned. He says: "Your hands, O God, have made me and fashioned me round about. Have you not poured me like milk, and turned me to curds like cheese? You covered me with skin and flesh, and joined me together with bones and sinews." ^{Job 10.8-11} Look, you have most excellently described here in these words, both the conception and also the fashioning of man's body in his mother's womb. And touching the soul, it immediately follows in Job: "You have given me life and grace, and your visitation has preserved my spirit." ^{Job 10.12} Behold, "life," that is, the soul, is poured into the body by God after it is shaped. "You have given me life," he says, "and grace." He adds grace or mercy, to life, for it is a marvel that the child should live in the mother's womb, seeing that it is wrapped within so many coverings. Therefore, a singular benefit of the mercy of God shows itself in this. But it follows by way of interpretation: "And your visitation," that is, your providence and preservation, "has kept or preserved my spirit." For what he first called "life," that is to say, the soul, he now calls "spirit." Therefore we rightly hold and according to the scriptures, that the souls of men are created by God, and poured into the bodies when they are already fashioned in the womb; though we do not touch every point and particular matter of this cause and (as the saying goes) hit the nail on the head.

Now it remains to see what the soul works in the body of man. We comprehended that briefly in the description, saying that being joined to the body, it gives life to man and directs him. For the reasonable soul comprehends the vegetative and sensitive powers, and thereby it gives life to the body. Moreover, the soul has two parts, distinguished in offices, not in substance — namely, Understanding and Will; and thereby it directs man. For by the understanding (which is called both the mind and reason), it conceives, judges, and knows things that are to be understood, and discerns what to follow and what to avoid. But by the will or appetite, man chooses what he knows, following one thing and refusing another. These things, again, stretch very far. Therefore, I will handle each part more largely.

Out of the 13th chapter of Augustine, de Quantitate Animae:

First of all "the soul by its presence gives life to this mortal and earthly body; it knits it together, and keeps it with a wonderful embracing, and does not allow it to grow out of order or pine away; it equally distributes the food throughout the members, giving sufficient to every one; it preserves a handsome form and measure in this, not only in beauty, but also in making and growth. But all these things may seem common to plants, as well as to man. For we see and confess that they also live; and that every one of them is preserved in its kind, nourished, increased, and engendered. Therefore, let us see what the soul is able to do, and what it works in the senses, where a more perfect view of life is perceived. The soul shows itself in the sense of feeling, and thereby it knows and discerns the things that are hot, cold, rough, smooth, hard, soft, light, and heavy. Moreover, the soul determines the innumerable differences between tastes, savours, sounds, and shapes, by the senses of tasting, smelling, hearing, and seeing. And among all the things that it chooses and covets, are those which are according to the nature of the body to which it is joined; and it refuses and shuns the contrary; and it also consents not only to the procreation of children, but to their cherishing, defending, nourishing, and preserving.

But again, no man denies that the life which is in beasts may also have all these things. Let us therefore consider what is the proper force of the soul of man. And here weigh with me the wonderful power of understanding and reasoning, and not a common memory, as exists in brute beasts, but a remembrance of innumerable things commended to us, and kept in mind by signs and deep consideration. Consider with me so many devices of craftsmen, tilling lands, building cities, manifold wonders of various buildings and devices; the inventions of so many forms in letters, words, gesture, sound, pictures, and feigned shows; so many tongues of nations, so many ordained things, so many new things, so many reformed things; such a number of books, and of similar monuments for the maintenance of memory, as having a care for those who will come after; the orders of offices, powers, honours and dignities, either in families, or in the commonweal, in peace or in war, either in secular or holy matters.

Weigh with me the marvellous force and virtue of devising the rivers of eloquence, the variety of verses in poetry, a thousand-fold devices and merriments to motivate pleasure and pastime, skilfulness in playing on instruments and in singing, skill in measuring, readiness in numbering, conjecturing about things in the past and things to come, by things that are present." ¹

These truly are great powers or operations in the soul of man, but they are common to both the good and the bad. Therefore, the true goodness and praise which rise from the powers of the soul unto man, and which are found only in the godly, follow. The soul is bold to prefer itself before the whole body, and to think the goods of the body are not his, but rather to despise them; and by however much he delights himself, by that much more he withdraws from filthiness, and wholly cleanses himself by faith and the Holy Ghost.

Being strengthened against all things which strive to put him away from his good intent, he gives great account of fellowship or society, loves men tenderly, and wishes nothing to another which he would not have happen to himself. For he follows the word or doctrine of God, and he believes that God speaks to him by this word. He is joined by the Holy Ghost and faith, with God himself, in whom he delights and lives in true felicity, bringing forth all kind of virtues. In so excellent a study of the soul as this, there is still great labour. For the soul fights fiercely with the world and the flesh, and it is never safe and at rest from the assaults or invasions of Satan: but being strengthened by the Lord, it goes away with notable victories and triumphs. Therefore, the souls (i.e., of saints and holy men) work all manner of holy works; for the souls of the wicked commit heinous sins of all sorts. There are many other operations of souls, which I cease to recite, lest I be longer than fitting.

¹ August, de Quant. Animae. cap. 33. Opp. Tom. i. fol. 130. coll. 1, 2. Par. 1532.

Up to here I have treated the soul of man as yet joined to the body. In this discourse, the wonderful goodness of God appears, the most bountiful Creator of the soul, indeed, Creator of the whole man. Whatever praise is given to the soul, we worthily account it received from his grace. Now I will speak of the soul separated from the body.

The soul, being separated from the body, does not cease to be what it was; but the body being dead, the soul abides alive in its own essence, altogether immortal, and void of all corruption. For the death of man is not the extinguishing or destruction of the soul, but only a separation or departure from the body. If you take a candle out of a lantern, you have taken the light from the lantern, but you have not put out the candle. Truly, because the candle is taken away, the lantern remains full of darkness; but the candle feels so little hurt by removing it, that being taken away from the lantern, it then shines more clearly, and casts forth the beams of its light more at large. So truly, being separated from its earthly or slimy body, the soul feels so little discommodity, that being delivered from the trouble and burden of the body, it lives more at liberty, and works more effectually. But the common sort do not understand this.

They see the body only among the dead, robbed of the soul; and because this lacks all feeling and moving, yes, and it rots away, they think that the whole man perishes. Nor is the world without some shameless and ungodly wretches who have in their mouth, that no man ever returned from death or from below, who by his return proved that the souls remain alive when the body is dead. But they lie maliciously, dissembling that they do not know what certainly they know. For who does not know that Christ the Son of God died, and was buried, and the third day was raised again from the dead, the very self-same soul returning into his body, and which gave his body life and ruled it before death? Who does not know that Christ ascended into heaven with his true body and with his reasonable and natural soul, and sits at the right hand of the Father, that laying down a most assured pledge as it were, he might testify to the whole world that both our own proper souls and our own proper bodies will one day be translated there? Who does not know that as many were dead, being raised from death to life, did not receive new souls, but their old souls? This would not have come to pass if the souls of men were extinguished by the death of the body.

They object that the scripture itself mentions the death of the soul. I no less confess that indeed. For the soul of man is both mortal and immortal, in a certain manner of its own. For the soul is not in all ways immortal as God is, of whom it is said ^{1Tim 1.17} that only he has immortality. And truly, the death of the soul in the holy scripture is to be remembered; but it refers to the state and condition, not to the substance, of the soul. For if God is the life of the soul, then surely the death of the soul is to be forsaken by God, and to be left to yourself. But nevertheless, the reasonable soul lives in its proper essence or being, so that, when it lives miserably, a miserable life is indeed called death. ^{1Joh 3.14} But desperation also is the very death of the soul; for we live by hope. And Paul says, "I live, yet not I, but Christ lives in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God." ^{Gal 2.20} Therefore they that are destitute of faith are dead, and they that have faith live. St. Augustine says, cap. 10, De Fide et Symbolo:

"The soul, just as it may be called corruptible because of sin and wickedness, so it may be called mortal. For the death of the soul is revolting or falling from God; this was the first sin of the soul, committed in paradise, as declared in the holy scriptures." ¹ And Augustine again says, Lib. de Trinitate, 14, cap. 4: "The soul also has its death when it lacks a blessed life, which should be called the true life of the soul. But it is called immortal for this reason: for whatever life it lives — yes, even though it is most miserable — it never ceases to live." ¹ We therefore freely confess that the souls of men, separated or taken out of their bodies, do not die, but live immortal forever — the faithful in everlasting joy and felicity, but the unbelievers in eternal damnation.

I will now go on to confirm this by some substantial testimonies of scripture. But first, take this with you: that testimonies of scripture in this case are far more lively than man's reasons framed out of philosophy. For these testimonies are fetched from the very mouth of the living God himself, who preserves us in life; who (since he is true) cannot lie, and who (since he gives life and is life itself) is most certainly able to testify of life, above all others. Nor is it doubtful that the Spirit of God works jointly with the word of God; once the hearts of men are touched by Him, the reasons of philosophy, however manifest they may be, will not at all prevail, especially in danger of death and other temptations. Therefore, those who are not ashamed to say that they cannot be persuaded or brought to believe the immortality of souls, by the scriptures alone, are fleshly and altogether brutish. Indeed! And what is more, they will never be steadfast and stable in temptations, which proceed from flesh and blood. We will therefore add some certain testimonies, and those too are most manifest.

David, the most powerful and happiest king in the world, comprising in one verse both the immortality of souls and the resurrection of bodies, says this: "You, O Lord, shall not leave my soul in hell: nor shall you allow your Holy one to see corruption." ^{Psa 16.10} Man consists of body and soul. The body rots away when it is dead, and is turned into dust; but it will not therefore perish. For as the body of Christ which was buried did not rot, but rose again the third day, so our bodies shall be raised up in the day of judgment, and be delivered by Christ from corruption. And our soul does not go into hell to remain there. ² But as the soul of Christ returned from the nether parts to his body, and ascended into heaven in his body which he had taken up again; ^{Eph 4.9-10} even so, our souls shall also live by Christ — they shall not die.

Solomon, the son of David, excelling all kings and mortal men in wisdom, likewise expounds in one verse upon the providence of God touching the soul and the body. He says: "The dust shall be turned again to earth, from whence it came; and the spirit shall return to God, who gave it." ^{Ecc 12.7} Solomon calls man's body dust, because it is said in Moses that God made it of the dust of the earth. Therefore, the body returns again to dust; for it putrefies and is resolved into what it first was, even until the judgment-day. As the Lord says: "For dust you are, and into dust you shall be returned again." ^{Gen 3.19} But the spirit, that is to say, the reasonable soul, does not die with the body. It is not resolved into dust, because it is not taken out of the dust; nor is it scattered into the air, because it does not consist of air; but it returns alive from death, to God. And therefore it returns to God, because God gave the soul, and in a singular way, made man in His own likeness and image, breathing into his face the spirit of life — of life I say; that is, of living power, not the spirit of death. Therefore, the soul cannot perish, because it receives immortality from God who, since he is life, is able to preserve that breath of life which he has made.

The Lord Jesus, the true and very Son of God, the life and resurrection of the faithful, says plainly in the gospel: "Do not fear those who kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; rather, fear Him who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell." ^{Mat 10.28}

If the soul is not killed when the body is slain by tyrants, then it remains alive after the body is destroyed. And so it assuredly remains, so that, having put off the body, it would be cast into hell by the most just God, to burn there everlastingly for its unfaithfulness. For in the same gospel, the

Lord says again, "Whoever would save his life shall lose it." Again, "whoever would lose his life for my sake, shall find it." ^{Mat 16.25} For not only is it the one who bridles himself from the pleasures of the world, and lives most temperately, that loses his life or soul; but also the one who offers himself into the bloody hands of tyrants to be slain for the confession of his Christian faith. But then he finds his life or soul which he lost. Therefore, the souls of men, even after the death of the body, remain alive and immortal.

In the gospel of St. John, the Lord says, "Truly, truly, I say to you, He that hears my word, and believes on him that sent me, has everlasting life, and shall not come into judgment; but has escaped from death unto life." ^{Joh 5.24} You have in these words of the Lord, the death of the body. But immediately afterward he witnesses that we "escape unto life." Therefore, men's souls remain alive after death. For he says nothing of the raising again or of the salvation of the body, but of the life of the soul after death. In the same gospel, the Lord says again: "Truly, truly, I say to you, If a man keeps my word, he shall never see death." ^{Joh 8.51} But it is evident that all men are ordained once to die, ^{Heb 9.27} namely, with bodily death. Therefore, the soul lives after the death of the body. For it must be that a faithful man will never see or feel death, unless he told a lie, affirming what he said with an oath. For in every other place, he adds an oath, saying, "Truly, I say to you," so that we should not doubt the immortality of souls. There are very many testimonies, and those of Christ the Son of God in the same gospel, are most evident — as in the sixth and eleventh chapters. ¹ To these we will join one or two out of the writings of the blessed apostles of Christ.

St. Peter, speaking of the souls of the fathers which were dead a great while ago, says that "the gospel was preached also to the dead, that they should be judged like other men in the flesh, but should live before God in the spirit." ^{1Pet 4.6} Spirits are souls of the blessed fathers whose bodies, buried a great while ago, wait for the universal sentence of that general and last judgment — that is, their flesh may be raised up again and judged with other men in the last day; but meanwhile, their souls live with God. Thus men's souls are alive, even though their bodies were rotten a great while ago.

In his epistle to Timothy, St. Paul says that life and immortality are made manifest and brought by Christ. ^{2Tim 1.1, 10} Everywhere, Paul so plainly avouches the immortality of souls, that one must be blind not to see it.

St. John, the apostle and evangelist, saw under the altar in heaven (that is, under the protection of Christ who is the sacrifice and propitiation for the sins of the world) living souls lying there and crying: "How long will you wait, Lord, to revenge our blood?" ^{Rev 6.9-10} He saw them clothed with white garments, and enjoying everlasting rest. But these souls were the souls of the martyrs of Christ, whose bodies died, having been murdered on the earth under tyrants and persecutors of the Christian faith. Therefore, the souls of men are immortal.

Therefore, — yes, and undoubted — those words are most true which are written in the book of Wisdom, uttered in this way:

"The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and no torment shall touch them there. In the sight of the unwise they appeared to die, and their end is taken as a misery, and their departing from us considered utter destruction; but they are at rest. For though they suffer pain before men, yet their hope of immortality is full. They are punished but in few things; nevertheless, they shall be well-rewarded in many things. For God approves them, and finds them fit for himself. He tries them as gold in the furnace, and receives them as a burnt-offering; and when the time comes, they will be looked at. They will shine and run through, like sparkles among the stubble. They will judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and their Lord shall reign forever." ^{Wis 3.1-8}

Thus most truly, according to the canonical scripture, the ecclesiastical definitions pronounce this, cap. 16:

"We believe that man alone has a substantial soul which, having put off the body, lives and keeps his senses and disposition living. It does not die with the body, as Aratus affirms; nor die a short while later, as Zenon says, because it lives substantially. But the souls of beasts and other mortal creatures are not substantial, but are born with their flesh through the life of their flesh, and with the death of their flesh, they are at an end and die." ¹

Furthermore, that truth touching the immortality of souls, by the law of nature as it were, is written and imprinted in the minds of all men. Thus it is no marvel that all the wise men among the Gentiles could never abide that the soul should be called mortal. For the consent of all (especially the chief ones), which is thought to be the voice of nature, declares that souls are immortal. And M. Tully ² also affirms it, saying: "As by nature we think there are Gods, and by reason we know what they are, so we hold the opinion with the consent of all nations, that souls still continue." ³ All the ancient writers, therefore, and all that followed them, have said that souls are everlasting or immortal — such as Trismegistus, Museus, Orpheus, Homerus, Pindarus, and Pherecydes the Syrian, the master of Pythagoras, ⁴ and his scholar Socrates. Plato himself, who sailed into Italy to learn the opinions of Pythagoras, ⁵ was not only of the same opinion as Pythagoras, touching the immortality of souls, but also brought reasons to confirm it. These reasons, as Tully witnesses, are so many that, someone who reads his book could seemingly not desire anything further. ⁶ Seneca so plainly affirms and proves the immortality of souls, that nothing can be more plain. ⁷

And Epictetus, a famous philosopher, who lived in the time of Seneca, has done no less. ⁸ If there are still any light-headed men to whom the immortality of the soul seems doubtful, or who utterly deny it, these truly are unworthy to be called men; for they are plagues of the commonwealth, and very beasts, worthy to be hissed and driven out of the company of men. For he lacks a bridle to restrain himself, and has cast away all honesty and shame. Whoever believes the soul of man is mortal, is in all points prepared to commit any mischief.

I showed that souls being separated by death from their bodies, do not die, but remain alive. It now remains that I teach you where souls lead their life and are resident, when they are destitute of their dwelling-place, their bodies.

While they were coupled to their bodies, they used them as their dwelling-houses; so that, although they are said not to be limited in place, yet they do not wander outside of their bodies, but are shut up in in them as in prisons, until they are dissolved and set at liberty. Therefore, being dissevered from their bodies, those same souls retain their sound senses, their nature or disposition, and their whole substance in a living manner. Even though they are said, even then, not to be limited in place, yet are they not let loose and run astray, having their abiding in no place. Rather, being compact and set fast in their own essence or being, they are in some place again, yet not having new bodies (for the souls are free of them till the judgment-day, when they will be joined again to their bodies). Even so, certain abiding-places are prepared for them by God, in which they may live. Although others ¹ very subtly and wittily reason how spirits are contained or not contained in place, I simply affirm with the scripture, that souls separated from bodies are taken up either into heaven itself, or else they are drowned in the depths of hell; and their being and abiding there is such that, when they are there, they are not elsewhere. For the Lord most plainly and pithily says in the gospel, that the soul of beggarly Lazarus was carried into Abraham's bosom, and the soul of the rich glutton was cast down into hell. ^{Luk 16.23}

But what is more, it immediately follows in the history: "Between us and you" (for the blessed and cursed souls talk together) "there is a great gulf steadfastly set; so that those who would go from here to you cannot, neither can those who would come from there to us." ^{Luk 16.26} And Paul also desires "to be dissolved, ² and to be with Christ." ^{Phi 1.23} We are dissolved by death. For when the soul departs, the body is dissolved and dies; the soul flies to Christ. But the scripture shows us that Christ is in heaven at the right hand of the Father. Now where heaven is, none can tell; and we have largely treated that matter elsewhere.³

In the gospel of St. John, the Lord himself calls the conversation of souls, ⁴ which is prepared for them they are separated from the bodies, both a place and mansion, a habitation or dwelling, adding these words about it: "I will receive you (even) to myself, that where I am, there you may be also." ^{Joh 14.3} And thus St. John saw souls in heaven, abiding and taking their rest under the altar or protection of Christ. ^{Rev 6.9-10} For he had gathered them to himself there, when they departed from their bodies. To this belongs that notable place of the apostle Paul, marvellously fit for this purpose, written in second Corinthians in these words: "We know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were destroyed, we have a building of God, even a habitation not made with hands, but eternal in heaven," etc. ^{2Cor 5.1} Look, while our souls were joined to our bodies, they inhabited and dwelt in them as in their houses. But after our corruptible house is destroyed, God has built another better and longer-lasting one, I mean heaven itself, into which he lovingly receives our souls departing out of our bodies. For that type of body which we now have, he calls the house of this tent or tabernacle. For just as tents are made of temporary light stuff, and pitched without any strong foundation, and pulled down after a while, or fall of their own accord — so too, a mortal body is given to men as a ruinous cottage, which they inhabit a few days, and immediately pack away again. St. Peter used a similar allegory. ⁵ Against this tent, Paul opposes a building of everlasting continuance — I mean heaven itself.

For when he said we have "a building of God," he adds by interpretation, (even) a "habitation not made with hands;" and yet more plainly, "eternal in heaven." Nor does what later follows hinder this, or import another meaning: "for therefore we sigh, desiring (speaking of our clothing) to be further clothed with our house which is from heaven." For "from heaven" signifies the same as saying "heavenly." Therefore, the house of the soul is heavenly or heaven itself, a place, I say, appointed for blessed spirits. For truly, the faithful soul shall dwell in heaven even to that day, judgment, in which the Lord shall judge the world with His general judgment. Then at the length the soul will return to the body raised up again, so that after judgment the whole man, both soul and body, may live forever with God. For thus witnesses the apostle St. Paul: "The Lord himself will descend from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of the archangel, and with the trumpet of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we who live, who remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so we will ever be with the Lord," ^{1The 4.15-17} namely, in the heavens which are above us, where the clouds are seen. Therefore, omitting vain speculations and curious disputations, let us believe that there is a house prepared by the Lord in heaven for souls being separated from their bodies, into which the faithful may be received; and again, that there is everlasting fire prepared, into which all the souls of all infidels or unbelievers may be cast.

We have taught that heaven is the seat or habitation prepared by God to receive souls being separated from their bodies. It remains to show in what manner, and at what time, they should be translated there after death. Touching the manner of it, I can say nothing but that it is fully known to God; and what is shadowed in the scriptures, seems sufficient for us: namely, it is brought to pass by angels carrying up our souls with a most swift flight or moving. For the Lord says in the gospel, that the soul of Lazarus was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom: we spoke of this before when we preached about God's angels.¹

But I do not intend to search out what manner of moving this is, whether it is natural or supernatural. I believe that what God promises, he performs and accomplishes; and promising he says, "He has passed from death to life." ^{Joh 5.24} Again, he said to the thief, "Today you shall be with me in paradise," ^{Luk 23.43} comprehending that his passage was as in a moment. We also necessarily add to this, that it must be attributed to the merits of Christ that we are taken up into heaven; for he is the door and the way.

But at what time souls should be carried up into heaven, or cast down into hell, seems to be a question at present that is not only profitable, but by all means necessary to be discussed; for in our age there are persons disposed to evil, who have corrupted the pure simplicity of this matter. For you will find some who say that the souls departing from their bodies do not afterward go the right and ready way to heaven; rather, as if taken with a slumbering lethargy, they sleep until the last day of judgment.² You will find others contending that souls cannot come into heaven unless they are perfectly purified with cleansing fire, which they call purgatory; as though they were intercepted by pirates and robbers in the midst of their journey, and cast into torments, until either they themselves make satisfaction, or others have paid for them the debt which they borrowed elsewhere.³ But both of these things I deny, and utterly deny: and I affirm that souls do not sleep, nor are they purged by any torments after the death of their body; but are waking and alive, and are immediately after the death of the body, and even in a moment, either carried into heaven, being freed from all kinds of torments, or else cast down into hell.

These sleepy-heads ⁴ have nothing to allege for their lethargy or imagination about the sleep of the soul; but the scripture, describing the death of the saints, often mentions sleeping and laying to sleep; such as, "he fell asleep, and was gathered to (or laid by) his fathers."

And Paul says, speaking of those who die, "I would not have you ignorant concerning those who are asleep." ^{1The 4.13} But even as souls never slept, nor could sleep, when they were joined to these frail bodies, being delivered from the burden of the body, they are much less to be thought to sleep. Sleep is therefore to be referred to the body. For whoever dies in true faith, sleeps in the Lord. And just as those who sleep, once their limbs are refreshed, immediately awake, rise, and labour; even so, the body is not altogether extinguished by death, that it should not live anymore, but now truly it is received into rest, and at the day of judgment it rises again and lives. And for this reason, holy men are said in the scriptures to sleep, not to die, so that thereby the mystery of the resurrection of our flesh may be signified. These gross-headed men do not understand this. And thus they attribute to the soul what is proper to the body. Other arguments which they bring to confirm their madness, are unworthy to be repeated. For either they violently twist the scripture from the natural sense of it; or else by their corrupt reasoning, they gather falsehood out of those things that are false.

But they err and are no less deceived than these sleeping doctors, who think that souls departing from their bodies do not later go the right and ready way into heaven. Instead, they say, souls are caught in the midst of their journey, and carried into that purgatory fire, in which they may be purged from the filthy spots of sins which they got in the flesh; and after they are purged, they are carried by angels into the presence of the most holy God. Look, either the souls are purged by that purgatory fire from the filth of their sins, or else they are washed and cleansed through the pain and grief of torments which they suffer there. If sins are purged by virtue of that fire, then it follows that sinners are not sanctified by the only blood of the Son of God. But by what scriptures have they proved to us that this power of purging is given to the fire? Has God altered his mind and purpose, and put this fire in place of Christ to work our sanctification? For shame! But if sins are forgiven for our sufferings and for torments' sake, then it follows that we are not purged by the cross and passion of Christ alone. Let them teach us out of the scripture, that such worthiness is attributed by God to our sufferings.

But rather, by the only blood and passion of Christ, all those are sanctified who are sanctified, whoever they may be. Therefore, purgatory is a wicked device of the devil, which darkens, yes, and makes void, the cross and merits of Christ. For what other thing do they account purgatory but a satisfaction for sins made by the souls that are separated from their bodies? In the gospel of John, there is a question asked by the disciples of John the Baptist, touching the purifying of souls; and John the Baptist declares that the faithful are purified through Christ by faith; this thing he is also believed to have testified by the holy baptism. Moreover, the most excellent apostles expressly witness that all the faithful are cleansed by the only blood of Christ, and by his only passion and most sufficient merits. For Peter, who says in the Acts, "Nor is there salvation in any other: for among men there is given no other name under heaven by which we must be saved." ^{Act 4.12} He has written in his first canonical epistle: "You know that you were not redeemed with corruptible things, as with silver and gold, but with the precious blood of the immaculate Lamb." ^{1Pet 1.18} John the apostle also says: "The blood of Christ Jesus, the Son of God, cleanses us from all sin." ^{1Joh 1.7} And again he says: "Christ loved us, and washed us from our sins by his own blood." ^{Rev 1.5} And Paul, both to the Ephesians (5.26), and to Titus (2.14), shows that we are purified by the only blood of the Son of God. To the Hebrews he says: "By himself has he purged our sins, and sits on the right hand of God in the highest places." ^{Heb 1.3} It was not without meaning that he said, "By himself," that he might thereby exclude all other means. For elsewhere he says this: "If righteousness comes by the law, then Christ died in vain." ^{Gal 2.21} And we also reason in the same way: If we are cleansed by purgatory fire, then in vain Christ shed his blood to purge us; for what need did he have to suffer most grievous punishment, if we could have been cleansed by purgatory fire? Moreover, the whole scripture teaches us that Christ is our only satisfaction and propitiation.

We have shown this at large in other places. ¹ And therefore, souls make no satisfaction in purgatory, unless we would confess that men have no need of Christ.

These men further pretend that the power to purge is given to the fire of purgatory by grace, or by the blood and merits of Christ, and that this fire does not purge by its own virtue, but by the power of the Son of God.² But they have also forged this most wickedly. For the scripture in every place (as we just now said) sends us back to the Son of God and the price of his blood and cleansing, by which it teaches that we are made partakers, while we live in this world, by faith and the Holy Ghost. But it does not say a word about purgatory in any place; nor does it say in any place that we are purged in another world by the grace of God. Therefore, they steal the glory which is proper to the Son of God, and give it to a fire, which is altogether forged and blasphemous. Furthermore, they appoint another time of grace outside of this world, which is altogether foreign to the scriptures. For our Lord cries in the gospel: "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day; the night comes, when no man can work." ^{Joh 9.4} And St. Paul says: "Let us do good," that is to say, let us be bountiful and liberal towards the poor, "while we have time." ^{Gal 6.10} He seems to have taken this saying out of Solomon's book about the Preacher, saying: "When the clouds are full, they pour rain upon the earth: and when the tree falls, whether it is toward the south or north, in whatever place it falls, there it remains." ^{Ecc 11 3} He uses two allegories or dark statements, by which he teaches the rich to be liberal. The first is taken from clouds. The clouds gather vapours from the earth, which being thickened, are immediately poured upon the earth to water it, as if squeezed out of a sponge. Let rich men do the same, distributing again among men those riches which they have gotten among men. The second is taken from trees, which being felled, lie in the same places in which they fall. The wise man therefore warns us to do what we ought to do, in due season. For one we have departed from here, there is no place of repentance. And in the gospel, a tree often put for a man; also, the right hand is put for heaven or the place of blessedness, just as the left hand is put for hell or the place of damnation. Therefore, this is his meaning: When you are dead, you will forever remain either in damnation or blessedness.

Men's testimonies agree with the heavenly ones. For St. Cyprian says against Demetrianus:

"When we have departed from here, there is then no place of repentance; satisfaction is of no value. Here life is either lost or gotten. Here provision is made for eternal salvation, by serving God and by the fruit of faith." ³

They object again, that when souls depart from the body, they are indeed purged by the blood of the Son of God, but not fully; for some filth remains to be washed away in purgatory. ⁴ For they depart out of this world not having a full and perfect faith; and therefore, they are not altogether good. And again, since they have some faith, they are not altogether evil. And yet, because they are not perfectly good, they cannot enter into heaven. Again, since they are not altogether evil, they cannot be damned. And therefore a middle place remains in which they may be fully tried. ⁵ And at length, being purified, they may be presented into the sight of God. In their manner, these men pretend what they wish. But we have shown by the holy scriptures, that the souls of the faithful are purged by the only blood of the Son of God through faith, and not by purgatory.

⁵ excoquantur, Lat. – to boil or temper by heat.

Now I will also show in what follows, that the sins of all men are fully purified, that is to say, most absolutely, by the only sacrifice of Christ. And further, that by the grace of God in the blood of Christ, whatever infirmity and remnants of sin are left behind in the souls of the faithful departing from the body — these are forgiven at the very instant of death. For the Lord says in the gospel, "He that is washed, does not need to wash anything but his feet, but he is completely clean." ^{Joh 13.10} Behold he says, "He is completely clean;" that is, he is washed by the grace of Christ, so that the foulness of the feet, that is to say, the infirmity and imperfection which remains after regeneration, cannot bring him again into the number of those who are unclean. For the Lord says again in the gospel, "And for their sakes I sanctify myself, that they also might be sanctified through the truth." ^{Joh 17.19} The Lord gave himself up to be a sacrifice for our sins, to the end that we might be sanctified — that is, truly purged from our sins, fully and most perfectly.

For Paul says, "For with one offering he has made perfect forever those who are sanctified." ^{Heb 10.14} I ask you to mark the apostle's words: "Christ with one oblation" (look, he says, with one) "has perfectly sanctified all who are sanctified," and are made heirs of eternal life. From this we gather that, if souls are purified by the one sacrifice of Christ, once offered for us all, and are indeed perfectly purified, so that there is nothing lacking as to their purifying — then what, I ask you, does purgatory find to purify? Therefore, it is a shameless forgery and horrible blasphemy against the merit of the purifying of Jesus Christ the Son of God. If anything seems diminished or lacking for the soul now departing, Christ by his grace performs and makes it up while that soul is yet in the world. It is a wicked saying and unworthy to be heard among Christian people, that by our sufferings in purgatory, something is fulfilled which was not as yet fully satisfied ¹ with the blood and passion of Christ — as if our sufferings were better and more effectual than the passion of the Son of God.

These men object to us the weakness of faith in those who die. And on the other side, we object to them the mercy of God, fully pardoning His faithful people. The father of the lunatic mentioned in the gospel, requiring help from the Lord, hears this: "If you can believe" (namely, that I am able to heal your son), "all things are possible to him that believes." And even though he felt his faith was not altogether perfect, but there remained much weakness in it, yet the help of God was not hindered by its weakness, because he humbly submitted himself to the mercy of the Lord, beseeching and saying, "Lord, I believe, help my unbelief;" the Lord then consoled him, and without delay healed his son. ^{Mar 9.20-27} So there is no doubt possible, that the most merciful Lord will somehow fail his faithful people to whom he promised most full forgiveness, who acknowledge their weakness in the hour of death, and therefore call for the mercy of God. Rather, at the instant the soul departs, God immediately and perfectly sanctifies it with his Spirit for Christ's sake, and beautifies it with all kinds of graces — so that being truly purged from all the filth of sins, it may flee upward, and deserve to appear in the presence of God. And this should be beaten into the heads of those who are dying. For there remain most large promises of God; and there are examples to be found of many holy men dying and calling upon God.

Furthermore, it is certain by those things which we have already alleged, that the death of Christ has made full satisfaction for sins; so that now there remains nothing further to be cleansed with the fire of purgatory. Souls, after the death of the body, flee the right and ready way into heaven, taking nothing away with them which needs purging. Therefore, that fire of purgatory is indeed nothing else than a traffic or merchandise of most covetous men, by which they craftily and cunningly purge the purses, not the souls, of both rich and poor.¹

These men later undergird their purgatory building, which is a falling down, with two posts. The first is this: Those of old (they say) prayed for the salvation of souls separated from the body; therefore, there is a purgatory. For since they have no need of prayers in heaven; and prayers do no good in hell, since there is no redemption in hell, truly there is a middle place left in which souls are kept, for whom the prayers of the living do good; and that place is purgatory.² Thus they reason, imagining all these things from their own heads, without the authority of the scriptures. But this is what they have to say: that those of old prayed for the dead. I know what Augustine wrote, that famous doctor of the church; and what Chrysostom wrote, that golden-mouthed man; and what other ancient and notable men have left written touching this matter. But I ask the question, Whether what they did was well done? For not all things which the holy fathers said and did are absolutely to be allowed or followed (for they often allowed some things of man's invention). Those things which are set down by them, against the decrees of the scripture, are not to be allowed and followed (they themselves unfeignedly confess this³). But only those things are to be followed which are uttered and confirmed by the authority of holy scriptures, which largely and plainly contain whatever is necessary to be known in the doctrine of godliness.

But you can find nothing in them about prayer for the dead. For what some allege out of the second book of Maccabees proves nothing; for that book is not canonical: which it behoved them to have learned long since, even from Jerome.⁴

They add that prayer for the dead is an unwritten tradition of the apostles.⁵ I hear them; but I know well enough that the unwritten traditions of the apostles are not contrary to their written doctrines. I know well enough that the written doctrines of the apostles nowhere command prayers for the dead, and in no place allow them. When Paul the apostle exhorted the Thessalonians to moderation in lamenting for the dead,⁶ that was then a very fit and most convenient time to give a commandment concerning offering prayers for the souls of the dead — if he had thought them at all profitable and necessary. And yet, notwithstanding, he makes no manner mention of them. Rather, he simply teaches what they should believe about the souls of the faithful who were separated from their bodies: namely, that they live in everlasting blessedness with Christ, waiting and looking for the resurrection of their bodies.⁷ But who cannot see that this certainty and plainness of the apostle's doctrine is entangled and perilously shaken with this feigned apostolic tradition? For if we believe in Christ, then let us believe his words and promises. He himself said that he is the resurrection and life of the faithful, and that the souls of the believing, immediately upon the death of the body, escape and pass into life. If we believe these most true words of the Lord, then why do we, still caring for the salvation of the souls of the dead, pray and make supplication for them, as though they had not yet obtained salvation?

By such prayers, truly, we give manifest proof that we doubt our faith concerning the salvation of our souls, and do not hope in what we profess with our tongue, and which also the words of Christ and the apostles command us to hope in. The steadfast faith and assured hope of those who believe and stay themselves upon the promises of Christ. forbid us here to take and wear black mourning-garments in offerings for the dead, whose souls we believe to have already put on white garments. They forbid us to give an occasion either to unbelievers, or to weaklings in the faith, of worthily reprehending us because we mourn and lament for those whom we say live with God — as if they were cast into hell-fire, and we busily set ourselves to work making humble prayers to God to deliver these miserable souls out of their torments. That is to say, the faith which we profess with tongue and voice, we condemn by the testimony of our heart and mind, yes, and by our outward works. If we go on after this sort, truly we are double-dealers in our hope and in our faith. The things which we say seem to be dissembled, false, and feigned. For it avails nothing if we vaunt virtue in words, and destroy the truth with deeds. Therefore, let those who would, receive this tradition of the apostles (as they call it), touching offering prayers for the departed faithful. As for me, I mean to receive nothing repugnant to true faith, nor that which disagrees with the apostles' doctrine. Nor do I persuade any man to receive such vanity.

I also cannot help but tell you that what they call the tradition of the apostles, St. Augustine calls the tradition of the fathers received by the church. For in his sermon, de verbis Apostoli, 32, he says,

"This which the fathers delivered, the whole church observes; namely, that prayers should be made for those in the communion of the body and blood of Christ, when they are recited in their own place at the very sacrifice; and it is said to be offered for them also." ¹

And again, de Cura pro Mortuis gerenda, cap. 4, Augustine says:

"Supplications or prayers for the souls of the dead are not to be neglected, which the church has received to be made for all who are departed in the Christian brotherhood — not repeating them by name, but in a general remembrance of them altogether." ²

In some places, he stretches the traditions of the apostles very far. Yet, by these words this more expressly seems to be his meaning: that this rite or order of praying for the dead was delivered to the church by the fathers, and doubtless was received by the church many years after the apostles' time. The same Augustine defends in more places than one, that receiving the eucharist, or the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is as necessary to attain salvation for newborn infants from their mother's womb, as the sacrament of baptism. The chief and notable places in which he handles that matter, are in his first book against Julianus Pelagianus, etc., and in his first book de Peccatorum Meritis et Remissione, against the Pelagians.³ Nor does he urge that opinion with less earnestness than the tradition, because that was received and very usual in the church in that age. But who today receives that ceremony as apostolic? Who does not see that those good fathers, otherwise most faithful pastors, allowed some invention of man in that thing? The written doctrine of St. Paul deserves to be more esteemed today, than that ancient tradition of the church. Paul writes: "Let every man examine himself, and so let him eat of this bread and drink of this cup." ^{1Cor 11.28} By this, all men understand that the eucharist, or sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is to be received by those who are of mature age, and not for infants. For that reason, it was lawful for our elders to forsake that tradition and to draw nearer to the scripture. Therefore, in this matter let them give us leave also, to depart from the uncertain tradition of the fathers, and to cling to the most assured faith and doctrine of the apostles.

But Erius (they say) was condemned for this reason: he believed prayers were unprofitable for the dead.¹ I know indeed that Erius was condemned; nor do I take it upon myself to defend him, whom Phylastrius, Epiphanius, and Augustine mention was an Arian, and a man polluted with other foul errors.² But touching prayers for the dead, whether they are profitable or unprofitable, there is no doubt that those who believe what is delivered and set down in the Apostles' Creed, are catholics and not heretics. For according to the tradition of this creed, we believe the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection of this flesh, and life everlasting. Those who believe these things undoubtedly obtain whatever they believe. For the Lord said to the Centurion: "Go your way, and as you have believed, so let it be done to you." Mat 8.13 Therefore, whoever believes forgiveness of sins and life everlasting has obtained forgiveness of sins, and surely he will live in everlasting life. If what is delivered to us in the Apostles' creed is true, and it cannot be false, then what place, I ask you, should prayers have for the dead? For the dead have their sins forgiven them: therefore all hindrances and delays to life are taken away, and so they live with God. But those who have not believed, have still retained and kept their sins, and being cast down into the bottomless lake, they stick fast in the mire of hell.

Since these things are so certain, truly there is no use praying for the dead — neither before God, nor among the faithful. To this are annexed many examples of the saints in both Testaments, which are to be preferred above the traditions and condemnations of men. I ask you, which of the holy fathers ever prayed for their dead? Did Adam pray for Abel? Did the sons pray for their father Adam? What prayers did Abraham offer to God for the soul of his father Terah, or for his most dear wife Sara? What prayers did Esau and Jacob pour out for their father Isaac when he died? Or the twelve sons of Israel for Jacob? Or Solomon for David?

In the new Testament, John the Baptist is beheaded by Herod, Stephen is stoned by the Jews, James' head is cut off at the shoulders at the command of Agrippa; their disciples bury their bodies, and do all those things that religiously belong to their burials. But in so many funerals, no mention is made of prayer for the souls of the dead; for they believed that after death, they were immediately carried into everlasting life. Who then, after so many notable examples, and after such a clear profession of the catholic and sincere faith, can tie us to the necessity of praying for the souls of the dead? Who can then say that we are heretics, who fulfil in work what we profess by faith or confess by the mouth? Indeed, we do nothing except what the most excellent worshippers of God of both Testaments have done before us.

The second post by which they prop up their purgatory, lest it fall, is the appearance of spirits.³ For Rabanus,⁴ a bishop, shows from the testimonies of pope Gregory and reverend Bede, that the souls of dead men have very often appeared, and said that oblations and prayers profit them very much.⁵ But I wonder that men of learning would ground their work upon such rotten and ruinous foundations; for in the law, the Lord forbids us to ask the truth of the spirits or souls of the dead.

In the Prophets, we are sent from such oracles, "to the law and to the testimony." ^{Isa 8.20} In Luke, the rich glutton cries in torments, and says: "I beg you, father Abraham, send Lazarus to my father's house, for I have five brethren, that he may witness to them, lest they also come into this place of torment." But he hears: "They have Moses and the prophets; let them hear them." And when the rich glutton answered, "No, father Abraham; but if one comes to them from the dead, they will believe and repent;" he hears again, "If they will not hear Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe if one rises from death." ^{Luk 16.27-31}

Therefore, it is most certain and confirmed by the authority of the gospel, that blessed souls ¹ are not sent to us by God to teach us anything. Who, I pray you, would give ear to wicked and condemned souls? The gospel of Christ sends us all to the canonical scripture. From this it follows that the testimonies which are fetched from oracles, or from appearances of the spirits of the dead, are of no weight, but are most deceivable and full of lying.

Man's testimonies are agreeable with God's, which also teach us that souls being separated from their bodies cannot wander or stray in these regions. The words are too long to repeat, which Tertullian learnedly disputes about this matter, almost at the end of his book De Anima; yet they are all levelled at this mark: to show that souls separated from their bodies, and appointed to their places, do not return again into this world. To the objection of some who boast of artful magic, and also that by the power of God, many have returned from the dead into this life, Tertullian answers:

"But even if the power of God had called some souls back again into their bodies to give us instruction about His might and right, that would not be communicated with the credit and boldness of magicians, and the deceitfulness of dreams, and the licentiousness of poets. But rather, in the examples of the resurrection, when God's power — either by prophets, or by Christ, or by apostles — brings souls into bodies, it is manifestly declared by sound, evident, and full truth, that it is the shape of a true body, so that you might judge all appearings of dead men without bodies, to be delusions." ²

Therefore Chrysostom demands, in his twenty-ninth Homily on Matthew,

"What then shall we answer to the question, Am I such a soul?" He answers, "It is not the soul of that dead body which speaks these things, but the devil, who devises these things to deceive those who hear him."

And shortly he says: "That is why these are to be accounted the words of old wives and of dotards, ³ and children's stories and fantasies." And again:

"A soul separated from the body cannot wander in these regions. For the souls of the righteous are in the hands of God, and the souls of infants likewise: for they have not sinned. And the souls of the wicked after this life are later carried away. This is made apparent by Lazarus and the rich glutton. But in another place, the Lord also says: 'This night they shall require your soul again from you.' ^{Luk 12.20} Therefore the soul, when it departs from the body, cannot wander here with us: and that is not without cause. For if those who go on a journey, chancing into unknown countries, do not know where they are likely to go, unless they have a guide — then how much more shall the soul be ignorant where it should go after it has left the body and enters altogether into a new life and a strange way, unless it has a guide! Out of many places of the scripture it may be proved that the souls of just and righteous men do not go astray ¹ after death. For Stephen says, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.' ^{Act 7.59} And Paul desired to be loosed and to be with Christ. ^{Phi 1.23} The scripture also says of the patriarch, 'He died in a quiet (or good) age, and was gathered to (or laid by) his fathers.' ^{Gen 25.8} And that the souls of the wicked cannot delay or have their abiding here, give ear to what the rich glutton says, and consider what he craves and does not obtain. For if the souls of men might be resident here, he would have come himself, as he desired, and would have certified to his brethren about the torments of hell. Out of this place of scripture, this also plainly appears: that after leaving the body, souls are carried into some certain appointed place, from where they cannot return of their own accord when they want to return, but they wait and look for that terrible day of judgment." ² This much up to here out of Chrysostom.

Against these things they oppose the appearing of Samuel, ^{1Sam 28.5-19} fetched from the holy scriptures. By this they set about to prove that souls return again after death, to instruct men touching the things which they demand. We answer in a few words that this disguised masker, which seemed to be Samuel, was called Samuel by a trope or figure, but indeed he was not Samuel. For of a certainty it was a spirit, a juggling and a delusion of Satan. For sorcery is strictly forbidden in the law of the Lord. Therefore, blessed spirits do not obey forbidden ways and unlawful practices. When they were still joined with their fleshly bodies, they by all means abhorred and resisted them in their assaults. As for damned spirits, they exercise themselves in this. But who would believe their oracles? Samuel (they say) foretold what happened the day after. And what about that? That was no hard matter for the devil, since the true and living Samuel foretold many things a little while before they happened. But this crafty fox might foreknow the judgment of God which was to come, even by present things, and by the fear and quaking of the hosts. In his book, De Anima, Tertullian says:

"God forbid that we should believe that the soul of any saint, much less the soul of a prophet, can be fetched up by the devil. For we have learned that Satan is transformed into an angel of light, and more than that, into a man of light — yes, that he would pretend that he is God, and show wonderful signs to overthrow even the elect, if it were possible," etc. ³

St. Augustine is of the same judgment concerning that appearing.⁴

I trust it is abundantly declared by these testimonies, that souls of men separated from bodies do not wander or appear after death in these regions; for they remain until judgment in the places appointed for them by the determination and providence of God. Therefore they are neither sent by God, nor can they come to men to instruct and warn them either of things present or of things to come. From this it follows that the appearing of souls, that revelations and oracles, are mere delusions of Satan, ordained contrary to the sincerity and pureness of true religion. And because those who want to prove to us that there is a purgatory, use the defence and safeguard of these vanities; it is undoubtedly true that they prove a falsehood by deceit, and they prove an uncertain thing by something much more uncertain. Furthermore, it remains undoubtedly true that purgatory — in which souls that have put off their bodies are purged unto everlasting life — cannot be shown out of the scriptures.

And because we have removed and set aside the obstacles which were thrown in the way to hinder our most speedy journey, we return to our purpose. We intended to declare that the souls of the faithful, separated from the body by death, immediately after the death of the body, pass the right and ready way into heaven; and so they are most certainly and suddenly saved. Likewise, we understand that the souls of the unfaithful are thrown down the right and ready way into hell; and that after the death of the body, they perish with most certain and sudden damnation.

For the Lord expressly says in the gospel: "He that believes in the Son of God is not condemned (or judged); but he that does not believe is condemned (or judged) already, because he has not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God." ^{Joh 3.18} Again: "He that believes in the Son of God has eternal life; but he that believes not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abides on him." ^{Joh 3.36} And yet again: "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one who sees the Son, and believes on him, has everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day." ^{Joh 6.40} Now the last day of man is the point of death. In that day, Christ saves us by his power, lest our soul either perish or feel any torments — that it might live and enjoy everlasting blessedness. Moreover,¹ the last day is that last day of judgment, in which Christ will raise again and judge all flesh, glorifying the bodies of his faithful people unto life everlasting.

Again the Lord says in the gospel: "Truly, truly, I say to you, He that hears my word, and believes on him that sent me, has everlasting life, and shall not come into judgment (or damnation); but has escaped from death to life." ^{Joh 5.24} These words alone of our Lord, are able (without any question) to set forth, declare, prove, and sufficiently confirm our opinion concerning the most certain and sudden salvation of souls. For first of all, lest any man doubt the most assured truth touching the matter which he was setting forth, immediately at the beginning, he most holily swears ("Truly, truly I say") — that is to say, he confirms the truth by giving witness to it with an oath. Afterwards, he annexes the whole manner of our salvation, which consists in hearing the word of God, and in true faith which receives the truth of God's word. For it is not enough to have heard the word of the gospel, unless we cling to it by true faith. But now, mark with what assurance Christ promises life and salvation to those who believe in him: "He has life everlasting," he says. He said, "he has," not he shall have. Therefore, he left no room either as to doubt, or as to time. Still more plainly, by expounding when and how the faithful have or obtain life, he says: "He shall not come into judgment (or damnation), but has escaped from death to life."

Those come into judgment who will have their cause examined and discussed before the judge. Those come also into judgment who, by the sentence of the judge, are punished for their evil deeds. But the faithful have no cause to be tried and discussed before the judge; for their sins are fully forgiven them. "It is God who justifies and forgives. Who is he that condemns?" ^{Rom 8.33} Therefore, they are not subject to any punishments; for Christ bore the punishment of the cross, that his faithful people might be delivered and saved harmless from all torments. But lest any man rather think there is a delay or space of time between the death of the body and the life of the world to come, he says: "But has escaped from death to life." Look, he says, "He has escaped," not He shall escape. By using the verb in the past tense, he signified the certainty of the time being past,² and might show that the souls of those who believe are right then, after the death of the body, caught up into life everlasting. And I know well enough that the adversaries have no sound argument here to set against so manifest and invincible a truth. Indeed, with their wrangling words and their sophistry, they may wrestle with the truth; but they are never able to overthrow the truth. For the souls of the faithful, even out of the very mouth (as is commonly said, "Von mund auf zu himmel faren"),¹ all of a sudden enter into their blessed seats, and by faith enjoy everlasting felicity.

² of the time past, not in Lat

Again, we read in the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ made to John the apostle, that it was said: "And I heard a voice from heaven, saying to me, Write, Blessed are the dead who hereafter die in the Lord."² Even so, says the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works follow them."^{Rev 14.13} In these words, a heavenly and undoubted oracle touching the blessednesses of all those who die in faith, is knit up. And St. John is commanded to write the oracle from heaven, that it may remain to all times, and be read by all people.

The sum of the oracle is this, "Blessed are the dead, who hereafter die in the Lord." But whoever departs out of this life in the faith of Jesus Christ, dies in the Lord; for the apostle uses this kind of speech in 1Cor. 15. and 1Thess. 4. Furthermore, those who depart out of this life in the faith of Jesus Christ, are simply and truly pronounced blessed — namely, happy and free from all misery. Indeed, a note is added about the time when they will obtain this blessedness — namely, Hereafter (απαρτι), that is to say, immediately, in an instant,³ then, out of hand, namely (as the Lord says in the gospel), immediately after the death of the body. There is also added another testimony by which the certainty of felicity is again expressed, and perfection is not delayed till the morrow: "Even so, says the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours." The Spirit, I mean, the Spirit of truth, which cannot lie, says, ναί, that is to say, Amen — "so it is." Truly, the faithful are blessed indeed; and they are blessed in an instant; and they are so blessed, that "they rest from their labours." The labours of the faithful are miseries, calamities, afflictions, sorrow, fear, or dread, and other evils of this sort, with which they are vexed in this world, or rather, exercised in their faith. From these things, the souls of the faithful, departing from their bodies, are delivered.

Therefore, they are not plagued by torments and vexations, they are not scorched in the midst of their journey; but being happy and blessed, they are immediately delivered from all anguish and trouble. And if they suffered anything while they were still living in the body, if they did any good works in faith, these "follow them." Let no man think that those works, just because they now cease, were and are in vain; for they receive their reward in that blessed life. That is why "their works follow them." And let us mark that he does not say, the works of others follow them, to deliver them out of purgatory; but their own works follow them. For in the gospel also, the wise virgins who had oil ready in their lamps, went in with the bridegroom to the marriage. The foolish virgins who had⁴ prepared no oil for themselves, but hoped to have it from elsewhere to serve their needs, are excluded and shut out from joy.

To the omnipotent God therefore, our most merciful Father, and continual running fountain of all good graces and which is never drawn dry, who fashioned our body in our mother's womb, and breathed or poured into it a reasonable soul, which might, while it is joined to the body, quicken and direct us, and when it is separated from the body might forthwith after the death of the body, be translated into heaven, there to live in joy and happiness until it returns again to the body being raised from the dead in the last judgment, with which it may rejoice and be glad forever and

WRITTEN BY HENRY BULLINGER.

5-1. THE FIRST SERMON: OF THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.

OF THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH; WHAT IT IS, HOW FAR IT EXTENDS, BY WHAT MARKS IT IS KNOWN, FROM WHERE IT SPRINGS, HOW IT IS MAINTAINED AND PRESERVED, WHETHER IT MAY ERR.
ALSO OF THE POWER AND STUDIES OF THE CHURCH.

The order and course of things ¹ lead us next, after God — the workman and author of all things — to speak of His most excellent work: namely, the CHURCH. For so great is the goodness of our good God and most loving Father, that he is not desirous to live happily and blessedly alone, but moreover to bestow and pour all kinds of blessedness upon us, his beloved creatures, that we should enjoy his goods by all means possible. And with that intent, he chooses men for himself who live in this world, that he may translate them to himself, in whom also he may dwelt (even while they live here on earth), whom he may enrich with all his goods, and in whom he may reign. He chooses that they should be called by his name — namely, a people, a house, a kingdom, an inheritance, a flock, a congregation, or a church, of the living God. I will speak of this church (aided with your prayers) those things which the Lord of the church grants to me to utter.

This word Ecclesia, which signifies a church or congregation, is a Greek word used and received among the Latins. It signifies, as I said, a congregation, communion, or assembly (in the Dutch tongue, Ein Gemeind), or a people called together to hear about matters of the commonwealth. For St. Luke so used this word in the nineteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. But it was translated to a holy use, and began to be called a congregation, assembly, or company of the faithful, calling upon the name of the Lord. St. Paul says that he persecuted the congregation or church of God. ^{1Cor 15.9} In another place he says, "I received authority from the high priests to bind all those who call upon the name of Christ;" ² for now he refers to them as those who call upon the name of Christ, or Christians, whom he previously called the church. Or else this word Ecclesia, the church or congregation, is used for calling together: for in the Greek tongue εκκαλεω (ekkaleo) signifies to call forth [to summon]. For God calls forth all believers from all parts of the wide world, and from the whole congregation of men, together with their seed,³ that they may be his peculiar people, and that he again may be their God; that is to say, that they may be the church of the living God. In times past, the congregation or assembly of the Jewish people, being God's flock, was called a synagogue; for this word synagogue signifies the same as Ecclesia, the congregation. But because of the stubbornness of the Jews, and the unappeasable hatred which they bear towards Christian religion, this word synagogue is not esteemed, but has almost grown out of use. But we will not dispute by due and right order about the churches either of the Jews or the Turks, or of other foreign churches of the Gentiles,⁴ of which we know there are many sorts and kinds. We will speak of the Christian church and congregation of the faithful: which the Germans call Die kirch, alluding perhaps to the Greek word κυριακη (kuriake). For they call κυριακην (kuriaken) anything belonging to the Lord, namely, a house or a people — just as the

⁴ vel aliarum exterarum gentium, Lat.: or (of the churches) of other nations that are without.

5-1. THE FIRST SERMON: OF THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.

Germans call Die kirchen both the people of God themselves, and also the place in which they assemble together to worship God. But first of all, we will describe a little more plainly what the church or congregation is.

The church is the whole company and multitude of the faithful, partly now in heaven, and partly still remaining here on earth where it agrees plainly in unity of faith or true doctrine, and in the lawful partaking of the sacraments. Nor is the church divided, but joined and united together in one house and fellowship as it were.

This church was usually called catholic, that is to say, universal. For she produces her branches in all the places of the world, in all times of all ages, and generally comprehends all the faithful of the whole world. For the church of God is not tied to any one region, nation, or kindred; to condition, age, sex, or kind. All the faithful generally, and each one specially, wherever they may be, are citizens and members of this church. St. Paul the Apostle says: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, neither bondman nor free, neither man nor woman; for you are all one in Christ Jesus." Gal 3.28

The church is distinguished into the TRIUMPHANT and the MILITANT. The triumphant is that great company of holy spirits in heaven, triumphing for the victory gotten against the world, sin, and the devil, still enjoying the sight of God, in which consists all fulness of all kinds of joy and pleasure. Upon this they set forth God's glory, and praise his goodness forever. St. John the Apostle sets forth this church very notably in his Revelation, saying: "After this I saw, and, behold, a great company which no man was able to number, of all nations, peoples, and tongues, standing before the throne, and in the sight of the Lamb, clothed in white raiments, and palms in their hands: and they cried out with a loud voice, saying: Salvation belongs to him that sits on the throne of our God, and to the Lamb." Rev 7.9-10 A little after this he says:

"And one of the elders answered and said to me: These who are clothed in white garments, who are they? Or where do they come from? And I said to him, you know, Lord. And he said to me, These are the ones who have come out of great affliction, and have spread abroad ¹ their garments, and have made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore, they are before the throne of God, and serve day and night in his holy temple. And he that sits on the throne shall dwell over them. They shall neither hunger nor thirst anymore; nor shall the sun shine on them, nor any heat; because the Lamb, who sits in the midst of the throne, shall govern them, and bring them to the springs of the water of life. And the Lord shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." Rev 7.13-17

Brethren, you have heard a notable ² description of the triumphant church in heaven, and triumphing truly through the blood of Jesus Christ, by whom they conquered and now reign. For Christ is that "Lamb of God, that takes away the sins of the world;" 1Joh 1.29 by whom all who are sanctified are sanctified, and shall be sanctified, and live, from the first creation of the world to the end of all times. St. Paul, in a certain place, also giving us a notable description of this church, tells us that we who are as yet busied in the militant church, shall sometime be translated to the triumphant church, and be made fellows with the angels of God, received among the orders of the patriarchs, and placed in the company of the blessed spirits, with the most high God himself, and the mediator, our Lord Jesus Christ. Preaching the greatness of God's grace brought to us by the gospel, and exhorting us to receive it with a true faith, he says:

"You did not come to mount Sinai, to a fire, to a whirlwind, a stormy tempest, and darkness; ...but to mount Zion, to the city of the living God, to heavenly Jerusalem, and to the innumerable company of angels, and to the church or congregation of the first-begotten which are written in heaven, and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of the perfect just, and to the mediator of the new Testament, Jesus Christ,¹ speaking better things than the blood of Abel spoke." ^{Heb 12.18, 22-24}

And therefore, all the saints in heaven belong to our company; or rather, we belong to their fellowship; for we are companions and fellow-heirs with the saints from Adam to the end of all worlds, and God's household. This contains the greatest comfort of all man's life, and moves us most of all to the study of virtue. For what more worthy thing is there, than to be of God's household? Or what may be thought more sweet to us, than to think ourselves fellows with the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, of all angels and blessed spirits? This benefit, I say, Christ has bestowed on us. To him, therefore, be praise, glory, and thanks for ever and ever. Amen.

The militant church is a congregation of men on earth, professing the name and religion of Christ, continually fighting in the world against the devil, sin, flesh, and the world, in the camp and tents, and under the banner, of our Lord Christ. This church is to be considered two ways. For either it is to be taken strictly, comprehending only those who are not only called but are indeed the church: the faithful and elect of God, living members, knit to Christ — not only with bands and other outward marks and signs,² but in spirit and faith — and oftentimes by these means without the others. We will speak of this matter afterward. This inward and invisible church of God may be well named the elect spouse of Christ, known only to God, who alone knows who are his. When we are first taught to know this church, we confess her with the Apostles' creed, saying:³ "I believe the holy catholic church, the communion of saints."

And in these few words we comprehend that there is a church, also what the church is, and what manner of church it is. For first we confess that there has been, and is, a church of God, and that it shall continue forever. Then, professing what it is, we add this, "The communion of saints." That is to say, we believe the church to be nothing else but the company of all those saints who are, have been, and shall be, in this present age as well as in the world to come, who enjoy all good things in common granted to them by God. Also, we express what manner of thing the church is, namely, holy — even the spouse of Christ, cleansed and blessed. For St. Paul calls those holy, who are cleansed with the Spirit and blood of our God, a great part of whom have received crowns of glory; the remainder labour here on earth, hoping to receive them in heaven. And truly, in consideration of the church, the chief matter is that through the grace of God we are made the members of Christ's body, and partakers of all heavenly gifts with the angels;⁴ for we confess none to be more holy than ourselves.⁵

The church more largely considered, comprehends not only those who are the very faithful and holy indeed, but also those who — although they do not believe truly or sincerely, nor are clean or holy in the conduct of their life — yet they acknowledge and profess true religion with the true believers and the holy men of God. Indeed, they speak well of and approve virtues, and reprove evil, and they do not sever themselves ¹ from the unity of this militant holy church. In consideration of this, no more than the wicked and hypocrites (such as we read were in the church in the time of Christ and the apostles, such as Judas, Ananias and Sapphira, Simon Magus, also Demas, Hymenaeus, Alexander, and many others) are excluded and put from the church. Such a church may well be called the outward and visible church.

But this church of which we speak, is to be reasonably considered both in part, and as the whole; for it is to be considered particularly and generally. And the particular church is that which is comprised of a certain number, and is known by some sure and certain place. For takes its name from the place, being called by the names of cities, such as the churches of Zurich and Berne, etc. The Greeks called those particular churches παροικιας (paroikias) which we commonly call parishes. And we call a parish, that which has dwelling-houses and streets joined together in neighbourhood. But in cities and towns, ² to certain portions are usually ascribed both churches and parish priests to serve them, and that whole circuit is called a parish ³ — in the Dutch tongue, Ein barchi,⁴ oder pfarkirch, oder ein kirchhory. And in olden times, the parish priest was a provider. For the Parish and he provided for and gave necessaries to strangers, chiefly salt and wood.⁵ Some called him the maker of the feast; others call him a preparer of virgins.⁶ And the pastors of churches are, as it were, preparers of virgins for the Redeemer and head of the church, who is Christ; they bring him a chaste and undefiled virgin. In short, because they themselves provided things that were most necessary for the people of God, and also prepared heavenly meats and banquets, the pastors of the Lord's flock are very well called parish priests, or the curates of souls.⁷ The Lord in the gospel, speaking of the particular church, says: "If he that offends the church will not heed when he is warned, complain to the church." ^{Mat 18.17}

But it is not possible for the universal church, throughout the whole world, to assemble and come together so that the rebellious and obstinate might be brought before it. Therefore, judgment to be given on the stubborn is referred to the particular churches. To conclude, the universal church consists of all the particular churches throughout the whole world, and of all the visible parts and members of it. This is the same thing we outlined recently, when we spoke more at large about it.

But the catholic church of God (as we began to say a little earlier) abides with us continually from age to age, from the beginning; and it is at this time dispersed throughout the whole world, both visibly and invisibly. The Lord's people and God's house will continue on earth to the world's end. For there was never yet any world, nor shall there be any age, in which God has not sanctified or will not sanctify some for himself, in whom he will dwell. And they shall be his flock and holy house: for the testimonies of ancient prophets record that the church is perpetual. For thus we find it written in the 132nd psalm: "The Lord has chosen Zion, he has chosen her for a habitation for himself. This is my resting-place for ever and ever; here I will dwell, because I have chosen her." Psa 132.13-14 And again: "I have sworn to David in my holiness, his seed shall remain for ever, and his seat shall continue before me as the sun." Psa 89.35-36 But who does not know that all this is to be understood about Christ, the Son of David, and about his throne and spiritual Zion, which is the church? He also says in the gospel, signifying the continuance of the church: "I will remain with you continually to the end of the world." Mat 28.20 And again: "I will ask of my Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, the Spirit of truth, that he may abide with you forever." Joh 14.16 To this also belongs that saying in the gospel: "And the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church." Mat 16.18 This saying truly is a great comfort to the faithful in so many and such great persecutions intended to utterly destroy and overthrow the church.

But just as Christ has always had, now has, and shall forever have his church here on earth, so likewise the devil, as long as the world continues, will never lack his people in whom he may reign. This church of the devil took her first beginning from Cain, and will continue to the last wicked person, comprehending all those evil peoples that live between the beginning and the end. But living here on earth, they have society and share in common with those who are tormented in hell. For just as all who are godly, make one body under one head who is Christ, so all the wicked, under one head Satan, are one corporate body. This may worthily be called the wicked church,¹ Sodom and Gomorrah, Babylon, the congregation of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, a synagogue, a school, and a stew of the devil, the kingdom of antichrist, or any other similar names. In this church are reckoned up all those who are wicked and infidels, separating themselves from the society of our holy mother the church, or forsaking its communion; and especially those who are mockers of God and his holy word, blasphemers and persecutors of Christ and his church. These days, such are the heathen, Turks, Jews, heretics, schismatics, and generally all those who are professed enemies to Christian religion.

And to these we may also add hypocrites; for hypocrisy is no small offence that the Lord himself so earnestly persecutes and blames in every part of the gospel. Among other things he says: "The Lord of that servant will come on the day in which he does not look for him, and in an hour he will not know of, and will divide him, and will give him his portion with hypocrites, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Mat 24.50-51 Beyond all doubt, he signified the greatness of the offence by the sharpness of the punishment. This church follows the motivations of the devil, and the devices or imaginations of her own heart. And she is busied and exercised in all kinds of blasphemy and wickedness, in which she excels herself; and at last sinks down to hell, so that she is not in any place separated from that head to whom she has so diligently, or rather obstinately, joined herself.

I know right well that you will object that I have reckoned hypocrites to be in the outward communion and fellowship of the militant church, and now I again account them to be of the company of the devil's church.

Moreover, you will say that it is impossible that the same hypocrites may take part in both churches, which differ between themselves. For the Lord says: "Either make the tree good and the fruit good, or else the tree nothing and the fruit nothing." And St. Paul also says that there is no "fellowship between Christ and Belial, between light and darkness, between truth and lying;" ^{2Cor} 6.14-15 and that hypocrisy is lying and darkness.

Therefore, I perceive that here is a fit place to show by what means and how far I may account hypocrites to be among the congregation of the church. First, we will make a distinction or difference between hypocrites. For there are certain hypocrites who put their confidence in their human justice and equity, doing all their works openly so that they may be seen by men, firmly trusting to and stiffly standing in men's traditions. It is a custom and property of these men not only to flee from the church which teaches the righteousness of Christ, but also to curse, detest, and persecute it with all cruelty. Such people were the Jews and Jewish Pharisees with whom our Lord Jesus Christ had much contention, and with whom the church contends and makes wars even today. These are the plain and visible members of the devil's church, and they are not to be counted among the outward¹ church, yes, they are not even once worthy to be named in the church of Christ. Again, there are some kinds of hypocrites that are dissemblers, who neither give any confidence to their own righteousness and justice, nor yet greatly regard the traditions of men. These kinds of people neither hate the church, nor flee from it, nor persecute it; but outwardly they agree with it, professing the same faith, and participating in the same sacraments. But inwardly and in mind, they neither believe unfeignedly and sincerely, nor do they live holily. Some of this sort will cling to the fellowship and company of the church for a season; and having any occasion given to them, they will fall from it, as heretics and schismatics are prone to do; those who were friends, become enemies. There are still others who never fall from the church, but keep themselves in the fellowship of the church all their lifetime, outwardly pretending and feigning religion; but inwardly giving themselves up to their own errors, faults, and wickedness. For these, without a doubt, the outward behaviour and fellowship does not profit at all.

For we ought to live forever and participate in all heavenly gifts with those who desire them, to join in fellowship² with the church of God — not only by outward and visible society, but by inward communion and fellowship, in which consists life and salvation. We will speak of this matter in a convenient place. Such hypocrites or dissemblers, hanging on the ecclesiastical body, are called members of the body, and are said to be of the church. So that it may be better understood by you all, we will set forth this matter by certain parables.

We say that the wicked or hypocrites are of a sort in the church, as chaff is in the corn; which indeed is of another nature, and is not corn at all. Therefore, just as the members of men's bodies may be either dry, or rotten, or feeble, these hypocrites, even though they have no society and take no part with the living members in the vital spirit, by coupling together and by tying certain strings, they cling fast to the living members. By this means, they too are called members and parts of the body. But lest [diseased limbs in a body] infect the others, men cut them off — though sometimes they leave them alone, lest by cutting them off, the life of the whole body be endangered. Even in the same way, we say that hypocrites are in the church of Christ, even though they are not united to the church either by the bond of the Spirit, or by faith and love. Nor are they to be taken as living members; yet they are allowed, lest some worse mischief happen to the whole body of the church; and often they are cut off, by which better health may come to the ecclesiastical body.

But let us hear what the evangelical and apostolic testimony says. The Lord says plainly in the gospel, that in the Lord's field tares³ grow up, sown by a wicked man; which the Lord forbids to be plucked up, lest the corn be plucked up with it. ^{Mat 13:25} Behold, tares sown by an evil man (I say the devil himself) which is not corn; yet it increases, and it is in the Lord's field. Again, the Lord says in the gospel: "The kingdom of heaven is like a net, which, being cast into the sea, draws all manner of things with it; and when it is filled, it is brought to the shore; and there men sit, reserving what is good in a vessel, and what is evil they cast away." ^{Mat 13.47-48}

² Rather; For they that desire to live for ever, and to participate in all heavenly good things, must join in fellowship, etc.

Again, behold how you may see both good and bad drawn in the self-same net; and therefore, in the self-same kingdom, both good and evil are to be reckoned. Also in another parable, someone enters in among the guests, who does not have on his wedding-garment. He is allowed for a time, but at last he is cast out of doors by the lord of the feast. ^{Mat 22.1-13} In another place, it is said that he has a fan in his hand, and he cleanses the floor, and burns the chaff with unquenchable fire. ^{Mat 3.12} In his epistle to the Corinthians, St. Paul differentiates between the professed and open enemies of Christ's church, and the impure sort of men who as yet are not quite repugnant, nor adversaries of the church and the name of Christ.¹ "If any man who is called a brother is a thief, or a whore-monger, or a covetous person, etc. see that you do not eat with such a man. For what is it to me to judge those who are outside? For God judges them." ^{1Cor 5.12-13} Outside (that is to say, outside the bounds of the church) he places those who are not called brethren — namely, those who do not acknowledge the name of Christ or of the church. Inside, that is, inside the society of the church (the outward church), he counts those who yet acknowledge the name of Christians, and withstand ecclesiastical discipline, though in the meantime they are defiled and spotted with much mischief.² St. John the apostle spoke plainly about all such men, saying: "They went out from us, but they were not of us; for if they had been of us, they would have stayed with us." ^{1Joh 2.19} This seems to be a new kind of speech. For if those who go out of the church had not been in the society of the church, then how could they go out of the church? Can a man come out of a place, to which he never came, or in which he never was?

Therefore, if hypocrites and evil men have gone out of the church, then surely they were in the church at sometime; thus, when they had not yet gone out of it, they plainly showed what kind of Christians they were indeed. Again, because they went out of the church, they manifestly showed that they were never indeed the true and living members of Christ and the church; and yet for a while they were numbered among the members of the church. The apostle gives the reason: it is the disposition of Christ's true members never to forsake Christ and his church, but to continue and also to prosper and increase daily, more and more. The saints and holy men truly offend or fall [at times], but they do not utterly forsake Christ. David, having committed adultery and manslaughter, cries out, saying: "Make me a clean heart, Lord, and renew a right spirit within me. Do not cast me away from your presence, and do not take your Holy Spirit from me. O give me the comfort of your help again, and establish me with your free Spirit." ³ St. Peter denies the Lord, and the weak flesh overcame a good spirit. But he repented immediately (the Lord stirring up his heart), and departing from evil company, he adjoins himself to the good fellowship of the Lord, who foretold him of this great fall, and added these words to it: "I prayed for you that your faith should not fail; and you, when you have turned back,⁴ confirm your brethren." ^{Luk 22.32} The same Peter, also in another place, what time many fell from Christ, being demanded whether he also provided to depart, answered: "Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the word of eternal life. And we believe and know, that you are Christ, the Son of the living God." ^{Joh 6.68-69} This is why St. John said very truly: "They went out from us, but they were not of us." He adds the reason: "If they had been of us, they would have stayed with us." Therefore, because they did not continue with us in the society of Christ and the church, they showed by their defection and falling away, which sort they were. We considered them to be members of the church, but by falling away, they declared that they were chaff in the Lord's corn.

For chaff, not being ¹ stirred or fanned, seems to be heavy with a grain of wheat in it, but once fanned, it appears empty and light, and is separated from the corn. So too, hypocrites, being light because of their defection,² manifestly prove that they were never heavy with the seed of God's word, and that they were never of the true corn of Christ.

From this, a general and ancient ³ opinion is gathered that all who are said to be the church, and who beautify themselves with the title of the church, are later found not to be the church. For St. John plainly adds: "But that it may be evident, that all are not of us." We read how St. Paul says to the Romans: "They are not all Israelites who came from Israel; nor are they all children directly, just because they are the seed of Abraham. But in Isaac your seed shall be called." Rom 9.6-7 Therefore, the faithful are the true and living members of Christ and of the saints. Meantime, so long as hypocrites or wicked persons (not yet putting off their visors ⁴) declare they are Christians by their sayings and doings, they may not lawfully be cut from the church. They do not yet break away of their own accord; they do not yet forsake Christ in the open field, and flee to the tents of antichrist or the devil. And so they are known and taken to be the true inhabitants of the church, and are called the church and the members of the church, even though God, who beholds the hearts of all men, well enough discerns them.⁵

I will again make this matter plain by an example. As long as Judas, the betrayer of Christ and a manslayer, did not utter his crafty or rather most wicked device, either by open deed or word, and did not forsake the company of Christ and the apostles, but preached and provided necessary things for the household of Christ, he was accounted an apostle and the steward of Christ — yes, and as a member of the apostolic church.

Yet the self-same Judas was called a devil by the Lord; and when He spoke of the elect and of his true and living members, Judas was most plainly excluded. Yet there is no occasion to doubt that Judas was not a member of the inward and holy church of God, even though he was a member of the outward church, being counted in the number of the holy men. And therefore, those who said of God's church, that there is one visible and outward, and another invisible and inward, do not speak without great advice. The visible and outward church is that which is outwardly known by men as a church, by hearing God's word and partaking of his sacraments, and by the public confession of their faith. The invisible and inward church is so called, not because men are invisible, but because it is not to be seen with man's eye, and yet it appears before God's eyes, which member believes truly, and which feignedly. For the true believers are the true and living members of this inward church, which I previously called the militant church, more strictly considered. But the other visible church, comprehending both good and bad, is more largely considered.

Now, since we have said that the church militant on earth is marked by God with certain tokens and marks by which it may be known in this world, it next follows that we speak about those outward marks of the church of God. And there are two special and principal marks of it: the sincere preaching of the word of God, and the lawful partaking of the sacraments of Christ. Some would add to these the study of godliness and unity, patience in affliction, and calling on the name of God by Christ; but we include them in these two that we have set down.

Writing to the Ephesians, St. Paul says: "Christ gave himself for the congregation, that he might sanctify it, and cleanse it in the fountain of water, through the word." ^{Eph 5.25-26} We have in this testimony of the apostle, the marks of the church: namely, the word and the sacrament by which Christ makes himself a church. For with his grace he calls, and with his blood he purifies, what he shows ¹ by his word is to be received by faith. He seals them with sacraments, so that the faithful should not doubt anything touching their salvation obtained through Christ. And truly, these things properly belong to the faithful and holy members.

Though hypocrites are not purified, the fault lies in themselves, and not in God or his holy ministry. They are surely sanctified visibly, for which they are counted holy among men; and these things do improperly belong to them. St. Peter does not differ in this point one whit from St. Paul. When Peter preached the word of God to the people of Jerusalem, and they demanded what they should do, Peter answers: "Repent, and every one of you be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins." ^{Act 2.38} St. Peter therefore joined baptism with doctrine, the sacrament with the word. He had learned this from our Saviour himself in the gospel written by St. Matthew, saying: "Teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." ^{Mat 28.19} Thus you read in the Acts no other mysteries about the word and sacraments of the church, than are recounted ² in these words: "They continued in the doctrine of the apostles, and in doing almsdeeds,³ and in breaking of bread, and prayer." ^{Act 2.42} Here you may see the supper of the Lord, another sacrament, adjoined to the sacrament of baptism — also, the desire for and study of unity and love, and calling upon the name of God.

Notwithstanding that these things are sufficiently plain and firm enough, I will add still other testimonies out of the holy scriptures. Concerning the token of God's word, or the preaching of his gospel, the Lord himself speaks by Isaiah the prophet, saying: "I will make this covenant with them, My Spirit that has come upon you (the church), and my words which I have put in your mouth, shall never go out of your mouth, nor out of the mouth of your children's children, says the Lord, from this time forth forevermore." ^{Isa 59.21} For also in the gospel, the Lord Jesus says: "He that is of God hears the word of God." ^{Joh 8.47} Again, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and I give to them everlasting life; and they shall not perish forever." ^{Joh 10.27-28} And again, "He that loves me will keep my commandments; he that does not love me will not keep my commandments." ^{Joh 14.23-24}

Again, "Whoever is of the truth, will hear my voice." ^{Joh 18.37} Now, touching the marks and tokens of the sacraments, St. Paul says about holy baptism: "Through one Spirit we are all baptized in one body." ^{1Cor 12.13} And also, speaking of the Lord's Supper, he says: "Though we are many, yet we are one bread and one body; for we are all partakers of the same bread. Is not the cup of blessing which we bless, partaking of the blood of Christ?" ^{1Cor 10.16-17} It is most certain therefore (for it is approved by testimonies from the holy scriptures), that the outward marks and tokens of the church are the word and the sacrament. For these bring us into the society of one ecclesiastical body, and they keep us in it.

5-1. THE FIRST SERMON: OF THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.

All these testimonies properly (as I said a little earlier) belong to the elect members of God, being endowed with faith and true obedience. But they do not belong to the hypocrites at all, who are devoid of faith and due obedience. Notwithstanding, because they also hear the voice of the shepherd outwardly, and they pursue virtue, and they are openly or outwardly annexed to the elect and true believers in partaking of the sacraments, they are indeed annexed to the true body of Christ. For the sake of those outward signs, they are considered to be in the church, so long as they do not depart from it. In this point, for perspicuity's sake, having treated the marks of the church, we must add this to it: that by common order, these marks declare and denote the members of the church. For there are certain special members who, although they lack these marks, yet they are not excluded from the society and communion of the true church of Christ. For it is most evident that there are many in the world who do not hear the ordinary preaching of God's word, nor do they come into the congregation and the company of those who call upon God, nor receive the sacraments. It is not that they despise them, or that it is a delight to them to be apart from sermons and the preaching of God's word; but through necessity, such as imprisonment, sickness, or being constrained by some other urgent cause,¹ they cannot attain what they earnestly desire. And yet, despite all that, they are the true and living members of Christ and of the catholic church.

In times past, the Lord instituted or appointed to the people of Israel a visible church, which he established by a certain law, and set it forth by visible signs. If any man had despised this church, or refused, when he might, to hear the doctrine of the church, and to enter in among the holy company, and to sacrifice — or else, if he had railed against it; or instead of the order of worshipping God that was appointed, he had embraced any other kind of order — then truly, he was not at all considered to be of the order and number of the people of God. And yet it is certain that there were an innumerable company of men dispersed throughout the whole world among the gentiles, who never did, nor could, communicate with this visible company and congregation of God's people; and yet, notwithstanding they were holy members of this society and communion, and the friends of almighty God. There were a great many of the children of God, along with Jehoiakim and Coniah,² who were taken prisoners by Nebuchadnezzar and brought captive into Babylon. This was no prejudice to them, nor did these things hurt those who were separated from the people of God, from the church, and from worshipping God, which was then being visibly upheld by Zedekiah at Jerusalem. Indeed, it little availed a great many, to be in the visible assemblies and congregations with the people of God in God's temple, when their minds and hearts were not sound and perfect.

We may today find a great many of the faithful dispersed on the seas, condemned to the galleys for their confession of the true faith.³ We may find many who are held in captivity under antichrist, which we will speak about in the next sermon. We may also find a surprising number in Grascia, Natolia, Persia, Arabia, or in Africa — servants of Jesus Christ and worthy members of the catholic church of Christ — who are being excluded and barred from the holy mysteries of the Christians, through the impiety and cruelty of Mahomet.

Nevertheless, we will find them most nearly joined together in one spirit and one faith with all the true members of the church, and also marked⁴ with the visible signs. Therefore, the word and the sacraments, by common decree, are the marks of the church — not separating or distinguishing

¹ aliorum malorura vi, Lat.: by the constraint of other evils.

² Or Jehoiachin. See p. iii.11.

³ That was true of John Knox.

the faithful from the communion and society of other believers who, by some necessity, are being shut out from the visible company of the faithful.¹

But to perfectly understand the marks of the church, this too (and most principally) applies: that it is not enough to brag about the word of God, or the scripture, unless we also embrace, retain, and determine the true sense of it, and what agrees with the articles of faith. For if we corrupt the sense of the scripture, and urge it in the church, then you do not bring forth the sincere scripture itself, but your own opinion and fancies which you have devised from your own mind. The church of the Arians did not refuse the word of the Lord, but rather laboured to beautify and defend their own blasphemous errors with the testimonies of holy scripture. That church denied that our Lord Jesus Christ is of one substance with God the Father, saying that the sense of the scriptures, and of the ancient ² faith, both affirm and urge this heresy among the principal points of our faith. Truly, that church did not allege the sincere and pure word of God (however it may have boasted of it), but an adulterated word was substituted for the true and perfect meaning of the holy scripture, to defend its heretical opinion. And therefore, it did not have the true mark of the church, nor was it the true church of God. We may judge all other churches of heretics by this one unhappy example. Though seemingly they are not devoid of the testimony of God's word, yet for all that, they indeed have no purity of God's word in them.

What we said concerning the word of God, is also necessarily to be understood about the use of the sacraments: For unless they are used in an orderly and lawful fashion — in that order in which the Lord himself instituted them, they are not marks or signs of the church of God.

Jeroboam truly sacrificed, yes, he sacrificed to God; but because he did not sacrifice lawfully, he was accounted a stranger, and fallen from the true church of God. Indeed, David himself brought the ark of the Lord of hosts with great devotion, and with much joy and melody. But because he did not carry it lawfully on the shoulders of the priests, instead of great joy, the exceeding sorrow which followed later, declared that it is not enough to use the sacraments and ordinances of God, unless you use them lawfully. If you do this, God will acknowledge you as his. Moreover, those of old, who were baptized by heretics, were not for that reason baptized again by the ancient catholics. This was because the heretics did not baptize into the name of any man, or into the society of their errors ³ or heresies, but they baptized "in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost." Nor did they invoke their own name, or the name of arch-heretics, but of Jesus Christ. Therefore, it was not the baptism of heretics, but the baptism of the church, though ministered by heretics. Though not refusing it, they did not allow the churches of heretics to be known as true, by true signs. Yet they acknowledged that heretics used things properly belonging to the true church. Nor does it at all derogate, or take away from a good thing, if any wicked or evil man administers it. We do not acknowledge today the upstart Romish church of the pope as the true church of Christ (we do not speak of that old apostolic church). Yet we do not rebaptize those who were baptized by the priests imbrued ⁴ with popish corruption. For we know that they are baptized with the baptism of Christ's church, and not of the pope, in the name of the holy Trinity, according to the articles of the catholic faith, not according to errors, superstitions, and papistic impieties. Finally, we confess that today, the unworthiness of the minister cannot derogate anything from the service of God. In the same way, we also do not refuse the Lord's prayer, or the Apostles' Creed, or the canonical scriptures themselves, just because the Romish church also uses them. For she does not have them of herself, but she received them from the true church of God.

This is why we use them in common with her; it is not for the Romish church's sake, but because they came from the true church of Christ.

Beside those outward marks of the church which the true believers have common with hypocrites, there are certain inward marks that specially belong only to the godly; or if you prefer, call them bonds or proper gifts. These make the outward marks fruitful; and even without the outward marks (which may be absent by some necessity), they make men worthy or acceptable in the sight of God. For without these inward marks, no one can please God. In these, therefore, is found the true mark of God's children. And those are the fellowship of God's Spirit, a sincere faith, and double charity.¹ For by these the faithful, being the true and living members of Christ, are united and knit together, first to their head Christ, then to all the members of the ecclesiastical body. And the consideration of this chiefly belongs to the knowledge of the true church of God, which even though she suffers rotten members, yet she is not defiled by them through their outward conjunction; for with continual study, she labours by all means to keep herself undefiled to God.

And first of all, the evangelical and apostolic doctrine teaches us that Christ is joined to us by his Spirit, and that we are tied to him in mind or spirit by faith, that he may live in us and we in him. For the Lord cries out in the gospel, saying: "If any man thirsts, let him come to me and drink. He that believes in me, as the scripture says, 'shall have streams of living water flowing out of his belly.'" ^{Joh 7.37-38} To this saying, the evangelist then adds this: "But this he spoke concerning the Spirit, which those who believed in him would receive." ^{Joh 7.39} Again in his gospel, promising his Spirit to his disciples, yes, even to all his faithful who would abide with them forever, he says: "In that day you will know that I am in my Father, and you in me, and I in you;" ^{Joh 14.20} namely, by the Holy Ghost. John the apostle, expounding it, says, "By this we know that he dwells in us, by the Spirit that he gave to us;" ^{1Joh 3.24} and again: "By this we know that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he has given of his Spirit to us." ^{1Joh 4.13}

St. Paul, the vessel of election, does not differ from St. John, writing and saying to the Romans: "If any man does not have the Spirit of Christ, he is none of His." ^{Rom 8.9} And "whoever are led by the Spirit of God, they are the children of God." ^{Rom 8.14} Now, touching true faith, which ties us to the Lord, St. Paul says: "I live now; yet not I, but Christ lives in me. But the life which I now live in the flesh, I yet live through the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." ^{Gal 2.20} And again he says: "Christ dwells in our hearts through faith." ^{Eph 3.17} St. John the apostle says, again agreeing with these statements: "Whoever confesses that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, God dwells in him, and he in God." ^{1Joh 4.15} For the Lord himself, before that, said in the gospel: "He that eats my flesh, and drinks my blood, dwells in me, and I in him." ^{Joh 6.56} And whoever believes, eats Christ's flesh and drinks Christ's blood. Therefore, Christ our Lord is joined to us in spirit, and we are tied to him in mind and faith, like the body to the head. Therefore, those who lack this knot and bond, that is, who do not have the Spirit of Christ, nor true faith in Christ, are not the true and living members of Christ; the Lord himself witnessing to this in the gospel, says: "If a man does not abide not in me, he is cast out as a branch and withers; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they burn." ^{Joh 15.6} The apostle, imitating these words of our Saviour (as we just said) said: "He that has not the Spirit of Christ is none of his." ^{Rom 8.9} But those who are not destitute of the Spirit of Christ, are inflamed with the love of God. Nor do we separate love from faith — the same St. John, so teaching us, says: "God is love; and he that dwells in love dwells

in God, and God in him. For the Lord says in the gospel: "If a man loves me, he will keep my word; and my Father will love him, and we will come to him, and will dwell with him." ^{1Joh 4.16}

But although, properly speaking, faith joins us to our head Christ, yet the same faith also knits us to all Christ's members on earth. For though there is but one faith for them all, and therefore the same Spirit, there cannot help but be the same mouth, the same mind, and the same statements among them all. Although faith, now, is not understood only as a confidence in the mercy of God through Jesus Christ, but also as an outward confession of faith.

For by confessing one faith, and one and the self-same head, with one spirit and mouth, we profess together that we are all members of one and the self-same body. Nor is there anything else in the world that more unappeasably dissevers the minds of men, than the differences of faith or religion. And therefore, there is nothing that may more nearly join us together, than unity of faith.

We now come to speak of love, which I said joins together the members of the ecclesiastical body mutually among themselves. The Lord says in the gospel: "A new commandment give I to you, that you love one another; as I have loved you, that you also love one another. By this all men shall know that you are my disciples, if you have love one to another." ^{Joh 13.34-35} It is therefore beyond doubt that next after faith, the only mark of the church is love, a bond most firmly knitting together all the members. This grows from the communion of Christ and unity of the Spirit. For insomuch as Christ is the king, the head and high bishop, of the catholic church, enduing us all with one and the same Spirit, he has made us all his members. We are the sons of God, brethren and fellow-heirs, whom he undoubtedly loves tenderly. Every faithful man cannot choose but to embrace with fervent love, the members and fellow-heirs of their king, their head, and their high bishop. For John the apostle says: "Every one who loves him who begot, also loves him who is born of him." ^{1Joh 5.1} "If any man says, I love God, and hates his brother, he is a liar: for how can he that does not love his brother whom he has seen, love God whom he has not seen?" ^{1Joh 4.20} To the end that he might properly express this unity and agreement of the members before our eyes as it were, that we might view and behold it, Paul uses a parable taken from the members of a man's body. He says: "For just as we have many members in one body, and all the members do not have one function; so being many, we are one body in Christ, and every one, one another's members." ^{Rom 12.4-5} He speaks more largely and plainly in the twelfth chapter of first Corinthians, expounding the joining together of the heads and members, chiefly by the metaphor of the members of a man's body, publishing it very eloquently. He witnesses that, between the highest members of the church and the lowest members of the church, there is a very great and apt consent; and moreover, there is a diligent care and help that is both continual and most faithful.

From all of this, it appears that the marks of the true and living church of Christ are the communion of the Spirit of Christ, sincere faith, and Christian charity; without these things, no man is partaker of this spiritual body. By these things it will also be easy to judge whether you are in the fellowship of the church, or not.

Moreover, out of those things which we have argued up to here touching the marks of Christ's church, we gather her origin, and also how the church is planted, spread abroad, and preserved. Her origin is heavenly; for St. Paul, speaking of the church, says: "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all." ^{Gal 4.26} Therefore, he calls the church heavenly, not that it dwells altogether in heaven, but that, being here on earth, she has a heavenly beginning. For the children of God are not born of flesh and blood, but from heaven, by the renewing of the Holy Spirit, who through the preaching of God's word, plants faith in our hearts; by this faith we are made the true members of Christ and his church. For Peter says: "You are born anew, not of mortal seed, but of immortal, by the word of God, which lives and lasts forever." ^{1Pet 1.23} And Paul says: "I begat you in Christ Jesus through the gospel." ^{1Cor 4.15} And the same apostle says in an-other place: "Faith comes by hearing, and hearing comes by the word of God." ^{Rom 10.17}

Since therefore faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God, and that specially by the word of God, the church truly can by no means spring or be built by the decrees and doctrines of men. Therefore, we affirm that only the word of God is apt for building up the church of God. Men's doctrines set up men's churches, but Christ's word builds the Christian church. For the doctrines of men proceed from flesh and blood. But Peter, confessing Christ with a pure faith, and therefore grounded upon Christ who is the foundation of the church, heard these words of Christ himself: "Flesh and blood has not revealed these things to you, but my Father who is in heaven." ^{Mat 16.17} And therefore Paul says: "When it pleased God that I should preach his Son among the gentiles, I did not confer about the matter with flesh and blood," etc. ^{Gal 1.16}

Also, most manifestly abolishing all doctrines of men from setting up and building faith and the church, and commending only the word of God, he says to the Corinthians: "My words and preaching did not stand in the enticing speech of man's wisdom, but in plain evidence of the Spirit, and of power;¹ so that your faith would not be in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." ^{1Cor 2.4-5} To this now pertains these testimonies of Christ. "He that is of God hears God's word." ^{Joh 8.47} Again, "He that is of the truth will hear my voice." ^{Joh 18.37} And again, more plainly he says, "The sheep will follow the shepherd, because they know his voice. They will not follow a stranger, but will run away from him, because they do not know the voice of strangers." ^{Joh 10.4-5} But under the voice of strangers, we include all traditions and decrees of men differing from the doctrine of Christ. The apostle St. Paul attributes the shape of wisdom to these traditions, but the truth he denies them, and calls them superstitious. For our Lord himself in the gospel brings forth from the prophet Isaiah that immutable saying: "They worship me in vain, teaching for doctrines men's precepts." ^{Mat 15.9} Let us therefore hold that the true church is not built by man's decrees, but that she is founded, planted, gathered together, and built only by the word of Christ.

We add that it is beyond doubt that the church of God is preserved by the same word of God, lest at any time it be seduced, or slip and perish; and that it cannot at any time be preserved by any other means. Paul, again witnessing, says:

"Christ has given some to be apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, some pastors and teachers, for the gathering together of the saints, for the work of the ministry (that is to say, to teach and preach the word), and for the edification of the body of Christ; till we all fit together in the unity of faith, and knowledge of the Son of God, to a perfect man, and to the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ; that we no longer be children, wavering and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the deceit of men (mark, I beg, how men's doctrines are condemned again with great and inviolable authority), and with craftiness, by which they lie in wait to deceive.

But let us follow the truth in love, and in all things grow up into him who is the head, who is Christ; by whom the whole body, being coupled and knit together by every joint, for the equipping of it (according to the effectual power which is in the measure of every part), receives the increase of the body to edifying itself in love (increases the body to edifying itself through love.)" ^{Eph 4.11-16}

These words of the apostle are so plain, that they need no better exposition than they have of themselves.

5-1. THE FIRST SERMON: OF THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.

In this place also, the order and manner of the church by the preaching of God's word, should of right be set down, which many term and call "the ministry of the word," or of the church. But we will speak of that (God willing) in the third sermon. It will be sufficient here, to defend that our Lord God, having given doctors (teachers) to the church, founds, builds, maintains, and enlarges the church by his word — indeed, by his word only.

Two things now come to be considered.

First, the church of God, for the continual and constant study of the word of God, is called prophetic and apostolic, yes, and also orthodox. For it is called prophetic or apostolic, because it was first built by the travail of the prophets and apostles, and it is preserved by their doctrine even at this time, and shall be spread abroad by it, even to the end of the world. It is called orthodox, because it is sound of judgment, opinion, and faith. For without the church, there is no true faith, nor any perfect doctrine touching true virtue and felicity. The faith and doctrine of the church was revealed from God himself ¹ by Adam and the patriarchs, by Moses and the prophets, and by Christ and the apostles. For this reason, she is elsewhere called a mother, which we will speak of in the next sermon.

Secondly, the succession of doctors or pastors of the church proves nothing by itself, without the word of God. The champions and defenders of the papistic church boast that they have a most certain mark of the apostolic church, namely, in the continual succession of bishops coming from St. Peter by Clement the first, and so to Clement the seventh, and to Paul the third who died recently, and so continuing to Julius the third, not long ago created.² Moreover, they add that all those members are cut off, who separate themselves from that church in which only that apostolic succession is found. And we do not deny that the right succession of pastors in the primitive church was of great weight. For those who were then called pastors, were pastors indeed, and they executed the office of pastors. But what manner of pastors they have been for a great many years — the parade of cardinals, mitred bishops, and sophisters that have been called pastors ³ — none is ignorant, except those who are altogether without any understanding.

The prophet Zechariah heard these words spoken to him from the Lord: "Take for yourself the instruments of a foolish shepherd; for look, I will raise up a shepherd in the land, who will not look for the thing that is lost, nor seek the tender lambs, nor heal what is hurt, nor feed what stands up: but he will eat the flesh of the fat, and tear their hoofs in pieces. Woe to the idle ⁴ shepherd, who forsakes the flock," etc. ^{Zec 11.15-17} Therefore, these men who do not teach the word of God sincerely, nor execute the office and duty of pastors, prove nothing more by their continual succession of bishops, than if they were to set a company of idols before the eyes of the world. For who dares to deny that a great part, yes, the most part of the bishops of Rome, since Gregory the Great, were such idols, and such wolves and devourers, as those described by the prophet Zechariah? What then, I ask you, can the continual succession of such false pastors prove? Yes, and those of recent times, did they not fill almost the universal church with the traditions of men, and partly oppress the word of God, and partly persecute it? ⁵

5-1. THE FIRST SERMON: OF THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.

In the ancient church of the Israelites there was a continual order of succession of bishops, ¹ without any interruption of it, even from Aaron to Uriah ² who lived under Ahaz, and to other wicked bishops also falling from the word of God to the traditions of men, yes, and also idolatry. But for all that, this succession did not prove the idolatrous bishops, with the church that clung to them, to be the true bishops of God, and the true church of God. Truly, the true prophets of God, the sound and catholic fathers, preaching only the word of God without men's traditions, yes, clean against all traditions, were not able to reckon up any continual succession of their predecessor priests to whom they themselves should succeed. And yet, notwithstanding, they were most excellent lights, and worthy members of the church of God; and those who believed their doctrine were neither schismatics nor heretics, but even to this day are acknowledged to be the true church of Christ. When Christ our Lord, the blessed Son of God, taught here on earth, and gathered together his church, the succession of bishops was on his adversaries' part. But they were not, for that reason, rulers of the true church of God, and Christ of the heretical church. The apostles of our Lord could not allege for themselves and their doctrine an uninterrupted succession of bishops. For they were ordained by the Lord, who was himself called by God the High Priest forever, according to the new order of Melchizedek, ^{Heb 5-10} outside the succession of the order of Levi. ^{Heb 7.11} And yet the church that was gathered by them is acknowledged by all men to be the true and holy church. The apostles themselves would have no others accounted as their true fellows and successors, except those who walked upright in the doctrine and way of Christ; for notable and manifest is this saying of Paul: "Be the followers of me, even as I am of Christ." ^{1Cor 11.1} And though he speaks these words to all the faithful, and not only to the ministers of God's word, yet those he would chiefly have follow him, were the remainder of common Christians; that is to say, every man in his vocation and calling.

The same apostle, speaking at Miletum with the bishops of Asia, says among other things: "I know this, that after my departing, grievous wolves will enter in among you, not sparing the flock. Moreover, men will arise from among yourselves, speaking perverse things, to draw disciples after themselves." ^{Act 20.29-30} Paul the apostle fetches the wolves and devourers of the church, from no other place than the apostolic church itself — yes, out of the company or assembly of apostolic bishops and pastors. But could not these (do you think) allege the apostolic succession for themselves and for their most corrupt cause; that is, that they are descended from apostolic pastors? But because they have forsaken the truth, and fallen from the faith and doctrine of the apostles, the offspring and apostolic succession does nothing at all to help their case. Therefore, we conclude that the continual succession of bishops, by itself, proves nothing; rather, that which lacks the purity of the doctrine of the scriptures and of the apostles, is no lawful succession.

And therefore Tertullian, though greatly esteeming (worthily) the continual succession of pastors in the church, still requires them to be approved by the sincerity of their apostolic doctrine. And so he acknowledged that those churches which are instructed with pure doctrine, and yet have no succession of bishops, are apostolic churches. If any man requires the words of the author, they are these:

"But if there are any churches that dare presume to plant themselves in the very age of the apostles, so that they may therefore seem to have been planted by the apostles, because they were under the apostles, we may say this: Let them present the first beginning of their churches; let them turn over the order of succession of their bishops, so that by successions from the beginning, their first bishop is found to have had for his author and predecessor, one of the apostles and apostolic sort of men, and continued with the apostles. For by this means, the apostolic churches give their judgment: for example, the church of Smyrna testifies that they had Polycarp placed there by St. John; and the church of Rome shows that Clemens was appointed by St. Peter; and in like manner, others show for themselves, that they are offspring of apostolic seed, placed in their bishoprics by the apostles. Let heretics feign some such thing. For after their blasphemies, what is unlawful for them? But even if they do feign it, they shall not prevail.

For their own doctrine being compared with the doctrine of the apostles, the diversity and contrariety of it will show that it had neither apostle nor apostolic man for the author; because, as the apostles taught nothing that was contrary among themselves, even so, apostolic men set forth nothing contrary to the apostles. Only those who fell away from the apostles, taught other doctrine." ¹

Therefore, those churches may appeal in this manner, which even though they can present as their founder, none of the apostles or apostolic men (as those of a far later time are only now being erected daily) — yet, agreeing in one faith, they are nevertheless counted apostolic, for the likeness of their doctrine.

The self-same author, speaking of the ancient church of church of Rome, and gathering the sum of what it either taught or learned, said:

"Happy is that church to which the apostles have uttered all their doctrine with their blood: where Peter in suffering is made like the Lord; where Paul is crowned with the same end that John had; where the apostle John, after he was plunged in hot scalding oil, felt no pain, and was banished to the isle. Let us see what it learned, and what it taught, and how it agrees with the churches of Africa. It acknowledged one God, the maker of all things, and Jesus Christ the Son of God, the creator, born of the virgin Mary; and the resurrection of the flesh.

It joins the law and the prophets with the doctrine of the evangelists and apostles, and drinks from them that faith; baptizes with water, clothes with the Holy Ghost, feeds with the Lord's Supper, exhorts with martyrdom; and contrary to this institution, it receives no man. This is the institution." ² Thus far Tertullian in his book entitled, Of the Prescription of Heretics.

The last thing that is to be noted is this: that the Lord God, not only of old and up to this time, but also in these days, gives doctors and pastors to the church: doctors, I say, and not leaders ³ and captains of hosts and armies of men,⁴ not princes, not soldiers, not crafty men, using deceitful means which in these days they call "practices." For by no other means or manner, nor by any other instrument than by the doctrine of truth and sound and simple godliness,⁵ is that holy and catholic church of God built up, fenced, and preserved. At the beginning, simple men and Christ's apostles laid the foundation of it by preaching the gospel. Paul therefore removes all worldly wisdom, and says: "I was among you, Corinthians, in weakness, and in fear, and in much trembling; nor did my word and my preaching stand in the enticing speech of man's wisdom, but in plain evidence of the Spirit and of power; that your faith should not be in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." ^{1Cor 2.3-5}

The same apostle also banishes all crafty counsel with all sorts of deceit. When writing to the Thessalonians, he says: "Our exhortation was not by deceit, nor by uncleanness, nor by guile. But as we were allowed by God, that the gospel should be committed to us, even so we speak — not as those who please men, but God, who tries our hearts. Nor did we ever use flattering words, as you know; nor coloured covetousness, as God is our record; neither did we seek the praise of men," etc. ^{1Thes 2:3-6} Therefore, he is greatly deceived and mad, who thinks the church can either be gathered together, or once gathered, can be maintained and preserved with such practices, that is to say, with crafty counsels and subtle deceits of men. It is truly said among the common people, that "those things are overthrown by man's wisdom, which were first built by man's wisdom." Besides this, the Lord himself removes force and arms from the building of the church, since he forbids his disciples the use of the sword. And to Peter, ready to fight, he says, "Put your sword into the scabbard." Nor do we ever read that any were sent by the Lord as soldiers, who would bring the world in subjection with armed force; but rather the scripture witnesses that the great enemy of God, Antichrist, will be destroyed with the breath of God's mouth.

Therefore, there is no doubt that all those things which are read in various places of the prophets, and chiefly in the twelfth chapter of Zechariah, concerning wars that are to be made against all nations by the apostles and apostolic men, ought to be figuratively expounded. For the apostles, according to their manner, fight as apostles — not with the spear, sword, and bow of carnal warfare, but spiritually. The apostolic sword is the word of God. Yet in the mean time, no man denies that the weapons of carnal or corporal warfare have been profitable sometimes to apostolic men and to the church, and they do good even today. No man denies that God often uses the help of soldiers and magistrates in defending the church against the wicked, and tyrants. Indeed, all men will rather confess that a good and godly magistrate owes a duty toward the church of God. For it is not without great cause that the worthy prophet of God, Isaiah, calls "kings nursing fathers, and queens nursing mothers." ^{Isa 49:23}

Paul, being oppressed by the Jews in the temple of Jerusalem for preaching the gospel among the gentiles, is taken away and rescued by the army of Claudius Lysias, the Roman tribune. And not long after, no small company of soldiers was sent with the apostle by the same tribune, namely, a troop of horsemen and certain companies of footmen, by whom he was brought safely to Antipatris and Caesarea, before Felix the proconsul of Judea. This is remembered at large by Luke in the Acts of the Apostles, not rashly, and with great diligence. ^{Act 23:15f} The ecclesiastical history recites many examples of holy princes who have defended and succoured the church. But I have treated these things in some manner in another place, in the seventh and eighth sermons (as I remember) of the Second Decade. And we have spoken this far about the origin of the church of God, and of its increase and preservation.

It seems to me that the famous question, whether the church of God may err, may not unfitly be handled or briefly expounded at this point. So that it may more plainly be understood, I will briefly discuss the parts of this question. I have taught that the catholic church of God comprehends, first, the blessed spirits in heaven, and then all faithful Christians here on earth. I said that the wicked, or hypocrites, clung to them, feigning faith for a season. Now therefore, if we understand the church to be the blessed spirits in heaven, the church can never err. But if we understand that the wicked or hypocrites are joined and mingled with the good, and the wicked alone by themselves can do nothing else but err, then as they are joined to the good and faithful, and follow them, they either err, or do not err. For the church of the good and faithful here on earth errs, and does not err. We will declare this once we have weighed the diversities of errors, and gathered the number of them together in a whole bundle. Some errors are about doctrine and faith, and some are about life and manners: and what manner either one of them are, I think no man knows. Let us see then, whether the church of the faithful on earth errs or not; and if it errs, in what point or how far it errs. Concerning the manners and life of the church, it cannot wholly and clearly acquit itself from errors; that is to say, from sin.

For so long as it is living here on earth, it always prays heartily: "And forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us." And for his mercy's sake, God always purges all dregs and infirmities in his saints, as long as they live in this world, continually renewing and refining the elect. I am not ignorant what may hinder you, faithful hearer. If the church (you say) is not holy and pure, then how can the apostle call it holy, without spot and wrinkle? ^{Eph 5.27} I answer, If you acknowledge no church on earth except that which is altogether without blemish, you will be forced to acknowledge none at all. For there will never be any such church remaining on earth, where the most righteous God, as the scripture witnesses, "has shut up all things under sin, that he might have mercy on all men." ^{Gal 3.22} St. Paul therefore calls the church pure, without spot or wrinkle, through the benefit of Christ's sanctification. It is not that by herself, while she is in the flesh, the church is without spot; but that those spots, indeed otherwise clinging to her through the innocence of Christ, are not imputed to those who embrace Christ by faith. Finally, because the self-same church will be without spot or wrinkle in the world to come. For having put off the flesh and cast off all miseries, it will at length be brought to pass that she will lack nothing. Besides this, it is said that the church is without spot because of the continual study of the church, by which she labours and travails by all means, so that as far as possible, she may have as few spots as possible. And by that means, and chiefly by the benefit of imputation, the church does not err, but is most pure and without sin.¹

Moreover, as touching doctrine and faith the church of Christ does not err. For it hears the voice of the shepherd only, but the voice of strangers she knows not: for she follows her only shepherd Christ, saying: "I am the light of the world: he that follows me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." Paul also says to Timothy: "These things I have written to you up to here, that you may know how you ought to behave yourself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of truth." ^{1Tim 3.14-15}

But the church is the pillar and ground of truth for being established on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Christ himself. He is the everlasting truth of God and the only strength of the church. She receives this by fellowship which she has with him, so that she also might be the pillar and foundation of the truth. For the truth of God is in the church; and through the ministry of the church, that truth is spread abroad. And being assaulted and warred against by the enemies, but abiding sure, she is not overcome. So far as being made one body with Christ, she perseveres in the fellowship of Christ, without whom she can do nothing. Again, the same church errs in doctrine and faith as often as, turning from Christ and his word, she goes after men and the councils and decrees of the flesh; for she then forsakes the word of God and Christ, which is what stayed her up to here, so that she did not err. I think no man would deny that the great congregation of the people of Israel in the desert, was an excellent church of God, with which the Lord made a covenant, and to which He bound himself by sacraments and ordinances. And yet, how shamefully she erred while neglecting God's word. No man is ignorant that Aaron, the high priest of religion, not constantly and earnestly resisting, she made a molten calf, and worshipped it as a god.

Here, surely, it will also be necessary to look more diligently into, and mark the whole number of the church. For because many in the church err, it follows that no church is free from error. For in the church of Israel, the Lord reserved for himself a remnant who never worshipped the calf (I mean Moses, Joshua, and undoubtedly many more), both in that congregation and outside. Thus, there is no doubt that, even though many err in the church, the Lord preserves a certain number for himself through his mercy, who both rightly understand, and by whose faithful diligence, errors are destroyed — and the wandering flock of the Lord is brought back again into the holy fold.

The church is therefore said to err when a part of it errs, having lost God's word. And it does not err wholly and altogether, in as much as certain remnants (through the grace of God) are reserved, by whom the truth may again flourish, and again be spread abroad in every place. St. Paul called the churches of the Corinthians and Galatians "the holy churches of God." Yet they erred greatly in doctrine, faith, and practices. And yet, who doubts that there were many among them who were most sincere followers of the pure doctrine preached by St. Paul? That holy church erred, therefore, so far as it did not continue steadfastly in true doctrine. And it did not err, so far as it did not depart from the truth delivered by the apostles. From this it plainly appears to the whole world, that they are most vain liars who commend to us churches that are not built on the foundation of the prophets and apostles, but on the decrees of men. And they are not ashamed to commend these churches to us as most true churches which cannot err. Paul ¹ cries out: "Only God is true, and every man a liar." ² Jeremiah also cries: "They have rejected the word of the Lord, and what wisdom is in them?" ^{Jer 8.9} Therefore, such churches err, nor are they the true churches of God. The true church grounds itself upon Christ Jesus, and is governed by his word alone.

Similar to this treatise about the word of God — which is the only rule by which all things are done in the church — is the disputation about the power of the church of God on earth, and about its studies, which also are directed according to the word of God. But before I present my judgment, that is to say, the judgment delivered by the scriptures, I will briefly repeat the sum of those things which the papists have left in writing concerning this matter, and which they undoubtedly maintain as sound doctrine. John Gerson (who is not much amiss, unless he has an evil interpreter) has defined ecclesiastical authority to be "a power supernaturally and spiritually given by the Lord to his disciples and to their lawful successors, to the end of the world, for the edification of the church militant according to the laws of the gospel, for obtaining eternal felicity."

But cardinal Peter de Aliaco says that this authority is six-fold: namely, consecration; administering the sacraments; appointing ministers of the church; preaching; judicial correction; and receiving things necessary to this life. ⁴

They call the power of consecration, that by which a priest, being rightly ordered, may consecrate the body and blood of Christ on the altar. This power, they say, was given to the disciples of the Lord by these words: "Do this in remembrance of me." But the priests these days, think it is given by the bishop in giving the chalice with the bread, and saying: "Receive power to offer up and consecrate Christ's body, both for the quick and the dead." Moreover, they call it the POWER OF ORDERS, and say it is a mark or character that cannot be wiped out. The power of administering the sacraments, and chiefly the sacrament of penance, they call the POWER OF THE KEYS. They make out the keys to be of two sorts: the keys of knowledge — that is to say, the authority of knowledge in the cause of a sinner making his confession — and the keys of giving sentence and judgment, of opening and shutting heaven, or forgiving or retaining sins. They say that this power was promised to Peter in Matthew, where the Lord says, "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven." ^{Mat 16.19} But in John, that was given to all the disciples, Christ saying, "Whoever's sins you forgive, they are forgiven them." ^{Joh 20.23} These days it is given to the priests by the bishops, in their consecration, laying their hands on the priests at giving them their holy orders. ¹ They say, "Receive the Holy Ghost; whoever's sins you forgive, they are forgiven them." They call the power of placing ministers of the church ECCLESIASTICAL JURISDICTION, consisting in a certain prelacy; and the fulness of it rests only in the pope, having respect to the whole universal church.

For it belongs only to the pope to appoint rulers and prelates in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, because it was said to him, "Feed my sheep." Moreover, they say, all ecclesiastical jurisdiction comes from the pope to the inferior rulers, either mediately or immediately. ² Authority in these things is at the pleasure of the one who has the fulness of power; for a bishop has authority only in his diocese, and a curate only in his parish, etc. Power of apostleship or preaching the word of God, they call the AUTHORITY OF PREACHING, which the Lord had given to his disciples, saying: "Go into the whole world, preaching the gospel to all creatures." But doctors these days affirm that none should be sent to preach except by Peter, that is, by his successor, mediately or immediately, etc. They say that the power of JUDICIAL CORRECTION was given to Peter by God, to whom he said, "If your brother offends or trespasses against you," etc. for the words of the Lord are known well enough in St. Matthew, chap. 18.15-17. Thus, they say, God gave authority to priests not only to excommunicate, but also to determine, judge, and establish commandments, laws, and canons; because it is said in that passage, "Whatever you bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven." ^{Mat 18.18}

To conclude; they say that the power and authority to RECEIVE THINGS NECESSARY FOR THIS LIFE, in reward for their spiritual labours, was given by these words of the Lord: "Eating and drinking whatever they have." ^{Luk 10.7}

These men teach these things concerning ecclesiastical power, not only foolishly, but also falsely. We have often said in other places, how vain and foolish the power of consecration and sacrificing is; ³ and perhaps we will say more (if God grants life) in a convenient place and time. We will dispute about the power of the keys (God willing) at the end of the next sermon; and we brought something about it to bear when we disputed about penance and auricular confession.⁴ But these are foolish and shameless trifles which they babble of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, of the fulness of the high power — that is to say, the power of the bishop of Rome. I do not doubt these were known well enough to the whole world, long ago.

And some arguments about that matter will follow afterwards in our sermons, to confute it. Though they usurp for themselves the office of teaching, and cry that no man can lawfully preach except those who are ordained by them, they thereby seek the overthrow of God's word, and the defence and assertion of their own errors. This will also be treated in its due place. They have so filthily and shamefully abused the power of excommunicating, that the church (through their negligence and wicked presumption) has not only lost true discipline, but excommunication itself has been for a great many years, nothing else than fire and sword with the bishops of Rome — with which they widely raged against the true professors of God's word, and persecuted the innocent worshippers of Christ. Moreover, we will show in a convenient place, that there is no power given by God to the ministers of the church, to make new laws. The authority and power to receive things with which to live, they have executed to the uttermost: but in recompense for their temporal harvest, they have not sown spiritual things. Rather, being asleep, they have allowed our enemy to sow tares in the Lord's field, and that was not by any other means than their own. For not being contented with things that are necessary for this life, have they not under that colour, subtly invaded kingdoms, and most shamefully and cruelly possessed them? Therefore, if someone does not see that the ecclesiastical authority, as affirmed and put into practice by these men, is but a mere tyranny over simple souls, it is plain that he sees nothing at all.

We will now join to this a true, simple, plain, and manifest doctrine concerning ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Power is defined to be a right which men have to do something. It is called in Greek Ἐξουσία (Exousia), and Δυναμις (Dunamis): of which the first word signifies right and power; and the second signifies the ability to execute that power or authority. For it often comes to pass that a man has the authority to do a thing, but he is destitute of the ability to perform it. But God can do both; and has given them both to the apostles, against those who were possessed with devils, as Luke witnesses: ἔδωκεν αὐτοῖς δύναμις καὶ ἐξουσίαν (edooken autois dunamin kai exousian): "He gave them power and authority over all devils," etc. ^{Luk 9.1}

And there is also one sort of power, which is free and absolute; and another sort of power which is limited, which is also called ministerial. Absolute power is that which is altogether free, and is neither governed nor restrained by the law or the will of any other. Of this sort is the power of Christ, which he speaks of in the gospel, saying: "All power is given to me in heaven and on earth. Go therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them," etc. ^{Mat 28.18} Speaking again of this power, in the Revelation shown to St. John the apostle, He says: "Fear not; I am the first and the last; and I am alive, but was dead; and behold, I am alive forevermore. And I have the keys of hell and of death." ^{Rev 1.17-18} And again: "These things he says who is holy and true; who has the key of David, which opens and no man shuts, and shuts and no man opens." ^{Rev 3.7} The power which is limited is not free, but is subject to an absolute or greater power of another. It cannot of itself do everything, but only what the absolute power or greater authority allows to be done, and allows under certain conditions. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction is surely of this sort, and it may rightly be called ministerial power. For the church of God, by her ministers, uses the authority committed to her for this purpose.

St. Augustine says, acknowledging this distinction, and speaking of baptism in his fifth treatise on John:

"Paul baptized as a minister, but not as someone who had that power of himself; but the Lord baptized as the one who had the power of himself. Behold, if it had pleased him, he could have given this power to his servants, but he would not. For if he had given this power to his servants, so that what was the Lord's would also have been theirs, then there would have been as many sundry baptisms as servants," etc. ¹

In the church, Christ reserves that absolute power to himself; for he continues as the head, king, and bishop of the church forever. Nor is that head, who gives life, separated from his body at any time. But he has given limited power to the church.

To confer such power on the ministers of the church, would be to permit them to baptize in their own name. – WHG](#)

5-1. THE FIRST SERMON: OF THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.

The church should acknowledge this: namely, an ecclesiastical jurisdiction, hemmed in with certain laws, which proceeds from God. And it is effectual for that reason; and therefore, it should have chief regard to God in all things; and that ecclesiastical jurisdiction is given to the church for this purpose: that it might be put into practice for the profit of the church. For St. Paul says: "The Lord has given us power, with the intent we should edify, and not for the destruction of the church." ^{2Cor 10.8; 13.9} And therefore, that power which tends to the hindrance and destruction of the church, is a devilish tyranny, and not an ecclesiastical power proceeding from God. It behoves us to diligently mark and retain that this is the end of ecclesiastical power.

But the limited power of the church consists very near in these points: namely, in ordaining the ministers of the church, in doctrine, in discerning between doctrines, and finally, in the ordering of ecclesiastical matters. We will speak a little about every one of these points, in order — declaring what manner of authority the church has, and how far it is limited in every part of it.

The Lord himself appointed the chief doctors of the church, who were the apostles, so that all men might understand that the ecclesiastical ministry is the divine institution of God himself, and not a tradition devised by men. And therefore, after the Lord had ascended into heaven, St. Peter, calling the church together, speaks out of the scriptures, about placing another apostle in the place of the traitor Judas; by that very fact, he shows that power was given to the church, by God, to elect ministers or teachers. The same church, not long after, by the persuasion of Peter and the apostles (who undoubtedly persuaded by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost), chose seven deacons. The church of Antioch, being manifestly instructed by the Holy Ghost, ordains and sends Paul and Barnabas, even though they were assigned to the ministry long before that time. It is also read in the Acts of the Apostles, that by the commandment of the apostles, the churches ordained doctors for the holy ministry, as often as need required. And yet, notwithstanding, they did not ordain everyone without choice, but only those who were fit for that office.

That is to say, those whom they described afterward by express laws; namely, "If any man is faultless, the husband of one wife, watchful, sober," etc. ^{1Tim 3.2} The rule set down by the apostle is sufficiently known, as it appears in 1Timothy, chap. 3. But touching the ordaining of ministers (God willing), we will speak in the third sermon of this decade. But if the church has received power to appoint fit ministers for the church, I think no man will deny that the church has the authority to depose unworthy and wicked deceivers; and also to correct and amend those things which, being lacking, may seem necessary for this order.

And because ministers are chosen chiefly to teach, it must follow that the church has the power to teach, exhort, comfort, and the like, by her lawful ministers. And yet, she has no power to teach everything, except what she received, being delivered to her from the Lord by the doctrine of the prophets and apostles. "Teach them," says the Lord, "that which I commanded you." ^{Mat 28.20} "Go, and preach the gospel to all creatures." ^{Mat 28.19} And St. Paul says: "I have been set apart to preach the gospel of God, which he promised before by his prophets in the holy scriptures." ^{Rom 1.1-2} But this ministry and office of preaching is nothing else but the power of the keys which the church has received; the office (I say) of binding and loosing, of opening and shutting heaven. In another place, also, the apostles received power from the Lord over all — over all, I say — not absolutely, but over all devils, and not over all angels and men. And yet, that authority and power they received over devils, they did not receive it absolutely; for it is added that they should expel and cast them out. ^{Luk 9.1}

And therefore, they could not deal with devils according to their own fancy, but only and so far as He would have them do, who has absolute power over all devils — that they might cast devils out of men, but not send them into men, however much they might have desired it. And also, touching diseases, they could not do whatever they would. Otherwise Paul would not have left Trophimus sick at Miletum,^{2Tim 4.20} who might have been greatly profitable to him in the holy ministry. If they had been able to do whatever they would, the two disciples would have commanded fire from heaven to fall upon Samaria, and would have taken vengeance on the discourteous and barbarous people of Samaria, for they refused to harbour the Lord Christ. ^{Luk 9.54}

In like manner, the apostles received keys, that is to say, power to bind and to loose, to open and shut heaven, to forgive and to retain sins; but it was fitly limited. For they could not loose what was bound in hell, nor bind those who were living in heaven. For he did not say, whatever you bind in heaven, but "Whatever you bind on earth;" nor did he say, whatever you loose in hell, but "Whatever you loose on earth." Again, they were not able either to bind or loose whomever they would, not even those on earth. For they were not able to loose, that is to say, to pronounce a man free from sin, who was without faith. Again, they could not bind, that is to say, pronounce condemned, someone who was lightened with faith, and was truly penitent. And surely those who teach other doctrine than this, touching the power of the keys, deceive the whole world. We will more largely treat this in a convenient place. Likewise, the church has received power from Christ to administer the sacraments by ministers, but not according to the church's own will and pleasure, but only according to God's will and the form and manner set down by the Lord himself. The church cannot institute sacraments, nor alter the ends and use of the sacraments.

Finally, it appears that the church has power to give judgment about doctrines, as shown by this one sentence of the apostle Paul: "Let the prophets speak two or three at a time, and let the others judge." ^{1Cor 14.29} And in another place he says: "Prove all things, and keep what is good." ^{1The 5.21} And St. John says: "Dearly beloved, do not believe every spirit; but test the spirits, whether they are from God." ^{1Joh 4.1} But there is also a certain order to this kind of power to judge. For the church does not judge at her own pleasure, but according to the sentence of the Holy Ghost, and according to the order and rule of the holy scriptures. And here also order, moderation, and charity, are observed. Therefore, if at any time the church of God, according to that authority which she has received from the Lord, calls a council together for some weighty matter, as we read that the apostles of the Lord did in the Acts of the Apostles, she does not lean to her own fleshly judgment, but gives herself over to be guided by the Spirit, and examines all her doings by the rule of the word of God and by the twofold charity.¹

This is why the church makes no new laws. As the church of Jerusalem says, or rather the apostolic church: "It seems good both to the Holy Ghost and to the church, that no other burden should be laid upon" faithful Christians, but only a few and very necessary things, neither beside nor contrary to the holy scriptures. Now, ecclesiastical matters are of diverse sorts, the good ordering and well-disposing of them is in the power of the church, for the commodity of men. Of this sort, are those things which concern outward worship as to place and in time; such are prophesying, or the interpretation of tongues, and schools. Also, the church has to judge in causes of matrimony; and chiefly it has the correction of practices, admonitions, punishments, and also excommunicating, or cutting off from the body of the church. For the apostle also says that this power is given to him, and yet with the intent that he should edify with it, and not destroy. For all these things which we have remembered, and similar things, are limited with the rule of the word and of love, also with holy examples and reasons that may be deduced out of the holy scriptures. We will perhaps speak more largely about these things in their place.

I have said this much up to here concerning ecclesiastical power. I have also declared with how open a mouth our adversaries publish the contrary of it. Yet, they handle these matters so grossly, that it may appear even to children, what they seek or what they would defend; namely, not ecclesiastical power, but their own covetousness, lust, and tyranny. The canonical truth teaches us that Christ himself holds and exercises absolute or full power in the church; and that he has given ministerial power to the church, which executes it for the most part by ministers, and religiously executes it according to the rule of God's word.

These things being considered in this way, it will not be greatly laboursome to know the studies of the holy church of God. For it most carefully and faithfully executes that power which it has received from God (as I just said), to the end that it may serve God, that it may be holy, and that it may please Him.

And now I may reckon up some of her studies specially. First of all, it worships, calls upon, loves and serves one God in Trinity; and it takes nothing in hand, without first having consulted the word of this true God. For she ¹ orders all her doings according to the rule of God's word. She judges by the word of God. And by that same word, she frames all her buildings; and being built, she maintains them; and being fallen down, she repairs or restores them again. She fervently furthers and loves the assemblies and congregations of saints on earth. In these things, the church hearkens diligently to the preaching of the word of God. She partakes of the sacraments devoutly, and with great joy, and with a desire for heavenly things. The church prays to God by the intercession of our only mediator Christ, with a strong faith, fervently, continually, and most attentively. It praises the majesty of God forever, and with great joy gives thanks for all his heavenly benefits. It highly esteems all and every institution of Christ, nor does it neglect any of them. But chiefly it acknowledges that it receives all things belonging either to life, salvation, righteousness, or felicity, from the only Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ. He alone chose her, and then by his Spirit and blood, he sanctified her, and made her a church, that is, a chosen people, whose only king, redeemer, high priest, and defender he is, and without whom, there is no salvation. Therefore, she rests only in God alone by our Lord Jesus Christ; she desires and loves Him only; and for his sake she rejoices to lose all things that pertain to this world, yes, even to spend her blood and her life. And therefore, the church inseparably clings to Christ by faith; nor does it hate anything more bitterly than falling away from Christ, or separation. For without Christ, nothing in this whole life seems pleasant. With Satan, as with a deadly enemy, she has unappeasable enmity. It strives both constantly and wisely against heresies and errors. It most diligently keeps the simplicity of the Christian faith, and the sincerity of the doctrine of the apostles. As much as it lies in her, she keeps herself unspotted from the world and from the flesh, and from all carnal and spiritual infection.

And therefore, she flees from and by all means detests all unlawful congregations and profane religions, with all wicked men; and she willingly and openly confesses Christ both by word and deed, even with the damage of her life. The church is exercised with afflictions, yet never overcome. It keeps unity and concord carefully. She most tenderly loves all and every member of her body. It does good to all men, as much as power and ability will allow. It hurts no man. It forgives willingly. It bears with the weak brothers, till they are brought forth into perfection. She is not puffed up with pride, but through humility is kept in obedience, in modesty,² and in all the duties of godliness. But who (I ask you) is able to recite all and every one of the studies of the church ¹ in a very large discourse, much less in this short recital? And who would not desire to be a member of so divine and heavenly a congregation?

I would by and by join to this, that which remains touching the unity of the catholic church, of the division of it, and of other things belonging to the consideration of this, but I perceive that you, being already weary of hearing, earnestly look for an end to this sermon. There-fore, we will put off the residue till tomorrow. And now, lifting up our minds into heaven, let us give thanks to the Lord our God, who through his beloved Son has purified us and gathered us together, to be a chosen people for himself, and to be heirs of all his heavenly treasures. To him, therefore, be all praise and glory, world without end, Amen.

5-2. THE SECOND SERMON: THERE IS ONE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

THERE IS ONE CATHOLIC CHURCH: WITHOUT THE CHURCH THERE IS NO LIGHT OR SALVATION.

AGAINST SCHISMATICS. WHY WE DEPART FROM THE UPSTART CHURCH OF ROME.

THE CHURCH OF GOD IS THE HOUSE, VINEYARD, AND KINGDOM OF GOD; AND THE BODY, SHEEPFOLD, AND SPOUSE OF CHRIST; A MOTHER AND A VIRGIN.

I see you are assembled, brethren, with attentive minds to the exposition of those things which remain to be spoken about the catholic church of God; which we affirm to be one and unseparable, according to the holy oracles of the sacred scripture. Solomon in his Canticles says: "One is my dove and my beloved." ^{Sol 5.2} The doctor of the Gentiles doubtless had respect to this, when he said: "There is one body, and one spirit; even as you are called in one hope of your vocation. There is one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, which is above all, and through all, and in you all." ^{Eph 4.4-5} To these heavenly testimonies agree the testimonies of men. For Cyprian, the bishop and martyr, in his book De Simplicitate Clericorum, says:

"The church is one, which is spread further and further abroad by fertile increase: even as there are many beams of the sun and but one light, and many boughs of a tree, yet but one oak grounded on a steadfast root; and though many brooks issue out of one spring, though the number seem to be increased by the abundance of the store, yet is it but one spring at the head. Pluck a beam of the sun from the globe; that one beam, once separated, is void of light. Break a bough from the tree, and it can produce no fruit. Cut a brook off from the spring, and being cut off, it dries up. Even so, the church, enlightened with God's light, spreads abroad the beams of her light through the whole world; yet it is but one light which is spread everywhere, nor is the unity of the body separated. She extends her branches with plenteous increase throughout all the earth, she sends out her plentiful rivers all abroad; yet there is but one head, and one spring, and one mother, plentiful with fertile succession." ¹ And so forth.

Moreover, where we read that diverse names are given to the church, we must not imagine that there are many-churches in the world, nor is that body to be separated which can bear or suffer no kind of division. Writers call the church catholic, which undoubtedly signifies universal, because it is but one; nor can there be any more. For even if this is distinguished into the church triumphant and militant; into the church of the old fathers, and the congregation of people of the latter time; yet all these members remain perpetually knit together in one body under one head, Christ. And even as the several conditions of bond and freemen does not separate a kingdom or commonwealth into parts, neither does the quiet rest or felicity of the blessed spirits triumphing in heaven, and the labours and sorrows with which we still war in this world under Christ's ensigns, make two churches. The holy angel says to St. John in the Apocalypse: "I am your fellow-servant, and of your brethren the prophets." ^{Rev 22.9} He therefore acknowledges that both the prophets and the apostles are the sons and servants of one God. We read of this in the gospel, that only one vineyard was let out to husbandmen, not two or different ones, even though they were divers. Even so, there is but one church of the old fathers who lived before the coming of Christ, and ours, or the new people since Christ's coming, taken out of the Gentiles.

But in what they differ from us, or we from them, has been said in the eighth Sermon of our third Decade. Again, evil men and hypocrites are mingled with the holy church; but the church is not separated for evil men. For even as undiscovered traitors mingled with citizens do not make two commonwealths; so too, even though evil men cling to good ones, yet they are both gathered into one church. And when hypocrites depart from the unity of the church, the church is not torn in pieces, but it becomes purer. For St. Augustine excellently ¹ says that evil men or hypocrites in the church, are like chaff among wheat, cockle ² in standing corn, traitors in a city, and runagates ³ among soldiers. But it is plain, that wheat is the cleaner, standing corn the lustier, citizens the safer, and soldiers the stronger, when renegades, traitors, cockle and chaff, are separated from them. Yes, and unless rotten members of the church are sometimes cut off from the ecclesiastical body, the church cannot be in safety. And particular or several churches are like towns or cities in a kingdom: the multitude of cities does not divide a kingdom. Particular churches — dispersed throughout the whole world as with a body of many members — are gathered and compacted together in the catholic and universal church, which is the fellowship of all the saints. Therefore, it is most certain that there is only one church of God, not many, of which the only monarch is Jesus Christ; to whom be glory.

The unity and united society of this church of God is so great, that no people found outside of her fellowship are acceptable to God; nor is there any true salvation or safety, any light or truth; for no wholesome pastures are found outside the pale of God's church; all are infected with poison. No religion pleases God outside of the church of God. If in olden times any man had sacrificed to God in the high places, outside the tabernacle or temple, he was considered to have sacrificed to devils, and esteemed to have shed innocent blood. Therefore Cyprian, the blessed martyr and bishop of Carthage, rightly wrote this:

"Whoever, separated from the church, is joined to an adulterous church, is separated from the promises of the church. Nor does one who has left the church of Christ, retain Christ's merits. He is a stranger: he is unclean; he is an enemy.

He cannot now have God his father, if he does not have the church as his mother. If someone might escape who was outside the ark of Noah, he may also escape what is abroad outside the church. He must be a most wicked man, whoever he is, who leaves his own country and the fellowship of very good men, and falls in with the enemies." ⁴

Lactantius therefore most truly says: "It is only the catholic church that retains true religion. Here is the fountain of truth: this is the household of faith: this is the temple of God; into which if anyone does not enter, or out of which if anyone departs, he is excluded from the hope of salvation and life everlasting." ⁵ For our Saviour first said that life is not found outside of the sheepfold. ^{Joh 10.7-10}

Therefore, I cannot marvel enough at the corrupt and schismatic manners of certain men, who separate themselves for every light cause, from the most wholesome and pleasant company or society of the church. For these days you will find not a few captious ⁶ and ludicrous men, who for many years have had fellowship with no church, nor ever had fellowship with any; for they find some kind of fault in every man; it is only in themselves that they find nothing worthy of reprehension. Therefore, they conceive with themselves a wonderful fashion of the church, which unless they see it established somewhere, in that fashion which they themselves have devised,

But it seems to them they have just cause for schism. For they will not communicate ² with our church; it seems the doctrine of the ministers in the church is not yet sufficiently cleansed and polished for them, nor lofty (as they themselves term it, Hoch gnug gericht), subtle, and spiritual enough. Elsewhere they complain that diverse customs are used in our churches. Furthermore, they desire the rigour and severity of discipline; and finally, an exact pureness of life; for they fear they will be defiled with the unclean company of certain men. Because of the faults and vices of certain ministers, many either forsake or flee the congregation of the church. Today, the anabaptists are of this sort. ³ But there is as yet no sufficient cause alleged by these men, for which, of right, they should not either be joined to us, or for which they may be separated from us. We acknowledge that there are just causes for which the godly both may and should separate themselves from wicked congregations. These are ones in which not only the lawful use of the sacraments is altogether corrupted and turned into idolatry, but sound doctrine is altogether adulterated; their preachers or pastors are not prophets, but false prophets, who persecute God's truth; and finally, they minister poison to those who sit to receive the food of life. But they cannot object any of these things against us (God be thanked!).

For concerning doctrine, it consists partly in sure opinions, and those are numbered, firm, and immutable. Of this kind are the articles of faith, those which are without addition and corruption, lawfully and sincerely understood. And of that sort are also these principles: That all men are sinners, conceived and born in sin; That none but those who are regenerate can enter into the kingdom of God; That men are justified by faith, not by their own deserts, but through the grace of God, by the merits of Christ alone; That once sacrificed for sin, Christ is no more sacrificed; That he is the only and perpetual priest; That good works are done by those who are justified; and those are good works indeed, which the Lord has prepared for us to walk in; That the sacraments of the Lord and of the church are to be received, and not to be despised; That we must pray continually, and that is to be done in that manner which the Lord has appointed us; And any more of the same sort.

But it suffices if these and other similar grounds are uniformly, purely, and simply taught in the church according to the scriptures, though no rhetorical figures or painted eloquence should be heard. For the blessed martyr Irenaeus aptly says, according to the rule of faith set out in his first book against heresies, "Since there is but one faith only, the one who can say much about it, says no more than he should; nor can the one who says little about it, thereby diminish it." ⁴ Therefore, when the doctrine of ministers expounds those things in the church, which are agreeable to the true and sincere faith, and which also are not corrupted, then what do these captious smatterers of rhetoric and self-learned ¹ need to require, though eloquence and plentiful learning are lacking in the teachers? "Was not the doctrine of the apostles and prophets most simple and most free from all subtlety, so that it might rightly be said, the simpler it seemed, the safer it was? But in the meantime, I do not despise true eloquence (as a singular gift of God), as I have often witnessed elsewhere.

And partly, doctrine consists in the daily expounding of the scriptures, and in applying them to our time, place, and affairs. There has ever been great variety and diversity in that kind, for which, notwithstanding, no wise man ever yet separated himself from the fellowship of the church. For it comes to pass very often, that two or three, or even more, may expound the same passage not in one manner only, but in most diverse ways. One may expound it very darkly, and another more plainly; this man hits the mark, the other does not come near it; this man applies a passage very fitly, another does not have a similar simplicity of application — and yet, notwithstanding, he says nothing contrary to the soundness of faith and the love of God and of our neighbour; and he uses all things for edification. I say that, from this diversity, no man has just occasion to depart from the church. For all godly men prove all things, and keep what is good; and in all sermons and holy exercises, they refer their whole study only to edifying.

And moreover, the preachers agree well among themselves, and direct all things to this: that both themselves and their hearers may become better — not that they may seem more learned, nor to have uttered what no man saw before. And so, the most learned do not loathe sermons which are not so learned. For even if they do not seem to have altogether hit the mark, yet so far as they taught wholesome things, they are praised and not condemned (though in a fit time and place, they may sometimes be admonished in a friendly manner). Again, those who are unskilful do not envy the gifts of the learned, nor do they refuse to labour for more perfection; nor do they loathe or condemn the learned sermons of those who are better learned. Rather, they praise God, and being warned, they strive to more perfection. For St. Aurelius Augustine said wisely in his first book of Christian doctrine, the thirty-sixth chapter:

"Whoever seems to himself to have understood the holy scriptures or any part of them, and he does not gather from that understanding, the twofold love of God and of his neighbour, he understands nothing. But whoever gathers a sense of it that is profitable to him for the increase of love, and yet he does not gather that sense which was probably meant in that place, he is not perniciously deceived, nor does he lie at all." ²

And shortly after, he says:

"Notwithstanding, he is to be corrected and he must have it shown to him how much more profitable it would be for him not to leave the highway, lest by habitually straying, he is forced either to go cross-wise or crooked." ³

Therefore, where an ecclesiastical interpreter errs grossly, it is lawful for a better-learned brother to admonish him; but it is not lawful to make a schism. Those who lightly create a schism, are somewhat proud and arrogant, and swelled with envy; and therefore they are void of all charity and modesty. ⁴ They allow nothing but what they themselves produce, nor will they hold anything in common with others.

They are always musing about some higher matter, and nothing that is common or simple., The saying of the apostle Paul well applies to these men: "Knowledge puffs up, but love edifies." ^{1Cor 8.1} Therefore, godly teachers in the church, and also godly hearers, should not leave or forsake the fellowship of the church for doctrine which is not altogether foolish, even though it may be somewhat gross — so long as it is godly and tends to edification. Neither should they strive or contend about it, but rather use charity in all things.

If the ministers' lives are attached to grievous vices, and yet they are faithful in teaching, admonishing, exhorting, rebuking and comforting, and if they lawfully distribute the lawful sacraments, then no man has just occasion to forsake the church. The Lord expressly says in the gospel: "The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses' seat. Therefore, whatever they bid you to observe, observe and do that; but do not follow their works; for they say, and do not do." ^{Mat 23.2-3} Behold, the Lord says that they say, and do not do; therefore, the teachers' lives were not agreeable to their doctrine. Yet because they stood in Moses' seat — that is to say, because they taught the word of God lawfully and sincerely — he bids them to receive their sincere doctrine; but because their life is not agreeable to their doctrine, he bids them to refuse it. And therefore, the Lord forbids is to make a schism for the sake of the preachers' evil lives. He surely commands us to flee from false prophets; what makes a false prophet is not an evil life, but false doctrine. The holy father St. Augustine had a great conflict with the Donatists about this matter, who contended that the ministry has less power through the imperfection of the ministers: this case is to be considered in another way.

But now, what cause do they have to leave ¹ and forsake our churches, for the unlikeness or variety of ceremonies? In the baptism of children, they say, you do not observe one order: and so too in the celebration of the supper. Some sitting, take the bread of the Lord in their hands; some come and take it from the hands of the ministers, who also put it in the mouths of the receivers.

Some celebrate the communion often; some seldom, and only on set days. And you do not use one form of prayer. Nor do all your assemblies have one manner, nor do they meet at one time. How will we believe that the spirit of unity and peace is in you, in whom such great diversity is found? Therefore, we do not communicate with you for just causes. We will speak more fitly about these customs, in their proper place. But it is marvel that men who are not altogether rude and ignorant of ecclesiastical matters, bring no other arguments to defend their wicked schism. Are the poor wretches ignorant of how great a diversity there has always been in our ceremonies? Notwithstanding, unity always remained undivided in the catholic church. Socrates, the famous writer of the ecclesiastical history, in the fifth book of his history, twenty-second chapter, sets out at large the diversity of ceremonies in the church of God. Among other things he says: "No religion," he says, "keeps all ceremonies of one kind, even though it agrees in doctrine about them. For those who agree in faith, differ in ceremonies." And again: "It would be both laboursome and troublesome, indeed impossible, to describe all the ceremonies of all the churches in each city and region." ² The blessed martyr Irenaeus, writing to Victor, bishop of Rome, recites the great diversity of the churches in their fastings and keeping the feast of Easter; and then he adds:

"And yet notwithstanding all these, even when they varied in their observations, they were both peaceable among themselves and with us, and still are; nor does the disagreement about fasting break the agreement of faith." ³

And again:

"Blessed Polycarp when he came to Rome under Anicete,¹ and had some small controversy about certain other matters, they were later reconciled; but they did not contend a whit about this kind of matter.

For Anicetus could not persuade Polycarp that he should not observe those things which he had always observed with John, the disciple of our Lord, and with the rest of the apostles with whom he had been familiar. Nor did Polycarp persuade Anicetus not to keep that custom which he said he was to keep by the tradition of those elders to whom he succeeded. And, these matters thus standing, they had fellowship one with another." ²

Moreover, the ancient church used great liberty in the observation of ceremonies, yet always so as not to break the bond of unity. Yes, and St. Austin, prescribing to Januarius what he should either do or follow in this diversity of ceremonies, does not bid him to make a schism. But judging moderately and wisely, he says, "No rule in these things is better than a grave and wise Christian, who does what he sees every church do to which he comes by chance. For what is not contrary either to faith or good manners, is commanded to be considered indifferent, and is to be observed according to their society among whom we live." Again, lest under the pretence of this rule and counsel, anyone might force on every man whatever ceremonies he would, he adds: "The church of God, placed amidst much chaff and cockle, suffers many things; and yet, whatever is contrary either to faith or good life, she does not allow, nor does she hold her peace, nor does she do it." ³

Last of all, these men think that there is no true church where faulty manners are still to be seen, and they are in fear of being polluted unless either they do not come to the church, or else they quickly forsake it. They fall into the madness of the heretics called Catharoi, ⁴ who deceived with the false imagination of exact holiness, and using sharp cruelty, fled from those churches in which the fruits of the doctrine of the gospel did not plainly appear. We set against these, both the prophetic and apostolic churches; namely, the most holy churches. For Isaiah and Jeremiah, rebuking the manners of their time, greatly inveigh against the corruption of doctrine and manners; nor do they charge them with light and common faults, but heinous ones. Isaiah cries that "from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, there is no wholesome place;" ^{Isa 1.6} and yet he did not depart from the church, nor did he plant himself a new one,⁵ even though he kept himself very diligently from all ungodliness and corruption. How many faults — no, how many errors — were among the apostles of Christ themselves! "What, did our Lord depart from them? The church of Corinth was corrupted, not only in manners but also in doctrine. There were contentions in it, factions and brawlings, undoubtedly whoredom and breaking wedlock was common among them. What do you think of that: that many of them were present at profane sacrifices? Surely it was no small error that they esteemed baptism according to the worthiness of the minister. They had defiled the Lord's Supper with their private and prodigal banquets; yes, and they did not think rightly about the resurrection of the dead. ^{1Cor 15.12} But for that cause, did the apostle either depart from them himself, or command others to depart? Indeed, he rather calls them a holy church; ^{1Cor 3.17} and greatly rebuking their contentions, he exhorts all men to observe ⁶ the unity of the church in the sincerity of truth. It is not to be doubted, therefore, that those who abstain from the fellowship of our church, or rather the catholic church, greatly sin. Even though there is great corruption of life in it, yet the doctrine is sincere and the sacraments are purely ministered.

But these men object this: "You admit all men without exception to receiving the Lord's Supper — wicked men, drunkards, covetous men, soldiers, and those men with whom the holy apostle forbids us to eat common bread. This is how far off it is, from what he grants regarding those with whom we are to be partakers at the Lord's table. Therefore, unless we like to be defiled with the fellowship of the wicked, it is needful either not to join with this society, or else to flee from it altogether." But, if I live, I will speak of the Lord's Supper and receiving it, in another place that is apt for it. At this time, we bring only this against them: that Paul, the most faithful servant of Jesus Christ, was not sharper than his master. But it is manifest that Jesus admitted Judas to the holy table, whom he knew, as it is usually said, intus et in cute, that is to say, thoroughly within and without; and yet he did not put him aside. But surely he would have rejected him, if he had known the rest of his disciples would have been polluted by his company. Judas himself was polluted, for his mind and conscience were corrupt; but the rest of the apostles, whose minds were pure through perfect faith, could not be defiled by another man's treachery. Therefore, Paul the apostle says: "Let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup." He bids every man to prove himself, not to judge another man's servant, who stands to his Lord or falls. If you are endued with faith, and lawfully participate at the Lord's table, you are not defiled with another man's wickedness. Therefore, to avoid pollution, there is no reason why you should be separated from the church in which you see the bad mingled with the good to be partakers of the Lord's Supper. But if you are separate, you plainly declare yourself, being hardened with arrogance, to partake with those whom St. Augustine in his third book against Parmenian, the first chapter, paints with these proper and lively colours:

"They are evil children who, not for the hatred of other men's iniquities, but through the study of their own contentions, go about either to wholly allure or at least to divide the simple people, provoked with the bragging titles of their names, puffed up with pride, foolish with frowardness, subtle with slanders, troublesome with seditions. Lest they be detected to lack the light of truth, they pretend the shadow of sharp severity. And those things which are commanded in the holy scriptures for the correction of the faults of their brethren — saving the sincerity of love and keeping the unity of peace ^{Eph 4.2-3} — in which moderation should also be used, they usurp for the sacrilege of schism, and an occasion for cutting off."

The same author, among other things, reverently and wisely disputes in the two chapters following, giving this counsel to modest wits:

"They should quietly correct what they may; and what they cannot mend, they should patiently suffer and lovingly mourn, till God himself either amends it, or in the day of judgment, fans away the chaff."¹

Furthermore, concluding this place, I will recite to you the words of the blessed martyr Cyprian. In his third book, third epistle, he has written this:

"If cockle appears to be in the church, yet neither our faith nor our charity should be abated, such that we ourselves depart from the church because we see cockle in the church. We must rather labour to be good corn, so that when the corn is laid up in the Lord's barn, we may receive the fruit of our labour and travail. The apostle says in his epistle: 'But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood and of earth; some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour.' 2Tim 2.20

Let us endeavour and labour what we may, so that we may be a vessel either of gold or of silver: but only the Lord has liberty to break in pieces the earthen vessels, the one to whom also is given an iron rod. The servant cannot be greater than his Lord. Neither let any man think it is lawful for him to claim for himself, that which the Father has given only to his Son, that he might now be able to purge the floor, or fan the chaff, or by all the wit that man has, to separate all the chaff from the corn. This is a proud obstinacy and a wicked presumption, which lewd fury takes to himself. And while some men always take to themselves a further dominion than peaceable justice requires, they perish from the church: and while they proudly lift themselves up, blinded with their own presumption, they are bereft of the light of the truth." ¹

The Lord Jesus reduces the wandering sheep into the unity of the catholic church, and living in unity, he keeps and upholds them. Amen.

These adversaries of ours being overcome, there arise new and cruel enemies, that is to say, the defenders of the Roman monarchy and of the apostolic see, as they call it, and the most ancient church. For they cry until they are hoarse, that we are guilty of the same crime of which we condemned the anabaptists and certain other ludicrous fellows.

For they say that we, with wicked schism forced by no necessity, have forsaken the old Romish church, and have set up new and heretical synagogues for ourselves. And they allege that the holy scripture still has her authority in the church of Rome, that it is still read in all the churches,² and that they fetch their disputations out of it in all their schools — indeed, and also that the sacraments have their right place and use. And therefore, we are wicked schismatics, who without any necessary cause, have departed from the catholic church, most of all, for the faults of some of the clergy and of the bishops. I must therefore digress a little, and contend with these defenders of the popish church, and show that we never departed from the catholic church of Christ.

And because in this matter it chiefly behoves us to know who is truly said to be a heretic or who is a schismatic, I will first of all say these few words about these matters. St. Augustine thinks that there is this difference between a heretic and a schismatic: a heretic corrupts the sincerity of faith and the doctrine of the apostles with his wicked doctrine; and a schismatic, although he does not sin at all against pure doctrine and sincere faith, yet he rashly separates himself from the church, breaking the bond of unity.³ And surely, someone is properly a heretic, whoever he may be, that contrary to the scripture, which is the word of God, against the articles of faith, or against the sound opinions of the church which are grounded on the word of God, through hope of some temporal commodity, of his own brain and fleshly choice — chooses, receives, teaches, and follows strange things; and stiffly retaining these, he both defends them and spreads them abroad. By the imperial edict of Augustus Caesar Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius,⁴ catholics or Christians are defined to be those who continue in that religion which St. Peter taught the church of Rome, and which blessed Damasus and St. Peter, bishop of Alexandria, taught. That is to say, those who confess — according to the teaching ¹ of the apostles and the doctrine of the gospel — the only Godhead of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, in equal majesty and in a holy Trinity.

And again, those are declared by them to be heretics, who follow contrary opinions, whom they account both mad and infamous and worthy of punishment.² And he is a schismatic, whoever he may be, that separates himself from the unity of the true church of God, and either gathers together new assemblies, or joins himself to congregations gathered by others, even if he errs little or not at all in doctrine. And I think no man can either desire or challenge anything in these descriptions.

And therefore, the defenders of the Romish monarchy greatly offend against us, evermore having in their mouths against us, the most heinous crimes of heresy and schism. For we teach nothing against the sincerity and truth of the holy scriptures, nor against the articles of faith, nor against the opinions of the catholic church, which are sound and established by the canonical scriptures. If we wanted to seek earthly commodity, we would surely have continued in the popish doctrine, in which all things are gainful; but because we have received the doctrine of Christ, we are open to every man's reproach. We were not ignorant of this when we departed from the doctrine of the pope. Therefore, it is not for any hope of temporal commodity that we embrace the doctrine of Christ; nor do we affirm anything presumptuously ³ — for if any man can teach us any better out of God's word, we will not refuse to embrace what is better. And moreover, with open voice and with all our hearts, we condemn all heresies and heretics, whoever they may be, which the ancient church, either in general councils or outside of councils, has killed with the sword of God's word. But we strive against the false doctrine of the pope, his new decrees which fight against the word of God, and against the most filthy abuses and corruptions in the church. The bishops of Rome, with their conspirators, have taken to themselves a tyranny over the church, playing the part of veritable antichrists in the temple of God.

We therefore flee and refuse their tyranny and anti-Christianism — we do not refuse Christ and his yoke; we do not flee the fellowship of saints. Indeed, rather to the end that we may remain in that society, and become the true members of Christ and of his saints, we have fled from the popish church, and have gathered together again into one holy catholic and apostolic church. We acknowledge this church to be the very house of God, and the proper sheepfold of Christ our Lord, of which he is the shepherd.

For we freely confess, and with great joy, giving thanks to God who has delivered us, we publish abroad that we have departed from the Romish church, and that at this day, we also abhor that church. But first of all, we distinguish and differentiate between the old church of Rome, and the recent upstart church. For at one time there was a holy and faithful church at Rome, which apostolic men and the apostles of Christ themselves established and preserved by the word of God. This ancient church was not only without the ceremonies used and received there today, but if she had but seen them, she would surely have cursed them. That ancient church lacked the decrees upon which the church of Rome today altogether stays herself; she was ignorant of that monarchy and all that stately court. Therefore, we never departed, nor will we ever depart, from that ancient and apostolic church of Rome. We acknowledge, moreover, all who are at Rome today, who worship Christ and keep themselves from all popish pollution, as our beloved brethren — we do not doubt that Rome has a great many of this sort. Finally, we do not acknowledge as the true church of Christ, that upstart church of Rome which acknowledges and worships the pope as Christ's vicar on earth, and is obedient to his laws. Therefore, we cannot be schismatics who, leaving the church of Rome, have not departed from the true church of God.

For the holy catholic church clings to her only shepherd Christ, believes his word, and lives holily. But you will find that all things are quite contrary in the church of Rome, so that it cannot come within the compass either of the outward and visible church, nor of the inward and invisible church of God.

The godly bear with many things in the church, that is to say, in the members of the church, and in the ministers (as I recently showed when I spoke against schismatics). But in that upstart church of Rome, you will not find small and tolerable faults, either of doctrine or of life or of errors: for all these faults in her are heinous, desperate, and abominable. What manner of charity would it be, therefore, that could hope for better from the most untoward and lamentable things? Hypocrites and evil men are accounted to be part of the outward and visible church of God, and are suffered in it. But these Romanists are neither evil men nor hypocrites; rather, they are the very worst and most cruel enemies of Christ's truth, openly blaspheming the gospel, and persecuting those who believe in Christ. And therefore, they have neither the outward nor the inward marks of the church. The Spirit of the Lord rests upon those who tremble at the word of God. Isa 66.5 But these men fret and fume if any man unfeignedly reverences the word of God. True faith attributes only to Christ, all the means by which it comes to everlasting life. These men persecute the faithful, because they attribute to Christ Jesus alone, all the means by which they attain everlasting life, and will not part stakes in the means of salvation, with popish fancies. Instead of charity, they exercise cruelty against their brethren and against their neighbours. What should a man say about those who abuse the public goods of the church, and spend them according to their own private lusts? For that which the faithful from olden times, have given by charity for the use of the church, and to sustain the poor, these men have wasted, living most lecherously and filthily upon it. Concerning these things, the elect apostles of the Lord, Peter and Thaddeus, foretold the church of God. 2Pet 2.1-3; Jude

And touching the outward marks of the church, what shall I say? These men say that the canonical scripture has authority in the church of Rome, and that the same word is read both in their churches and in their schools, and that the sacraments have force and are effectual among them. But I can show the contrary. First of all, they will subject the interpretation of the holy and sacred scriptures to their see; and they give the right of judgment in all cases to their idol, the pope of Rome.

For every man knows this canon: "Whatever [the pope] decrees, whatever he establishes, is to be observed by all men forever, inviolably." ¹ And again: "The whole church throughout the universal world knows that the holy church of Rome has authority to give judgment about all things; nor is it lawful for anyone to give judgment about her judgments." ² Therefore, she also judges the scriptures and expounds them, and turns and winds them whichever way she inclines. I will not now recite how, by manifest words, the standard-bearers of that see write that the canonical scripture takes her authority from the church,³ abusing this sentence of the ancient father St. Augustine, "I would not have believed the gospel, if the authority of the holy church had not moved me," etc. ¹ I will affirm this, which can only be manifest to all men, that the Romish church, or the rulers of that church, take away the natural sense and true meaning of the holy scriptures, and have set down a strange sense in its place. To the end it may be better liked by men, they call this sense the sense of the holy mother the church; they also urge this sense with such great wickedness, that if you set against it the native sense, you will receive for your labour, the reproachful name of a heretic. To put it in a few words: unless you bring out the whole scripture twisted according to their mind and gain, that is to say, tempered with their devilish decrees as with poison, it will be said that you have not brought out the holy scriptures, but that you have taught heresy. The matter will be made plainer by examples. The scripture teaches that Jesus Christ is the only head of the church: Col 1.18 but unless you also join the pope as the head of the church militant on earth, you will be called a heretic.

The scripture teaches that Jesus Christ is the only intercessor or mediator, priest, and only propitiatory sacrifice of the faithful. But they say, unless you join to this, that Christ is indeed the mediator of redemption, but that the saints together with Christ are the mediators of intercession, and that the priests daily offer an unbloody sacrifice, so that the saints may be acknowledged as intercessors together with Christ in heaven, and that the priests on earth daily offer in their mass a sacrifice for the quick and for the dead, you will be called a heretic. The scripture teaches that Jesus Christ is the righteousness of the faithful, and that we receive this righteousness by faith. But they say, unless you part stakes between this righteousness of Christ and works or men's merits, you will be called a heretic. The scripture teaches that Christ ascended into heaven, and has established ² a vicegerent power, namely, the Holy Ghost; and also that he will not come again into the world bodily, but only at the day of judgment. But they say, unless you acknowledge the same Christ to be corporally present in the bread of the sacrament, and also worship him there, you will be called a heretic. Christ our Lord said at his last supper, extending the cup to his disciples, "Drink you all of this;" but if you contend that both kinds of the sacrament should be given to all the faithful, you will be called a heretic. God said in his law, you shall not make an image, you shall not worship it, you shall not serve it. But they say, unless you understand an image to mean the idols of the gentiles, such as Saturn or Mercury, but not an image of the true God or any saint, you will be called a heretic.

I could bring forth many more things of this sort, if I were speaking to those who are ignorant. What authority therefore, or what place, would we say the word of God had in that see of Rome? Who does not see that these filthy beasts tread underfoot as a captive, the most holy word of God; that they establish and re-establish laws of God according to their own giant-like boldness? It is therefore as clear as anything may be clear, that the Romish church is destitute of the holy word of God. I have shown plainly in the first sermon of this decade,³ that it is not enough to boast of the words of the holy scripture, unless along with that, the natural sense is retained uncorrupted.

The church of Rome has corrupted the sense and meaning of the holy scriptures, and thrust upon the simple people, opinions that are contrary to the scriptures: and therefore, the church of Rome is not the true church of Christ.

We do not reiterate the sacrament of baptism ministered by popish priests, for they baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost (as I have shown in the first sermon of this decade ¹). Yet, as to the breaking of bread, or distribution of the Lord's Supper, they have so defiled and corrupted it with doctrines contrary to the sound faith, and turned it into such a filthy merchandise, that no man of sound judgment can, with a safe conscience and without corruption of his religion, communicate ² with them. I will say nothing at this time about the most filthy life and wicked manners of the priests of the Romish church. For I do not doubt that it already appears to those who are not willfully blind,³ that the see of Rome does not have the outward marks of the true church of God, joined with the pure word of God,⁴ and sound preaching of the gospel. It lacks (I say) a heavenly ministry, and lawful ministers of the church, and also the wholesome use of the Lord's Supper. And therefore, it is not the true church of God from which no man may depart without being guilty of schism.

By this means, someone will say, Christ will have no church left in the earth; for those who are the governors of the church, if they err and corrupt and forsake the word of God, what hope (I ask you) remains for the church? Or where the marks of the church do not appear, where (I pray you) is the church? I answer that Almighty God — in such calamities of the church, in which the governors fall away from the word and the true worship of God, and embrace and introduce new laws and new ordinances into the church, the true outward marks of the church being for a time either darkened or fallen out of use — notwithstanding these, God reserves for himself a church on the earth. This church He also furnishes ⁵ and repairs with true teachers whom he sends into it, even though they are not acknowledged as true ministers and teachers of God's church by those who would seem to be the true and ordinary governors of the church; rather, they are condemned as seditious disturbers of the church, and execrable heretics.

The matter will be made more manifest by examples taken out of the scriptures. In the time of Ahaz king of Judah (Uriah the high priest winking at it, and the princes of the land and priests not resisting it) the king shut up the temple of the Lord, and took away the holy altar. The scripture expressly witnesses to this. And therefore, both the ministry of the word and the lawful or ordinary ministration of the sacraments ceased. Yet, notwithstanding, there was a holy church in the kingdom of Judah, in which extraordinarily (if I may say so), no man doubts the prophet Isaiah with certain others preached. Under Manasseh, the nephew ⁶ of king Ahaz, true doctrine and administration of the sacraments was banished, except for circumcision. And that falling away continued until the church was reformed by that most godly king Josiah. And yet, prophets were sent in the meantime, and God had his church in Judah, even though most people, along with their governors, both followed and defended the wickedness and defection of Manasseh.

In the kingdom of Israel, king Jeroboam thrust from their offices, the teachers and preachers of the law of the Lord and of the sound truth. And in their place, he gave the people profane and unlearned priests and rulers; and moreover, he built new temples, yes, and those were cathedral churches; and he set up new idols or calves, a new religion, new altars, and new feasts; and by this means, he abrogated the true religion of God to the end that no outward marks of the church of God might appear in Israel at all. And yet, there is no doubt that God had a notable church in Israel, for which from time to time God sent his prophets for the preservation and repairing of it, even though they were not acknowledged to be the true prophets of God, at the hands of the false church and of the false prophets. Under Jeroboam, the second of that name, Amos the prophet, a shepherd or neatherd of Tekoa, taught and preached the true word of God.

But he heard from Amaziah, the high priest of the kingdom, "Get here quickly, and go into the land of Judah, and prophesy or preach there; but prophesy no more at Bethel, for it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court." Furthermore, when Ahab had surpassed all the kings before him in wickedness, and moreover added the abominable religion of Baal to the ungodliness and falling away of Jeroboam, ^{1Kng 12.27-33} he filled the whole kingdom of Israel with superstitions, idolatries, enchantments, and sacrileges — yes, and most cruelly persecuted the pure word ¹ of God in his prophets — there was yet found in Israel a most famous church of God. Elijah, that great and most excellent prophet of God — because of that horrible falling away from God, and the loathsomeness of that most miserable people, in whom there appeared not one token of the true church of God — fled into the wilderness, and hid himself in the corners. And being asked by the Lord, what he was doing there, he answered: "I have been very jealous for the God of hosts; for the children of Israel have forsaken your covenant, cast down your altars, and slain your prophets with the sword; and only I am left, and they seek my life, to take it away." ^{1Kng 19.10} But immediately he is sent back into the land of Israel from which he had fled; and moreover, he heard these words: "I have left myself seven thousand men in Israel, who have neither bowed their knees to Baal, nor kissed him." ^{1Kng 19.18} Behold, this mighty prophet thought that only he himself had been left of all the number of the faithful in Israel: but he heard that God had reserved seven thousand holy men who had not bowed their knees; that is to say, who had never served Baal so much as with outward reverence. But who does not know that the prophet understood by the number "seven," an exceedingly great number of the true servants of God, who undoubtedly were not circumcised into the covenant of Baal, but into the covenant of the eternal God? These men did not lack faith. And therefore, they were not without doctrine, though it was not so common, nor did it seem to the Baalites to be either ordinary or catholic. But undoubtedly, they wanted the use of the sacrifices. For seeing that they were not lawfully offered, they would not partake of those which were unlawful; but meanwhile, they were not destitute of the things which were signified by the outward signs or sacraments, being partakers through faith, of all the gifts of God.

In the same way, the bishop of Rome, in the manner of king Jeroboam, has forsaken the sound preaching of the gospel, and corrupted the first and simple institution of the Lord's Supper, and depraved and twisted to his own profit, other commandments ² of God. And he has placed himself in the throne or temple of God, or in the church of God, bragging that he is a God on earth. Surely then, the church of God, oppressed with grievous tyranny, could hardly be discerned by outward marks. For instead of the sincere preaching of the gospel, a certain kind of doctrine was set forth, mixed and corrupted with men's decrees; and instead of the Lord's Supper, the popish mass was celebrated; and instead of other ordinances of God, a high heap of foolish and superstitious ceremonies came in, to which a great number of men yielded, making themselves subject to the see of Rome. In the meantime, notwithstanding, the church of God was not utterly extinguished throughout the whole world, nor was the holy ministry of the word of God and the true worship of God utterly decayed among all men. For not a few men were found spread abroad in every place, who neither allowed the pope and his conspirators, nor his corruption in matters of the church. But they worshipped the Lord Christ, whom they acknowledged to be the only author of salvation; and therefore, they kept themselves free from popish filthiness. And God also sent in almost every age since the beginning of popedom, men who were grave, godly, and learned, who grievously accused the pope's kingdom and tyranny (even as the prophets of old, in the days of Jeroboam, accused that idolatrous corruption), constantly requiring the reformation of the church from popish corruptions — and also teaching the true doctrine of salvation, and the true use of the sacraments. Even though a pure reformation could not be obtained because of antichrist's tyranny, a continual study of purity was found, and a godly desire for the lawful use of the sacraments.

As I just said, this was found in the elect members of the true church of God even in the days of Jeroboam, Ahab, Manasseh, and in the time of the captivity of Babylon. But even as in those times, the true prophets of God were not acknowledged as true prophets by the priests of Baal, but were condemned as schismatics and heretics; even so in certain ages past, the bishops of Rome along with their conspirators, excommunicated and persecuted godly and learned men who preached the word of God and called for the reformation of the church. They put many of them to death with fire and sword. Our Lord and Master himself, with the prophets and apostles, foreshowed that this would come to pass.

Moreover, God could undoubtedly reserve to himself a mighty church even under the papism; even as we have no doubt that he has reserved a great many under Mohammedanism: for who would think that no members of the church of God remain in all of Asia and Africa? Could not our merciful God with his mighty power, in that last calamity and ruin of God's church, reserve again (as he once did) seven thousand men, none of whom had ever worshipped the beast or received his mark? What has been done in Turkey, or what is being done today, let those declare who can do it best and most rightly. No man can deny what has been done among us in these last ages. Through the great goodness of God, we see it has come to pass that even as circumcision, the sign of God's covenant of old, was given to the people of God even in the midst of falling from God; so also today, in the greatest darkness of antichrist, most holy baptism was given to the Christians to be a seal of the forgiveness of sins and inheritance of the children of God. Surely the pureness of doctrine was profaned with infinitely gross traditions by the pope's sworn friends; and yet, in the meantime, it was not altogether abolished. For — not repeating anything which I have said about godly and learned men sent by God, crying for reformation of the church, and greatly profiting with the children of God — was it not received with certain universal consent, as most certain and undoubted, that in the decalogue, or Ten Commandments, a short and most absolute sum of all the commandments of God was set down?

And that in the Lord's prayer, a most ample form of prayer to God was taught to us? And that the Apostles' Creed contained a most perfect rule of faith, or that which was to be believed? Surely the custom was to recite the creed to almost everyone departing out of this world, and at their last gasp, as a most perfect rule of that faith which brings salvation.¹ Nor do we doubt that the merciful God and Father of mercies (who granted to save the thief on the cross even at giving up his life) had mercy on those who were oppressed with the tyranny of antichrist. And through His unmeasurable grace, he touched the hearts of men, both living and ready to die, and taught them by his Holy Spirit. He has sanctified those who confess ² one God the Father and Maker of all things, and one Jesus Christ the Son of God, redeemer of the world, who suffered and rose again, and one Holy Ghost, and finally the holy catholic church, forgiving them all their sins. And he has translated the souls of such faithful men into life everlasting (as they believed); we believe our flesh (being raised again) will also be carried into this place at the end of the world. Therefore, they have their answer here also, who ask whether all our elders who died before these last times in which the gospel is revealed, are damned? Therefore, let those who are alive rather look to this, lest for their contempt of the word of God and their contentions raised against the word of God, they come to a worse end than their forefathers. Therefore, though we do not acknowledge the popish church to be the true church, yet it does not follow from this that there neither is nor was any church of God in the earth. For we say that the true church of God is that which believes in Christ and does not forsake his word, which we have plentifully enough described. We know moreover that we ourselves, who today believe in Christ, are the true church of Christ our Lord. For as we cling by faith to our only head Christ, and to all the members of the catholic church, so we are not destitute of the true marks of the true church of God.

But they say, we do not read that under the bishops, priests, and kings of the church of the Jews, either the prophets (i.e., the guides of the faithful), or the faithful themselves, departed from the high priest, from the king, and from their universal church, and ordained for themselves new particular sacrifices, as you do today. For, departing from the bishop of Rome, from kings and governors, and from the universal church, you congregate for yourselves a church far unlike the universal church, both in preaching and ministering the sacraments. To this I answer that the old fathers, before the coming of our master Christ, for a certain prescribed cause, did not seek places in which to offer new sacrifices, though the temple was abused ¹ and defiled with idolatry. For it was unlawful to offer sacrifice outside the bounds of the temple, as seen in the seventeen chapter of Leviticus and the twelfth chapter of Deuteronomy. Nor was there any other reason why the people offered no sacrifices, being kept in bondage for the span of seventy years in the captivity of Babylon. Yet notwithstanding, it is most certain that both the prophets of God, and the holy and true worshippers of God, separated themselves from the worship and sacrifices used there, being contrary to the word of God.

Surely we read in all the sermons of the prophets, that both those sacrifices and that church were condemned. For this cause, they themselves were also condemned by the high priest and other priests of Baal, as most abominable heretics and schismatics; even as now-a-days we too are thrust through with the darts of your curses, for we will not communicate with the popish church and her holy service, and we reject their holy service itself. To this it may be added that the sacrifices of the law now being fulfilled and abrogated by the Lord,² the apostles with manifest defection, departed not only from the high priests and the church of Jerusalem, but moreover, they gathered to Christ a new church by the preaching of the gospel and the badge of the sacraments. We have described this church in the Acts of the Apostles; and all churches should of right be reformed according to its pattern, even as many as would be called apostolic churches.

Therefore, how have we offended now-a-days, by reforming churches in the likeness of the apostolic church? For those churches were of old profaned by that see of Rome and its members. We read that the church of God, before the coming of Christ in the flesh, was often defiled with filthy pollutions of corrupt men, and that it was purged again and renewed in the likeness of the old church, according to the word of God. And why should we not take the same course in our own age, in the very same cause?

Moreover, there remain prophecies of our Saviour Christ and of the holy apostles and prophets, lively depicting this grievous oppression of the church of Christ under the fury of antichrist's tyranny, in this our last age. There remain most weighty commandments, to flee from anti-Christ, from idolatry and false prophets. For the Lord says in St. Matthew's gospel: "There shall arise false

Christs, and false prophets, and they will show great signs and wonders; so that, if it were possible, they would deceive the very elect. Behold, I have told you beforehand. Therefore, if they say to you, Behold, he is in the desert, do not go; if they say behold, he is in the secret places, do not believe it." ^{Mat 24.24-26} And again: "Beware of false prophets who come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravaging wolves." ^{Mat 7.15} Also: "Can the blind lead the blind? shall they not both fall into the ditch?" ^{Mat 15.14} St. Peter also says very gravely: "Save yourselves from this froward generation." ^{Act 2.40} And also in his second and third chapters of his second Epistle, he treats this matter largely. And also St. Paul, agreeing in all things with the holy gospel and with St. Peter, depicting antichrist and those last times of antichrist and corrupt men, not just lights but firebrands of the church, commands the saints to depart from them, and to gather themselves together unto Christ and his sincere truth. If any man asks for the places, he will find them here: 2Thess. 2; 1Tim 4; 1Cor 10; 2Tim 3 and 4. The same apostle says in another place, even as the apostle John say: "Flee from idolatry." ^{1Cor 10.14} And in the sixth chapter of second Corinthians, by express words and most manifest opposition, he shows that there can be no agreement between Christ and Belial, light and darkness, and between idols and the temple of God. ^{2Cor 6.14-15}

And thus he adds shortly after: "Therefore, come out from among them, and separate yourselves (says the Lord), and touch no unclean thing, and I will receive you." ^{2Cor 6.17} To this pertains what the blessed apostle John in his Revelation was shown by the Lord Christ. Seeing the works of Babylon, he also hears with it a voice coming from heaven, commanding this: "Go out of her, my people, that you not partake of her sins, and that you do not receive her plagues." ^{Rev 18.4} The same apostle often threatens everlasting destruction to those who worship the beast, but life and glory to those who forsake and flee from the beast, so that they cling only to the only Saviour of the world, Jesus Christ. Therefore, that departure of ours from the see or church of Rome, is not only lawful, but also necessary, as that which is commanded by the Lord himself and by his holy apostles, to whom unless we obey, we cannot be saved.

Otherwise, we are not ignorant that fallings away are altogether abominable and to be blamed. Notwithstanding, unless we distinguish among these fallings, it will not plainly appear what we either allow or disapprove, or what we follow or flee from. There is a defection of apostasy in which, through their hatred of faith or religion, atheists or godless men, out of mere ungodliness and contempt of God, with their wicked ringleaders Lucian and Julian the Apostate,¹ fall away from the sound and catholic faith, and finally from the fellowship of the faithful. Moreover, they blaspheme and rail against Christian verity, and either scornfully laugh at, or persecute, the very church of God. There is also a heretical defection in which, along with Valentine, Marcion, Arius, Manicheaus, Artemones,² and other such monsters, certain proud, arrogant, and malapert³ wicked persons, either refuse the scripture; or twisting it, they despise and tread it under their feet. Or else they deny, overthrow, and resist certain articles of faith, and the sound and ancient opinions of the church of God, and they affirm the contrary. So they frame heretical churches for themselves, and depart from the true, ancient, and catholic church.

There is, moreover, a schismatic defection: such as the Donatists, who separated themselves from the true church of God under the pretence of obtaining a more absolute kind of holiness.⁴ I spoke of this very largely a little earlier. And the two kinds of defection recalled above are altogether abominable and wicked, even as the third kind can also by no means be defended. But none of all these can be imputed to us now-a-days, by our departing from the church of Rome. For the departure is void of all crime, and it is made not from the true, but from the false church; not from the people of God, but from the persecutors of God's people; not from the articles of faith and sound opinions of the church, but from errors which obscure the articles of faith and from the wicked traditions and corruptions of men. Moreover, this is made not done lightly, but of necessity; not for innovation,¹ but for true religion's sake,² so that leaving the fellowship of darkness we may be gathered together again with Christ, the true light, and all his members. And it is in this way, now-a-days, that we have forsaken that see of Rome, flowing with false doctrine, idolatry, and the blood of innocent martyrs; and embraced the doctrine of the gospel and of the apostles, and therefore Christ himself the head of the church, which is the fellowship of all saints believing in Christ.

I have said this much up to here by digression. I now return to the treatise of the catholic church, so that I may make an end of those things which remain to be said. And to that end, so that greater light and force may be added to those things which I have previously spoken about the church, I will now bring out certain parables from the holy scriptures, by which those things are ³ painted before our eyes as it were.

And thus it will be easy for every man to differentiate between the inward and the outward church; and to know either what properly pertains to every one, or else what is not proper.

First of all, the church is set forth for us under the shape and fashion of a house. A house is built to this end, that men may dwell in it; and it is built by workmen of all sorts, made of wood, stones, and mortar, the foundation being first laid, upon which walls are set, which are joined together with a cornerstone. Last of all, the roof is added or placed aloft, without which the whole building, rotting little by little, would fall down and decay. I said that the church is the house of God, the chief master-builder of which is God himself. In the figure of it, that is to say, in the tabernacle made by Moses and the temple built by Solomon, God delivered both to Moses and David, the fashion of the temple, according to which pattern they should build it. For from the beginning, God kept the angels so that they would not fall; and He repaired man who had fallen into sin and death immediately after the beginning of the world — sanctifying a church for himself, which he also severed out, compassing it about with his word. And it is altogether needful that we keep this fashion of the church, and that we do not receive any other fashion, either by emperor or pope, or delivered by any other man. The true master-builder of this house of God. It says in the gospel: "Upon this rock I will build my church." ^{Mat 16.18} For it is the same Son of God who makes us worthy of his kingdom; he gives us faith, by which we are made true members of the church of God. But even though the Lord himself is the only and principal builder of his church, yet he does not refuse the labours of men in the building. Indeed, he rather joins men with him in building the church, whom also he granted to call master-builders.⁴ For Paul says: "As a skilful master-builder, I have laid the foundation." ^{1Cor 3.10} And again: "Who is Paul, and who is Apollos, but the ministers by whom you believed, and as the Lord gave to every man? I have planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the increase. So then neither is he that plants anything, nor he that waters, but God who gives the increase." ^{1Cor 3.5-7}

⁴⁴ architectos, Lat.

Again: "We together are God's labourers. ¹ You are God's husbandry and God's building." ^{1Cor 3.9}
We will make the matter plain by an example.

At the time which God would raise up a house for himself among the Gentiles, he first of all endued Cornelius with his grace, the governor of the Italian regiment placed by Caesar,² or the captain and centurion of it. Later, after sending the apostle Peter, he prepared and made ready that house for himself. For Peter teaches and baptizes; Cornelius with his household hearkens, believes, is baptized, and becomes the house of God, the true church; the Lord dwells in this church by his Spirit. For even as a house is dwelled in by men, so God dwells in the church, as Paul witnesses, saying, "The temple of God is holy, which you are." ^{1Cor 3.17} Again: "Do you not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you?" etc. ^{1Cor 6.19} The foundation of this house is Christ; for Christ says by Isaiah: "Behold, I put or lay in Zion (i.e., in the church) a stone, a tried stone, a precious cornerstone, a sure foundation. He that believes shall not make haste." ^{Isa 28.16} The Lord expounds this prophecy in St. Matthew's Gospel, and applies it to himself as the foundation of the church. Peter has confessed that Jesus is the true Son of the living God, the Messiah that was looked for. Jesus says, "And upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not overcome it." ^{Mat 16.18} There is to be added to this, the exposition of St. Peter the apostle who, reciting the very same words of the prophet Isaiah, and alluding to that saying of David, "The stone which the builders refused is the head of the corner," ^{Psa 118.22} expressly says that Christ is that "living stone, refused by men, but chosen by God, a sure foundation, upon whom whoever stays shall not be confounded." ^{1Pet 2.6-7} And also Paul the apostle agrees with Peter. For he says: "And the rock was Christ." ^{1Cor 10.4}

And again: "No man can lay another foundation than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ." ^{1Cor 3.11} Therefore, though in another place he names the self-same foundation as the foundation of the prophets and apostles, it is not to be taken as if the apostles and prophets were the foundation of the church; but that they laid Jesus Christ as the foundation of the church, and built the whole building on this foundation; yes, even themselves also. ^{Eph 2.20}

For mortal men cannot be the object of faith and the foundation of the church, upon which the faithful may stay. David cries: "The way of God is uncorrupt: the word of the Lord is tried in the fire: he is a shield to all that trust in him. For who is God, besides the Lord? And who is mighty (or a rock),³ save our God?" ^{2Sam 22.31-32} And Jeremiah says: "Thus says the Lord, Cursed be the man that trusts in man, and makes flesh his arm, and withdraws his heart from the Lord. Blessed be the man that trusts in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is." ^{Jer 17.5.7} So the writings of the prophets and apostles with one consent show us that the rock, that is to say, the foundation of the church, is Christ, and that it is he only and alone.

They greatly err therefore, whoever they may be, who attribute to the bishop of Rome this divine praise, power, and prerogative, which is due only to the Son of God. And if they object that many interpreters, both Greek and Latin,⁴ have understood the rock to be Peter himself, we refuse man's authority, and affirm and bring forth heavenly authority. Christ did not say, I will build my church upon you, but upon a rock; and it is that self-same rock that you have confessed. Yes, and Peter takes his name of Petra, which signifies a rock,⁵ even as a Christian of Christ. And Peter himself understood the rock to be Christ. To this comes the authority of Paul, saying: "The rock was Christ." ^{1Cor 10.4} And, "No other foundation can any man lay, than that which is laid, which is Jesus Christ." ^{1Cor 3.11} For David before him said: "Who is God, besides the Lord; or who is a rock, save our God?" ^{2Sam 22.32} I do not repeat these testimonies unadvisedly: for all those who are not out of their wits will confess that more credit is to be given to these most manifest testimonies, witnessing that Christ alone is the rock, and placing him as the foundation of the church, than to those who teach that both Peter and the bishop of Rome, together with Christ, are the rocks and foundations of the church.

I will use no sharper speech against them at this time, for it is most manifest to all men what kind of men they are: most unworthy to be reckoned with Peter, but most worthy to be counted among Simoniacs. Peter foresaw what kind of men they would be; and therefore, lest anyone be deceived by them, he painted them in their colours in the second chapter of his second epistle. But leaving them, we will return to the exposition of the parable we had in hand.

The matter of the house, such as the walls and other parts, are faithful men, built upon the foundation Christ. Those famous and principal workmen of this building, Peter and Paul, witness and explain this in the following words. Peter says: "You come to Christ as to a living stone, disallowed by men, but chosen by God, and precious. And you, as living stones, are made a spiritual house, and holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." ^{1Pet 2.4-5} And Paul says: "Now therefore you are no longer strangers and foreigners, but citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; and are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone, in whom all the building coupled together, grows unto a holy temple in the Lord: in whom you are also built together to be the habitation of God by the Spirit." ^{Eph 2.19-22} Therefore, by the authority of the apostles we learn that Christ is the cornerstone in the house of God, who, lest the walls fall down, couples them together, and upholds the whole building. He is also the roof of the church, that is to say, the defender and ruler, under whose defence the church lives safe, happy, and blessed. To this pertains the consideration of the tabernacle of Moses, and of the temple of Solomon: for either of them is called the house of God. The tabernacle was distinguished into the holiest of all, the holy place, and the court. And even though these several parts are named, it is still called one house of the Lord, because there is only one universal church, which nevertheless has her parts. "The holiest of all" is a figure of the triumphant church in heaven, where our fellow-servants and brethren are: the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, martyrs, and all the blessed spirits.

There Christ our Lord always appears in the sight of God; he is our ark, in which are contained the treasures of the church — there we have the fulfilling of the law, the certainty of the covenant, and our propitiation; there we have our oracles. In this part of the temple, all things are sumptuous, gold and precious stones; for in heaven, perfect joy is attained. In the temple are forms of angels, palms and flowers, for in the life to come the elect will be as the angels of God. ^{Mat 22.30} Here, those who overcome are green forevermore. "To him that overcomes," says the Lord, "will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God." ^{Rev 2.7} Here all things shine: for in Christ and in the life to come, we shall be made bright. "The holy place" represents to us the militant and inward church, sanctified with the blood of Christ; which not only has a show of godliness, but godliness itself: for by faith they cling fast to God, and with mutual charity they are knit together among themselves. They serve God in spirit, hearing God's word, and being partakers of the sacraments. In the holy place, therefore, Solomon placed ten candlesticks, ten tables, and ten caldrons; for in the church, the saints are daily enlightened, nourished, and purged through repentance. Finally, "the court" received the whole assembly of the people; for the church is the assembly of all those who profess faith, having hypocrites also mingled with them. Between the holy place and the court (or porch) are two pillars in Solomon's temple, dedicated to the posterity of David; for it is Christ who bears up the church, by whom the way is open into the church. Through the benefit and power of Christ, the church has obtained, that if she continues in Christ, she will also be "the pillar and ground of the truth." But besides the tabernacle and temple of God, besides the church, there is no place in which God receives the service done to him; God is only favourable in the church of his saints.¹ Let the Jews, Turks, and Saracens, therefore, do works which are ever so excellent in outward show; yet, without Christ and his fellowship, no man pleases God. Heb 11.6

Again, the church of God is compared by Isaiah to a most excellent vine, who says by plain words: "The vineyard of the Lord of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah are his pleasant plant." Isa 5.7

And also in the gospel, our Lord plainly expounds in the parable of the vine, that men are the branches of this vine. Yes, and in John he says:

"I am that true vine, and my Father is a husbandman. Every branch that does not bear fruit in me, he takes away; and every one that bears fruit, he purges it, that it may bear more fruit. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself unless it abides in the vine, no more can you, unless you abide in me. I am the vine, you are the branches: he that abides in me, and I in him, bears much fruit: for without me you can do nothing. If a man does not abide in me, he is cast out as a branch, and withers; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they burn." Joh 15.1-6

There is one church therefore; for it is one vine. Out of her come branches, partly fruitful, and partly unfruitful: for both the good or godly and true worshippers of God, and evil men or hypocrites, are counted to be in the church; but hypocrites in their time are cut off, and thrown into everlasting fire. The good remain in the vine, and are not cut off, but bear fruit that are they indebted for to Christ, the foundation of the church, and also its head and preserver; by his spiritual and living juice, he makes them fruitful in good works. In this most evidently appears the knitting together of the head and the members, Christ and the faithful. We spoke of this at first, and the Lord adds in the gospel: "If you abide in me, and my words abide in you, ask what you will, and it shall be done to you." Joh 15.7

Moreover, this church of the faithful is called the kingdom of God. For the Son of God himself, Christ Jesus, is the king of the church, that is to say, of all the faithful — who governs the church by his Spirit and word; and she in return willingly submits herself to his government. Nor are there many kingdoms in the world, because there is one only King of glory, Christ. I treated this king and kingdom in the seventh sermon of my fourth decade.

Now we have also said often, that the church is likened to man's body. In the body, the head is the chief, which is never absent from the body; and being struck off, it leaves a dead body, void of sense.

And even though this body has many members, there is a most pleasant agreement of them all among themselves; every one agrees and consents together among themselves: they sorrow one with another, and they each help one another. What one member does for another member, all faithful people likewise perform towards one another. They are united to their head Christ by faith; the head itself is joined to the members through grace and the Spirit. Christ is never separated from the church: nor does she have life anywhere else than from Christ. Although he is absent in body from the militant church, yet he is continually present in spirit, in operation, and in government. Thus he needs no vicar on earth, since he governs alone, and continues forever as the only head, the only king, the only priest and saviour of his church. For the Lord says in Ezekiel: "I will raise up over my sheep a shepherd, who shall feed them, namely, my servant David: he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. And I the Lord will be their God, and my servant David shall be their prince among them. I the Lord have spoken it." ^{Eze 34.23-24} This last thing he added, lest any should doubt the faith and certainty of those things which are spoken. God is the eternal truth, and he has spoken it: therefore that which he has spoken must be most true. But what has he spoken? That there shall be and is one pastor and prince of the church. Behold, it is not without significance that he said one. But who is that one? He expounds that, and says, "my servant David," namely, Christ Jesus, that branch of David's posterity whom the authority of the gospel everywhere calls the Son of David. He shall be a shepherd, not in name and title only, but in deed; for he shall feed his sheep, and therefore he shall be in the midst of them. For in the gospel he says expressly: ""Wherever two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them." ^{Mat 18.20} And again: "Behold, I am with you always, even to the end of the world." ^{Mat 28.20} Now, if he is present with his church, then she has no need of a vicar; for a vicar supplies the place of the one who is absent. "Wherever Christ's vicar is acknowledged, therefore, there is no Christ, and therefore anti-Christ reigns there. This will be made yet more clear and sure, if we weigh what it means that Christ is said to be the head of the church.

The head is the life, salvation, and light, or that which gives light to the church, the supreme governor of the faithful, who both can and will always be present to the whole congregation of saints, of all ages, and dispersed throughout the whole world. He will hear her prayers and requests, and moreover, send her succour in all things. And briefly, he is able perfectly to govern the whole church, and both provide for and bring to pass all her matters, in all things. But this privilege, I think, can be given to no creature without blasphemy and sacrilege. Therefore, only Christ, perfect God and man, is and remains the only head of the church. Those who acknowledge the pope of Rome as the head of the church militant, either do not know what they do and say, or they willingly and wittingly blaspheme the Son of God, whom they will not have to reign over his church alone.

But let us now hear the testimonies of St. Paul the apostle of this matter.

"God has raised up Christ from the dead, and set him at his right hand in the heavenly places, far above all principalities and powers, and might and dominion, and every name that is named, not in this world only, but also in that which is to come. And he has made all things subject under his feet, and he has appointed him over all things, to be head to the church, which is his body, even the fulness of him that fills all in all things." ^{Eph 1.20-23}

Behold, Christ is the head, for he rules all things in heaven and on earth; he governs all things; he has all things subject to himself; and he makes the church his body, ministering to her those things which she has need of, and fulfilling all her desires. Again, the same apostle says: "Christ is the head of the church, and he is the saviour of the body." ^{Eph 5.23} It is the part of the head to preserve and govern the body: but no man performs that, except Christ. He remains, therefore, the only head of his church; especially since the church is the spiritual body of Christ, and therefore it cannot have a carnal head, unless you would make a poetical monster of the church: for Christ is the head of the church, not because he is man, but because he is God and man.

But if the defenders of the Romish idol and champions of the monarchy of Rome understand the head to be the prince or governor on earth, as the scripture called Saul the head over Israel, and they understand this of chief bishop ruling in the chief see — then et them again hear the scripture itself confuting their filthy error, saying:

5-2. THE SECOND SERMON: THERE IS ONE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

"And there also arose a strife among the apostles, which of them would seem to be the greatest. But Jesus said to them: The kings of the Gentiles reign over them, and those who bear rule over them are called gracious lords. But you shall not be so. Rather, let the greatest among you be as the least; and the chief, as he that serves. For who is greater, the one who sits at the table, or the one who serves? Is it not the one who sits at the table? And yet I am among you as the one who ministers (serves)." ^{Luk 22.24-27}

That primacy of the church of Rome is therefore of men; it is not of the doctrine or institution of Christ: yes, it is rather quite contrary and repugnant to the institution, doctrine, and example of Christ; who would not have the apostles or apostolic men reign like the princes of this world. He instituted ministers of the church, who should serve the church. She sits at the table; the ministers set that food before her which they receive from the Lord, and rightly divide the word of the Lord. Did not Christ himself refuse a crown on earth, and did he not minister, who is Lord of all? Does he not disallow any minister to seek any prerogative in respect to eldership? "He that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger." ^{Luk 22.26} He therefore commands an equality among them all. And therefore St. Jerome judges rightly, saying that by the custom of man, and not by the authority of God, some one of the elders is placed over the rest, and called a bishop — even though of old, an elder or minister and a bishop were of equal honour, power, and dignity.¹ And it is to be observed that St. Jerome does not speak of the Romish monarchy, but of every bishop placed in every city above the rest of the ministers.

I do not bring this out, to the end we should stay upon the authority of man; but to the end that I might show that even by the witness of man, it may be proved that the majority, as they call it, does not have its origin from the Son of God and from God's word, but out of man's brain;² and therefore that Christ remains the only head of his church, and the bishop of Rome is something less than the head of the church militant.³ And with this, we cling most steadfastly to the sacred and holy gospel, and to the undoubted doctrine of the apostles. This doctrine takes away all pride of supremacy, and commends to us a faithful ministry and the equal authority and humbleness of the ministers. The apostles again witnesses this, saying: "Let a man think of us as of the ministers of Christ, and the dispensers of the secrets of God." ^{1Cor 4.1}

To this belongs almost the whole tenth chapter of John, in which the Lord named himself the true and also the only shepherd of the universal church. The only sheepfold of this shepherd is the catholic church, gathered together by the word out of the Jews and Gentiles. And sheep of this fold are all the faithful people in the world, hearing and giving themselves over wholly to be governed by this chief shepherd Christ. Even though he also communicates this name of pastor or shepherd, to the ministers appointed to the ministry of the church, he retains for himself the charge of the chief shepherd, and also the chief power and dignity. Men that are pastors of churches are all ministers, and are all equal: Christ our Lord is the universal pastor, and chief, and Lord of pastors. The more that worthy diligence and trust is in the pastors, the more worthy it makes them. Therefore, when the Lord said to Peter, "Feed my sheep," ^{Joh 21.16} he did not commit to Peter any empire either over the world or over the church, but a ministry on behalf of his redeemed. "Teach my sheep," he says, "and govern them with my word; my sheep, I say, whom I redeemed with my blood;" for Paul says: "Take heed to yourselves, and to the whole flock of which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers, to feed the church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood." ^{Act 20.28}

The bishop of Rome is therefore deceived, who by the Lord's word spoken to Peter, thinks that full power is given to him over all in the church.¹ Let the apostle Peter himself be heard, talking with his fellow-elders, opening those words of the Lord spoken to him: "The elders who are among you," he says, "I beseech, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that will be revealed. Feed the flock of God, which depends upon you, caring for it not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but from a ready mind. Not as though you were lords over God's heritage, but that you may be examples to the flock." ^{1Pet 5.1-3} Peter does not speak of any empire and lordship — indeed, by express words, he forbids lordly dignity. For just as he is appointed by the Lord to be a minister and an elder, not a prince and a pope, so too he appointed no princes in the church, but ministers and elders, who should feed Christ's flock with the word of Christ, and do that willingly and lawfully, all wicked devices at once set aside. To this belongs the whole thirty-fourth chapter of Ezekiel, which we alleged a little earlier. But if the heart of the bishop of Rome and his men had not been hardened, and their eyes blinded, they would long ago have seen that they could in no part nor by no means have been numbered among the shepherds of the church and disciples of Peter. They would at least have marked that sentence of their own Gregory, which he recites to Maurice the emperor, almost in these words: "I boldly affirm that whoever he is that calls himself the universal priest, is a forerunner of antichrist." And shortly after: "But because the truth itself says, 'Everyone who exalts himself shall be brought low,' I thereby know that the more swollen the puffing, the sooner it is broken." ² These are his sayings.

LAST OF ALL, the estate of Christ and the church is shadowed by the similitude of marriage between the husband and the wife; for Christ is called the husband of the church, and the church is called the spouse of Christ. St. John says to his disciples: "You yourselves are my witnesses, that I said, I am not the Christ, but that I am sent before him. He that has the bride is the bridegroom; but the friend of the bridegroom, who stands and hears him, rejoices greatly because of the bridegroom's voice. This my joy is therefore fulfilled. He must increase, but I must decrease." ^{Joh 3.28-30} And this allegory is very common in the prophets. In a certain place, a damsel is pretended, despised and polluted, lying in her filthiness; and a certain nobleman comes by who, plucking her out of the mire, and making her clean from her filthiness, and also sumptuously apparelling her, chose her for his wife. And even though this allegory declares that heavenly benefit which God showed to his people being in bondage in Egypt, by their wonderful deliverance, and adopting them into his peculiar people — notwithstanding this, who does not see that all mankind, from its origin, is defiled with sin and wickedness, and sticks fast in the mire of hell? Who does not know that the Son of God came down from heaven, and washed all mankind in his blood; and having purged her, he has joined to himself a glorious church, having neither spot nor wrinkle, nor any such thing? ^{Eph 5.27} Surely, marriage is a mutual participation in common between those who have contracted about all their goods; it is a certain knitting together into one body as it were, not to be dissolved. Therefore, when Christ took our flesh upon himself, he became ours in all things, and we also became members of the same body — of his flesh, and of his bones. In us there is infirmity, sin, and death: our husband has also taken these same things to himself, so that he might make them harmless to us. In Christ our husband is justification, sanctification, and life; he communicates these same things to us, his spouse, so that in him we might be just and holy, and might live through him.

From that lawful joining together of the Lord and the church, are born lawful children to God; for which the church is called a mother, and a freewoman, that is, a matron and a mistress.

For the apostle Paul says: "Jerusalem which is above is free; which is the mother of us all." Gal 4.26 For just as children are born through the joining of man and woman together, by the propagation of their seed, so Christ has coupled the church to himself, in which he has left the seed of his word. By the word our mother, the church, children are born (which I admonished you about before, when I spoke of the origin of the church ¹); that is to say, while retaining the seed of the word, by the preaching of the word, she fashions and nourishes us in her womb, and then she brings us forth into the light; afterwards she nourishes us with milk, and brings us up with stronger food, until we all grow up into a perfect man. But just as there is no mother without a husband, and without true faith being plighted, and without seed — even so, without Christ, without true faith and the seed of God's word, the church is not our mother, that is, a free woman and our mistress. By these things we have by the way learned why the church of God is called a mother.

Notwithstanding, she is also called a virgin; for before all things, the Lord requires the faith and integrity of this holy mother, the church. For the apostle Paul says: "I have coupled you to one man, to present you a chaste virgin to Christ." 2Cor 11.2 Therefore, it is the part of the spouse, to bring her virginity to her husband as her dowry, and to keep it undefiled. But what manner of virginity is that? Sincere faith in Christ, which wholly, or with all her mind, clings forever to one. This comes to pass when we give ear only to our spouse, and love none but him alone — to be brief, when we persevere in the simplicity of the gospel. For it follows in the words of the apostle: "But I fear, lest it come to pass that, as the serpent deceived Eve with his subtlety, so your minds would be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ." 2Cor 11.3 That simplicity acknowledged Christ as the means of salvation, the recovery ² of life and all heavenly treasures; without him there is no salvation, nor any good thing. But who would call someone a chaste matron, if she listens to bawds, and sets her heart on the love of others, and does not content herself with her husband only? Would not all men cry out that she is a naughty pack,³ an adulteress, by lying with others, and bearing children of strange seed?

Spiritual adultery and fornication is much spoken about in the holy scriptures. All the sermons of the prophets are full of such allegories. They call those men or churches who receive strange seed — that is to say, doctrine differing from the word of God — adulterers, whoremongers, and fornicators. For they go a whoring from God; they do not cling to God only; they do not love God alone with all their heart; they do not worship, serve, and call upon him only. Rather, they choose others for themselves, whom they may worship and call upon, either instead of God, or together with God. A good part of the fifth chapter of Jeremiah pertains to this, and the whole second chapter of Hosea. Among other things, the Lord says: "I will not have compassion on her children, because they are children of fornications, for their mother has played the harlot; she has said, I will go after my lovers," etc. Hos 2.4-5

Since these things are this way, brethren, there is no reason why any man should reverence the church of Rome, decking herself with the title and beauty of the holy mother, the church. For she is not the holy mother church; she is not an uncorrupted matron and virgin. For where is the husband, who is the only husband of this chaste matron? Where is the faith and integrity kept with her husband? Has she not defiled herself with strange seed? Has she not received and taught a new and strange doctrine from the word of God, and by that means begotten many children — not to Christ, but to antichrist? St. John, beautifying this church with her apt title, calls her, "Great Babylon, the mother of whoredoms and abominations of the earth; and a woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus Christ." ^{Rev 17:5-6} Our holy mother, the church, is an undefiled virgin, hearing only the voice or doctrine of her only well-beloved husband, placing all the means of life and salvation in him alone, and depending only upon him in all things.

The scripture paints the mystery of Christ and the church with many other allegories: but it suffices to have spoken this much of it. The Lord Jesus, the true and only Shepherd of his church, lovingly bring home again the wandering sheep into his fold; and being gathered together in his church, preserve them forever. Amen.

5-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF THE MINISTERS OF GOD'S WORD.

OF THE MINISTRY, AND THE MINISTERS OF GOD'S WORD; WHY AND FOR WHAT END THEY ARE INSTITUTE BY GOD. THAT THE ORDERS GIVEN BY CHRIST TO THE CHURCH IN TIMES PAST WERE EQUAL. FROM WHERE AND HOW THE PREROGATIVE OF MINISTERS SPRANG. AND OF THE SUPREMACY OF THE BISHOP OF ROME.

The exposition touching the church of God will be more truly understood, brethren, by those things which remain to be spoken out of the word of the Lord concerning the ministry and ministers of the church. For I said, the church of God is built and preserved by the word of God; and that is done through ministers appointed for that purpose by the Lord. So that it now follows to speak of the ministers of the church, and their ministry, that is, of that order with which God governs his church.

And truly, the ecclesiastical ministry is extended both to stir up, and also to maintain, public prayers and the administration of the sacraments, and it is especially occupied in preaching the word of God. I will speak of the two former items in a convenient place and time. At present, I will treat the ministry of the word.

In consideration of this, it is first expedient to view why God, in instructing men, uses the aid or ministry of men; and what men perfect ¹ or work in the ministry itself, and what God works. Truly, for his exceeding goodness and mercy toward us, He covets to pour himself wholly into us. I think it is good to repeat this often, so that it may be deeper rooted in our hearts, and we may also think to ourselves what we owe to God. He does this so that we may both be strengthened and blessed in him; and that we may perfectly understand his will toward us; and finally, [that we may understand] our duty by which we are bound to him. Just as he furthers our salvation very diligently in all things, so he himself comes forth to instruct men, lest there be anything lacking in true doctrine.

But such is our weakness and corruption through sin, we cannot abide the meeting of his eternal and wonderful majesty. This is apparent by the immense communication which God had with our fathers, but especially at his meeting with the whole church of Israel at mount Sinai. For when he came down on the mount, not without glory and heavenly majesty, and uttered with his own mouth a brief sum of his whole religion and of all the laws (we call this sum the Decalogue, or Ten Commandments), the people, being astonished with his divine majesty, said to Moses: "You talk with us, and we will hear: but let not God talk with us, lest we die." ^{Deu 5:25-27} And God, receiving this offer, said: "I have heard the voice of the words of this people, which they have spoken to you: they have said well all that they have spoken. Oh, that there were such a heart in them, that they would fear me," etc. ^{Deu 5:28-29} Insomuch that this manner of teaching by men, which men themselves have chosen for themselves, God will have to be perpetual, and never to be broken: so as when he sent his Son into the world, he clothed him with flesh, that by him, God might speak to us in that way. ²

God indeed might, by the secret illumination of his Spirit, without man's ministry (because his power is tied to no creature), regenerate the whole world, and govern the church itself. But he does not despise his creatures, nor destroy the work of his own hands, and he does all things in order. Even so, from the beginning he spoke to the world by patriarchs, then by prophets, and afterward by apostles; nor today does he cease to give doctors and pastors to the world. So that it becomes us not to tempt God — that is, not to look for a secret inspiration with heretics and Enthusiasts, ¹ but to acknowledge a just order, and that God himself speaks to us by men from whom he would have us learn religion. The eunuch of Candace (queen of Ethiopia), read the holy scriptures; ^{Act 8.27^f} and by secret inspiration, the Lord could have taught him the mystery ² of faith. But God gives him Philip to be a teacher and an interpreter.

5-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF THE MINISTERS OF GOD'S WORD.

Likewise Paul, the doctor of the Gentiles, taken up into the third heaven, ^{2Cor 12.2} and instructed by Christ himself, not by men, about all the principles of our religion, is nevertheless referred to a man called Ananias. ^{Act 9.12} The angel of God is sent to Cornelius, captain of the Italian regiment at Caesarea, who might have instructed Cornelius in all points of true religion; but God wills ³ the angel to call for Peter the apostle: "He (says the angel) will tell you what you must do." ^{Act 10.1-6} For this cause, ministers are called saviours: they are said to convert men. Their word is not called the word of man, but the word of God; he who despises them, seems to despise God himself. It is also said that they themselves bind and loose, and retain and forgive sins. For Obadiah the prophet says that saviours will ascend into the mount Zion — which many ⁴ interpret to be about the apostles. ^{Oba 1.21} Paul, pleading before king Agrippa, and repeating the words of God which came to him in a vision, says: "I send you to the Gentiles, to open their eyes, that they may be turned from darkness to light," etc. ^{Act 26.18} And Gabriel the archangel said before that, speaking of John, "He shall go before the Lord with the spirit and power of Elijah, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just men." ^{Luk 1.17} Moreover, the apostle wrote to the Thessalonians, "We thank God, because when you had received from us the word of the preaching of God, you did not receive it as the word of men, but as it is indeed, the word of God, which works also in you who believe." ^{1The 2.13} Again: "He therefore who despises these things, does not despise man, but God, who has given you his Holy Spirit." ^{1The 4.8} For the Lord says in the gospel: "He that hears you, hears me; and he that despises you, despises me." ^{Luk 10.16} And again: "Whatever you loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven; and whatever you bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven." ^{Mat 16.19} And again: "Whose sins you remit, they are remitted to them; and whose sins you retain, they are retained." ^{Joh 20.23}

But some, twisting these places of the holy scripture against their natural sense, in a way give the ministers an equal power with Christ; and what only pertains to him, they communicate also to them. But they say that the ministry must be set out by such means, lest it grow vile and of no estimation among profane men. Others so speak of the inward drawing of the Spirit, that they seem to make the outward ministry superfluous, or take it clean away, and to attribute nothing at all to it. Therefore, the ministry must be limited within its bounds, lest it be drawn here and there with the affections and lusts of men, and either too much or too little be attributed to it. Let the ministry indeed be beautified and kept in authority; but let it be done without dishonouring God. Nor indeed does it become us, under the pretence of the ministry, to attribute to man's labour, that which is God's office alone, on whom all men ought to depend, and to whom, as the only well-spring and giver of all godliness, they ought to have respect. Therefore, the faithful ministers of the Lord Jesus should only have regard to this: that they may keep the glory and authority of Christ unblemished, and his priesthood sound to himself in every point. For the Lord Jesus himself, sitting at the right hand of the Father in the true tabernacle, which God pitched and not man, remains a priest — yes, the only high priest of his church forever, still executing all the duties of a priest in the church. For as the only teacher and master in the church, he teaches his disciples — that is, the church or congregation of the faithful — enduing them with the Holy Ghost, regenerating and drawing them, sanctifying and making them free from their sins. The scripture plainly teaches this in every place. This glory, this power, he has given to none; nor does any minister, unless he is blinded with devilish pride, takes that to himself, as though he worked these works that are proper to Christ, either for Christ, or in Christ's stead, or together with Christ.

The apostles, being Christ's most faithful ministers and most chosen instruments of God, did not give the Holy Ghost; they did not draw men's hearts; they did not inwardly anoint men's minds; they did not regenerate souls; they themselves did not deliver from sin, death, the devil, and hell: for all these things are the works of God, which he has not communicated to anyone. This is why the most holy Baptist in plain words denied that he was Christ; he denied that he himself baptized with the Holy Ghost. "I baptize with water: but he baptizes with the Holy Ghost. I am the voice of a crier in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord." And Paul, pleading his cause before Agrippa, wishes of God that king Agrippa were such a one as Paul himself was, except for his bonds: but such a wish would not have been needed, if he himself could draw, sanctify, and absolve. There are infinite others of this kind to be seen in the scriptures.

Yet nevertheless, the ministry of the church is not needless. The king's counsellors and officers do not have equal power with the king, nor are they kings with the king or for the king; but for all that, their service is not in vain. Therefore, that thing which Christ, the Son of God — who is the greatest, the best, and the chief high priest of his church — works in his catholic church inwardly and in their minds, as the only searcher of the hearts. He declares and testifies the very same thing outwardly by his ministers, whom the scripture for that cause calls witnesses, ambassadors, or messengers. "You (says the Lord to his apostles) shall bear witness, because you have been with me from the beginning." ^{Joh 15.27} And Paul says: "I am ordained a preacher, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles." ^{1Tim 2.7} Therefore, the same apostle in another place calls the gospel both a testimony, and preaching, of our Lord Jesus Christ.¹ And John the apostle affirms that he was banished into the isle of Patmos "for the word of God, and for the witnessing of Jesus Christ." ^{Rev 1.9} And therefore, when ministers bear witness of the Son of God, and promise life everlasting out of his word, their word is not called man's word, but the word of God. And they are said to save and to release from sin; for they are the true messengers and heralds of the King, who is the deliverer, who has sent them to publish remission of sins. Thus they also attribute all the means of life, salvation, and delivery, to the only deliverer Christ.

Paul in another place calls ministers, "fellow-labourers with God;" and afterward again, "dispensers of the secrets of God." For the salvation which the Son of God alone has wrought, and which also He alone gives, the ministers preach or dispose,² and so they are "fellow-labourers." Out of the doctrine of the gospel, Paul compares the teacher in the church to one who sows seed, and the ministers he compares to gardeners and planters of trees, to whom he commits the outward manuring, reserving the inward working to Christ our Lord, saying: "Who is Paul then, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom you believed; and as the Lord gave to every man? I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. So then neither is he that plants anything, nor he that waters; but God that gives the increase." ^{1Cor 3.5-7}

5-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF THE MINISTERS OF GOD'S WORD.

Augustine, being instructed with this testimony from the scripture, learned to speak and write of the ministry of the church, in such a way that nothing would be diminished from the glory of God who inwardly moves and teaches us. And yet, in the meantime, the office of the ministry should not be taken away, or despised as unprofitable. For in his epistle ad Circenses, the 130th, speaking of the secret drawing of God and the outward ministry of men, he says:

"These are not our works, but God's; I would not at all attribute these things to man's working: no, not even if, when we were with you, a great conversion of the multitude were to happen through our speaking and exhortations. By his ministers, God works and brings to pass that which outwardly warns by tokens or signs of things; but the things themselves, He inwardly teaches by himself."

But lest it seem to anyone, that he spoke too briefly and sparingly, and not worthily enough about the ministry of the church, Augustine immediately adds:

"Therefore, neither should we be slower to come to you, just because whatever praiseworthy thing is done among you, does not come from us, but from Him who alone does wonderful things. Yet we should more carefully run to behold the works of God than our own works; because even if we ourselves have any goodness in us, we are His work, and not man's. Therefore the apostle said: 'Neither is he that plants anything, nor he that waters; but God that gives the increase.'" ¹

Augustine, speaking of the very same thing in his twenty-sixth treatise on John, says:

"All the men of that kingdom are those who shall be taught of God; ^{Joh 6.45} they shall not hear by men. And though they hear by men, yet what they understand is inwardly given; it shines inwardly; it is inwardly revealed. What do men do in preaching outwardly? "What am I doing now when I speak? I make you hear a noise of words with your ears. But unless He reveals it is within, what do I say? or what do I speak? The outward workman is the planter of the tree, and the inward is the creator; he that plants, and he that waters, works outwardly; we do that: but neither is he that plants anything, nor he that waters; but God that gives the increase. This is the meaning of, "They shall be all taught of God." ²

This is why, when St. Paul says in another place, "You are the epistle of Christ, ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; not in stony tablets, but in fleshy tablets of the heart;" ^{2Cor 3.3} we must diligently differentiate between the work of the Spirit, and the work of man or of the minister. The minister does not take on himself the honour of God and the work of the Spirit, but his own work, that is to say, the ministry. Paul preaches, and writes with ink; but the Spirit of God moves the heart; and with his grace, or anointing, he writes in the very heart: so he works together with God, Paul working his proper work, and the Spirit working his work. The apostles are preachers and ministers of the gospel, not of the letter, but of the Spirit: not that they give the Holy Ghost, but because they are preachers of the gospel, that is, of that which gives the Spirit of Christ,³ yes, who pours it into the believers. But they are not preachers of the letter of the law, which does not give grace and remission of sins; rather, it works wrath and brings sin to light. Touching the keys and the power of the keys, there will be a more fitting place to speak of it elsewhere. And moreover, it seems that here is a fit place for those things which I disputed about in the first sermon of this decade, touching the power and ministry of the church.

Again, though the Lord uses man's help in teaching his church, and uses us as labourers together in finishing the salvation of mankind, he shows most evidently how greatly he loves us, and how much he esteems us. For he has laid up so great a treasure in earthen vessels, and even in us, he works whatever is most excellent, and overcomes all the high excellence of the world. By this, we learn to attribute all the glory to Christ, Paul again teaching us:

"We do not preach ourselves, but Jesus Christ the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake. For it is God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, who has shined in our hearts, to give the light of knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellence of the power may be of God, and not of us. We are afflicted on every side, yet are we not in distress," etc. ^{2Cor 4.5-8}

Moreover, all the members of the ecclesiastical body are wonderfully glued together by the ecclesiastical ministry. For this chiefly helps to make concord and continue unity: because we want mutual instruction. And to every church, one particular pastor is appointed as a governor, a faithful head of house ¹ as it were, governing and keeping in order his whole family. Truly it cannot be denied that in time past that most exquisite order of the tabernacle, and the temple, and the tribe of Levi consecrated to the priesthood, were ordained to this end by God. As soon as that ungodly king Jeroboam forsook this order through wicked presumption, he rent the kingdom in pieces, and at length utterly overthrew both his own house and the whole kingdom.² St. Paul also, speaking of the ends of the holy ministry instituted by God, does not forget the unity of the ecclesiastical body, to which he also joins other notable good things. If any man desires his words, they are these:

"He instituted ministers for the gathering together of the saints, for the work of the ministry, and for the edification of the body of Christ: till we all meet together in the unity of faith, and knowledge of the Son of God, to a perfect man, and to the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ: that from here on, we no longer be children, wavering, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the deceit of men, and with craftiness, by which they lie in wait to deceive; but let us follow the truth in love, and in all things grow up into him who is the head, that is, Christ," etc. ^{Eph 4.11-15}

These ends of the ecclesiastical ministry are manifest in the preaching of the word of God. God has instituted a ministry in the church, that all the members may be brought into the unity of the body, and that they may be subject and cling to Christ their head, that thereby we may grow to be of full age, and become perfect men; that we not always be children, and that we do not lie open to the deceits and bewitchings of all heretics; but being joined together in true faith and charity, let us hold fast the pure and simple truth of Christ; and serving Christ sincerely in this world, we may after death reign with him in heaven.

Out of these things let us also derive this: that the ecclesiastical ministry, though it is executed by men, yet it is not of man, that is to say, it is not invented by man. For the beginning of it is from heaven, and the author or institutor of it is God himself; and therefore the worthiness of it greatly excels.

5-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF THE MINISTERS OF GOD'S WORD.

The first preacher in paradise was God himself, yes, the Son of God himself. By the ministry of the Holy Ghost, he always spoke to the fathers — just as afterwards, being incarnate, the Spirit was given by the Father to be a master and teacher to the whole world. He preached remission of sins and repentance to our parents, Adam and Eve. He ordained and revealed a sacrifice, instead of a sacrament; in which it might be represented and ratified ¹ to them, the price of the redemption, promised by the seed to be paid at a convenient time, etc. Adam with his sons and nephews, Seth, Enosh, Enoch, Noah, Shem, Abraham, with their sons and nephews, succeeded one another in the ministry, even unto Moses. In his time, while he governed the church, and after him, prophets and priests are given, even to the time of John the Baptist and Jesus, the promised seed — I mean Christ, our king and high priest. He likewise sent his disciples into the world, that is to say, the apostles, who ordained as their successors, bishops and doctors. I have spoken of this more largely in another place.² God himself, therefore, is heard in the voice or doctrine of his ministers; so that we are commanded to give ear to the ministers, preaching the gospel, as we would to the very angels of God; yes, as we would to the Lord himself. For this cause, Paul praises the Galatians, saying: "You did not despise nor abhor my trial which was in the flesh; but received me as an angel of God, yes, as Christ Jesus." ^{Gal 4.14} Concerning this, St. Augustine says in his thirtieth treatise on John:

"Let us hear the gospel as if the Lord were present; and let us not say, 'Oh, happy are they who could hear him;' because there were many of them who saw him, and yet consented to kill him, and many among us who have not seen, and yet believed. ^{Joh 20.29} For that also which sounded precious out of the mouth of the Lord, is both written for our sakes, and kept for us, and it is also read for our sakes; and for our posterity's sake, it shall be read to the end of the world.

The Lord is above, yes; and the Lord, who is the truth, is also here. For the body of the Lord with which he rose may be in one place, but his truth is spread abroad everywhere. Let us therefore hear the Lord, and also that which he gives us by his words." ³

This much from him. The Lord, our high priest, speaks to us even today by the ministers preaching his word. And indeed, we have all things set out in the scriptures, whatever the Lord spoke by the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, which the ministers of the church read and declare before us. Who, therefore, can then despise the ministry and the faithful ministers of Christ, especially since our Lord and Saviour took upon himself the ministry, and was made the apostle and minister of the church of the Jews? ⁴ And what if those first ministers were such that, in any doctrine of religion, in holiness and excellence, they had no equals much less their betters, in any age? In our day, as these are the last times, in which scoffers and epicures have their full range, is the ministry of God's word of no value? To the contrary, if you run over and weigh all the ages, even to the beginning of the world, you will find that the wisest, most just, and best men in the whole world, held nothing in more reverence than the word of God, and the prophets, and the holy apostles of God.

But before we proceed any further in other things belonging to this matter, we will answer some who, under the pretence of the holy scriptures, endeavour to pervert the ministry of the word. For they allege this text of Jeremiah: "No man shall teach his neighbour, for all shall know me." ⁵

We do not deny that Jeremiah has so written. But we say, by that kind of speech and figurative language, he meant nothing else than this: that the knowledge of God and heavenly things would be very common in the whole world; which Joel also foretold would come to pass, and which Peter alleges in the Acts, second chapter. ^{Act 2.16 18} Meanwhile, these two prophets, and all others, very often mention the teachers of the church, whom the Lord would send to his people. These prophets would not have done this, if they had understood that all preachers would be completely removed. Others object that all alike have the office of teaching committed to them, namely, parents to teach their children, and everyone to admonish his neighbour; there is therefore no need for the ministry of the word of God in the church. This is sophistry.¹ For all of us can and should privately teach and admonish our children and our neighbours; but the public ministry of the word of God is not therefore superfluous. For the same God who commanded parents that they should instruct their children in godliness, ^{Deu 6.7} and that every one of us should teach and admonish our neighbours, has given public ministers to the church. ^{Eph 4.11} It is their office to teach openly or publicly in the church. Nor is this permitted to whomever would do it, but only to those who are lawfully ordained — lest, if others teach, they might not go forward in the right path. For then it would be lawful for everyone, being inspired with the Spirit of God, at whatever time and place,² both to soberly challenge, and to affirm the truth. Therefore, the public ministry of the word remains nevertheless, perpetually, in the church.

This much we have spoken in general about the ministry and the ministers of the word of God. What now remains of this matter, we will discuss by their kinds and parts. And first, we will show what orders, or what offices, the Lord has instituted from the beginning, or whom he has put in authority in the holy ministry of the church; then, what manner of men, in what way it is fitting for us to ordain ministers; and last of all, what manner of office it is that those have, who are ordained in the church. And that we will not be troublesome to you, by beginning a long discourse from the patriarchs, we will begin at our Lord Christ himself.

Paul the apostle says of him in the fourth chapter to the Ephesians: "He that descended, is the same who ascended far above all heavens, to fulfil all things. And he gave some apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and doctors, to gather together the saints, into the work of ministration, into the edifying of the body of Christ;" ^{Eph 4.10-12} and so forth. Therefore, our Lord ordained apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and doctors, by whose labour he meant to build, preserve, and govern the church.

Let us now see what the scripture teaches us about them. Apostle is a new name, given by the Lord himself to those twelve whom he chose particularly, and ordained teachers and masters to (all) nations. For thus we read in the sixth chapter of Luke: "The Lord called his disciples: and from them he chose twelve, whom also he called apostles." For apostle signifies, one who is sent, a messenger, ambassador, or orator. For in the gospel of St. John we read: "The apostle (or messenger) is not greater than the one who sent him." ^{Joh 13.6} And truly, in the prophets and in the old Testament,³ mention is often made of sending, from which it seems the Lord borrowed that name. We read of no certain bounds appointed to the apostles; for the Lord says in the gospel: "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures." These are the master-builders of the first church of God, from whom ancient writers took the name of apostolic churches — I

² Bullinger may be saying that there is a time and place to teach our children and neighbor, and a time and place to be taught by God-ordained ministers of the Word. Luther originally celebrated the liberty of every believer to read and interpret the Bible for themselves. But he quickly discovered that not all are gifted to read and understand it. The church needs its teachers to first instruct the body in God's unchanging truth, and then children and neighbors may be taught through catechisms, creeds, and confessions. — WHG mean, those which the apostles first founded, such as the ones at Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, and many others mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles.

The name minister or PROPHET is widely used, as spoken of in another place.¹ Prophets, in this place in Ephesians, are those who excel in singular revelation, and by whom the Lord foretells things that will come to the church. Such was Agabus, who foretold the famine which was to come, and also foretold St. Paul of his bonds. In times past, wise and godly men, endued with a singular gift of interpreting the scripture, were called prophets. This may appear from the words of the apostle in 1Corinthians, 14th chapter.

An EVANGELIST is a preacher of the gospel of Jesus Christ, sent with apostolic authority. Such were Philip and Timothy, etc.

PASTORS watch over the Lord's flock, having care of the Lord's people, feeding the church with the word of truth, and keeping the wolves from the sheepfolds. The chief of these is that good Shepherd, Christ, who says to Peter, "Feed my sheep;" by which he joins himself to shepherds.

DOCTORS or TEACHERS have their names from teaching. Nor do I see that they differ from shepherds, except that they only taught, and meanwhile were not burdened with the care that belongs to the pastor. Of this sort, in a way, are the interpreters of scriptures, and governors of Christian schools.

Other names are also found for the OVERSEERS of the church in the scriptures. The apostle Paul says to the shepherds, gathered together in the council at Miletum: "Take heed therefore to yourselves, and to all the flock, over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers, to feed the church of God." But BISHOPS are called superintendents, seers, keepers, watchmen, and rulers. The people of Athens called those whom they sent to their tributary cities which were subject to them, to diligently see and mark what they did in every city, επισκοπους² and φυλακας, that is to say, spies and watchmen.³ The apostles called bishops watchmen, and keepers of the Lord's flock, and the stewards of Christ, or dispensers of the secrets⁴ of God in the church. And PRESBYTER, an ELDER, gets his name from age and ancient years. In times past, the care of the commonwealth was committed to the elders, as to those who were exercised with manifold experience and long use of things; for governors of cities are called both seniors and senators. And as commonwealths have their senators, so the church has her elders; as it appears in the Acts, chapters 14, 15, 20, and 21. It seems that ordaining elders came into the church out of the synagogue; for thus we read in the book of Numbers: "Gather to me (he says) seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom you know to be the elders of the people, and officers over them; ...and I will take from the spirit which is upon you, and put it upon them, and they shall bear the burden of the people with you, lest you be constrained to bear it alone." Num 11.16-17

This is why the elders in the church of Christ are either bishops, or otherwise prudent and learned men added to bishops, that they may more easily bear the burden laid upon them, and that the church of God may better and more conveniently be governed. For Paul says: "The elders that rule well, let them be counted worthy of double honour; most specially those who labour in the word and doctrine." 1Tim 5.17 There were therefore certain others in the ecclesiastical function, who even though they did not later teach, as the bishops did, yet they were present with those who taught in all church business. Perhaps they are elsewhere called governors by the same apostle; ^{1Cor 12.28} that is to say, those who are set in authority concerning discipline and other affairs of the church.

And because we have come thus far in this present treatise, we will also declare the names of other offices in the church. There is much talk in the scriptures about DEACONS, and among ecclesiastical writers, about priests. In the primitive church, the care of the poor was committed to deacons, as it is plainly gathered out of the sixth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. There are also laws to be seen, which are prescribed for them by the apostle in first Timothy, the third chapter. The office of deacons was separated from the function of pastors; and therefore we do not consider them in the order of pastors. The ancient fathers referred them to the ministry, but not to the priesthood. We also read that women, not wedded, but women widows, ministered in the primitive church; and among others, Phebe of the church of Cenchrea, who was highly praised by the apostle, is very famous. But he forbids women to teach in the church, and to take public offices upon themselves. Therefore, how, or in what things, did women minister in the church? Undoubtedly they ministered to the poor in duties pertaining to women. They ministered to the sick; and with Martha, Christ's hostess, they cherished the members of Christ with great care and diligence: for what other offices could they have?

Moreover, the name priest seems to be brought into the church out of the synagogue; for you will not otherwise find the ministers of the word of God, and of the churches, being called priests in the new Testament, except as all Christians are called priests by the apostle Peter. ^{1Pet 2.9}

But it appears that the ministers of the new Testament are called priests by ecclesiastical writers, for a certain likeness which they have with the ministers of the old Testament. For as priests did their service in their tabernacle, so these ministers, according to their manner and fashion, minister to the church of God. For otherwise, the Latin word is derived from holy things, and signifies a minister of holy things — a man, I say, who is dedicated and consecrated to God to do holy things. And holy things are not only sacrifices, but whatever things come under the name of religion; we do not exclude from this the laws themselves, and holy doctrine. In the old Testament, we read that David's sons were called priests ¹ — not that they were ministers of holy things (for it was not lawful for those who came from the tribe of Judah to serve in the tabernacle, but only Levites) — but living under the government and discipline of priests, they learned good sciences and holy divinity.

Here, it seems, it must not be pretended that those names which we have treated, are used one for another in the scriptures.² For Peter, the apostle of Christ our Lord, calls himself an elder; and in the Acts of the Apostles he calls the apostleship a bishopric. St. Paul, calling the elders together at Miletum and talking with them, also calls them bishops; and in his epistle to Titus, he commands him to ordain elders town by town, whom he immediately after calls bishops.³ And none are so gross-headed as to deny that they are also called both doctors and pastors.

Now, we think it is manifest to all men by these things, what orders the Lord himself ordained from the beginning, and whom he has consecrated to the holy ministry of the church, to govern his own church. He laid the foundation of the church, at the beginning, by apostles, evangelists, and prophets; he enlarged and maintained it by pastors and doctors. Elders and deacons were helpers to these: the deacons in seeing to the poor; and the elders in doctrine, in discipline, and in governing and sustaining other weightier affairs of the church.

³ 1Pet 5.1; Acts 1.20; 20.28; Tit. 1.5.

Nevertheless, it appears that the order of the apostles, evangelists, and prophets, was ordained by the Lord for his church, at the beginning, and for a time — according to the matter, persons, and places. For many ages since, and immediately after the foundation of Christ's kingdom on earth, the apostles, evangelists, and prophets ceased; and in their place came bishops, pastors, doctors and elders. This order has continued most steadfastly in the church; so that now, we cannot doubt that the order of the church is perfect and the government absolute, if today also, there remain in the church of God, bishops or pastors, also doctors or elders. Yet we do not deny that after the death of the apostles, God oftentimes raised up apostles, who might preach the gospel to barbarous and ungodly nations. We also confess that God, even at this day, is able to raise up apostles, evangelists, and prophets, whose labour he may use to work the salvation of mankind. For we acknowledge, that holy and faithful men, who first preach the truth of the gospel to any unbelieving people, may be called apostles and evangelists. We acknowledge that men inspired with the singular grace of the Spirit, who foresees and foreshows things to come, and are excellent interpreters of the scriptures, or illuminated divines, may be called prophets; as we have shown elsewhere more at large.¹

But in the order of bishops and elders, from the beginning, there was singular humility, charity, and concord; no contention or strife for prerogative, or for titles or dignity; for all acknowledged themselves to be the ministers of one master, co-equal in all things touching office or charge. He made them unequal, not in their office, but in their gifts, by the excellence of those gifts. Yet those who had obtained the more excellent gifts, did not despise the lesser sort,² nor did they envy them for their gifts. St. Paul says: "Let a man so esteem us, as the ministers of Christ, and dispensers of the secrets of God." ^{1Cor 4.1} The same Paul in more than one place, calls the preaching of the gospel "the ministry;" for that took deep root in the ancient bishops' hearts. When his disciples strived for dignity, and (as they say) for the majority — that is, which of them should be the greatest ³ — the Lord set a child in their midst, and said: "Truly, truly, I say to you, unless you turn, and become as little children, you shall not enter the kingdom of heaven." ^{Mat 18.1-3}

Truly the martyr of God, St. Cyprian, standing in the council of the bishops at Carthage, wisely said:⁴

"Nor has any of us appointed himself to be a bishop of bishops, or by tyrannous fear, compelled his fellows in office to necessarily obey: since every bishop has, according to the licence and liberty of his power, his own free choice — as if he might not be judged by another, since neither can he judge another. But let us all look for the judgment of our Lord Jesus Christ, who only and alone has power both to prefer us in the government of his church, and to pronounce sentence upon what we do." ⁵

At that time, therefore, bishops did not contend for the primacy or patrimony of Peter; but that one might excel another in his pureness of doctrine and holiness of life, and in mutually helping one another. And then, undoubtedly, the affairs of the church went forward prosperously, so far that, even though the most powerful princes of the world persecuted the church of Christ with fire and sword, nevertheless, she stood unmoveable against all the assaults of the devil and the world, having won the victory; and daily she had been more enlarged and renowned. Oh, how happy we would have been if this order of pastors had not been changed, but the ancient simplicity of ministers — that faith, humility, and diligence — had remained uncorrupted!

But in the process of time, all things of ancient soundness, humility, and simplicity, vanished away. Some things were turned upside down; some things went out of use, or else were taken away, either of their own accord or by deceit; some things were added. Truly, not many ages after the death of the apostles, there was seen a far different hierarchy (or government) of the church than what was from the beginning; although those beginnings seem to be more tolerable than this same order is today. St. Jerome ¹ says: "In times past, churches were governed with the common counsel and advice of the elders. Afterward, it was decreed that one of the elders, being chosen, should be set over the others. To him are referred the whole care bishops of every church, so that the seeds of schisms would be removed." ² This much from him.

In every city and country, therefore, the one who was most excellent was placed above the rest. His office was to be superintendent, and to have the oversight of the ministers ³ and of the whole flock. He did not have dominion over his fellows in office, or other elders (as we understood even now from Cyprian's words). Rather, just as the consul in the senate-house was instated to demand and gather together the voices of the senators, to defend the laws and privileges, and to be careful lest there arise factions among the senators — even so, the office of a bishop in the church was no different. In all other things, he was equal with the other ministers. But if the arrogance of the ministers, and the ambition of bishops, had not further increased in the times that followed, we would not speak a word against them.

St. Jerome affirms, that "That preferment of bishops did not spring from God's ordinance, but by the ordinance of man. These things we have recalled," he says, "to the end that we might show that among the old fathers, the bishops and ministers were all one; but little by little, so that the plants of dissensions might be plucked up, all the care was committed to one. Therefore, ministers know that by the custom of the church, they are subject to the one who is set over them. So too, let bishops know that it is by custom, rather than by the truth of the Lord's disposition, that they are 'greater' than the other ministers: and that they ought to govern the churches together, in common, following the example of Moses who, when it was in his power alone to govern the people of Israel, chose seventy others with whom he might judge the people." ⁴ Thus he writes in his commentary on the third chapter of the epistle of Paul to Titus.

But the ancient fathers did not keep themselves within these bounds. There were also ordained patriarchs at Antioch, Alexandria, Constantinople, and Rome. There are appointed archbishops, or metropolitans; that is to say, those who have government over the bishops throughout the provinces. And to bishops of cities, or inferior bishops, there were added those called chorepiscopi

(or bishops of the multitude);¹ that is to say, whenever the country or region was larger than the care and oversight of the bishop placed over the city would suffice to meet, these offices were added, such as vicars and suffragans, who might execute the office of the bishop throughout that part of the country. But we know that the functions of suffragans, or vicars general, in these last times, are far different in bishops' courts and dioceses. And also, subdeacons were placed under deacons. And when wealth increased, archdeacons were also created; that is to say, overseers of all the goods of the church.

As yet, they were not mingled with the order of ministers ² or bishops, nor of those who taught; but they remained as stewards, or factors, of the goods of the church. Nor did the monks at the beginning, execute the office of a priest or minister in the church; for they were considered laymen, not clerics, and were under the charge of the pastors. But these unfortunate birds were never left soaring until in these last times, they have climbed into the top of the temple, and set themselves on bishops' and pastors' heads. For monks have been and are both popes, archbishops, and bishops — and what are they not? It is repeated out of the register of Gregory, that he would put out of the clergy, whichever monk would take the degree of an abbot; for the one dignity would hinder the other (he was nevertheless very favourable to the monks). ³

In times past, clerics (who are the Lord's inheritance, or whose lot is the Lord) were called students, or professors of divinity; that is to say, the very seed of the pastors of the church, and those who were consecrated to succeed in the ministry of the church: that is, those who lived under government, and were trained up by the doctors and elders in the study of the liberal sciences and holy scriptures.⁴ This institution is ancient, not new, nor invented by man; for in times past, among the old people of the Jews, they were called Nazarites.⁵ And the most excellent churches have continually had famous schools, even from the time of the apostles, as Eusebius often witnesses.⁶ But the affairs of the church somewhat increasing, it seems that the charge of opening and shutting the temple or the church was committed to those students; and to prepare all things in the church; and further, to read openly before the people, those places of scripture that the bishop appointed them. From this, perhaps, the names of door-keepers and readers sprang, which are today reckoned among the ecclesiastical orders.⁷

But those who were more familiarly present with the bishops, and accompanied them, and were esteemed as those who might succeed in their places after the decease of the bishops, were called Acoluthi (acolytes), or "followers;" for it is a Greek word. And just as, for the most part, all things become worse in time, even so with these things. The further off from their first institution, the more filthily they were twisted. In some things, you see nothing left but the bare name; some things are utterly lost; some things are turned altogether to another use. And for witnesses to this, I allege Isidorus, Rabanus, Innocentius, Durandus, and other writers of this kind.⁸ They make two sorts of ecclesiastical persons: one of dignity, another of order — of dignity, those such as a pope, patriarch, primate, archbishop, archpriest, archdeacon, and provost; of order, those such as the minister ¹ or priest, the deacon, etc. But some account six orders of them, others eight. All with one accord include doorkeepers or porters, readers or singers, exorcists, acolytes, subdeacons, deacons, elders or priests. Those they divide again into greater and lesser orders. Among the greater orders are the priest or elder, the deacon, and the sub-deacon. The rest are called the lesser orders; there remains nothing of these orders beside the bare name. The office of doorkeepers is turned over to the sextons, which they call holy-water clerics. There are no readers; for that ancient reading is worn out of use. The psalmists, or singers, mean nothing more than that they rehearse or sing. Touching the exorcists they say this: Josephus writes that king Solomon found out the manner of exorcism, that is, of conjuring, by which unclean spirits were driven out of a man who was possessed by Eleazar the exorcist, so that they no longer dare to come back. ²

Those who are named exorcists, are called to this office. Of these, it is said in the gospel: "If through Beelzebub I cast out devils, then by whom do your children (namely, your exorcists or conjurers) cast them out?" ^{Mat 12.27} This much they say. I repeat it to this end: that it may appear to all men, that these men are the very same ones of whom the apostle foretold that it would come to pass that they "will not suffer wholesome doctrine, but will be turned to fables." ^{2Tim 4.3-4} For who does not know that what is reported about Solomon is most fabulous? Who does not know that the apostles of the Lord were not exorcists, nor did they use at any time any type of enchantments or conjurations? For they cast out unclean spirits with a word, that is, by calling upon, and by the power of, the name of Christ. Those gifts ceased long ago in the church of God. Those sons of Sceva the priest, in the Acts of the Apostles, 19.14, were said to be exorcists, whom the evil spirit, though they called on the names of Jesus and Paul, ran upon and tore the clothes from their backs. And so, by God's appointment, it was made known to all men how much the eternal God is delighted with exorcists. Yet these fellows thrust them upon us. Touching the acolytes, or followers, they write this — and hear, I beg you, how trimly they reason. "The acolytes," they say, "are wax-bearers, because they carry wax-candles. For when the gospel must be read, or mass is to be said, wax-candles are lit to signify the joy of the mind." ³ Hearing these things, who will say that these men unlearnedly handle no mysteries? Sub-deacons and deacons are no longer providers for the poor; but being made ministers of superstition, they attend to the popish mass. The deacon's office is to sing the gospel; the sub-deacon's is to sing the epistle. I cannot express in few words, what foolish men fondly chatter concerning these matters. They have set an archdeacon over these, which is a name of dignity and preeminence. ⁴

Sacrificers, who are also called priests,⁵ are variously distinguished; for there are regular priests, and secular priests. By regular priests they intend monks: though they are nothing less than what they are said to be. Truly, they resemble those who, of old, were called monks in no point of their doings. A great part of them are a rule and law unto themselves. Some of these men are doctors appointed to the office of preaching, yet they are rather occupied in saying their hours,⁶ and in singing and saying masses. These men sow superstition, and they most obstinately defend it, and most bitterly persecute true religion. Another sort, and the greatest part of these monkish priests, do nothing but sing in the church, and mumble mass, and do it for a very slender price. But you may sooner number the sands of the coast of Libya than the whole rabble of these. But they are unprofitable both to God, and to the church, and even to themselves; these men are utterly unlearned, and "slow bellies," and yet in the meantime, they are sworn enemies to the truth of the gospel.

Among the secular priests, the chief are canons; for the most part, these are idle persons, given over to voluptuousness and gluttony, indeed secular, that is to say, worldly.¹ They think they have gaily discharged their duty if they make an end of the hours which they call canonical, and are present onlookers at the mass; and if they honour and beautify with their presence God's service, as they call it. They seem to be more strict, and not secular priests, who say mass both for the quick and the dead. There are also reckoned in the number of secular priests, parish priests, whom they call Plebani; that is, priests appointed for the people, who only represent some shadow of the old institution in this: that they preach and administer the sacraments. Nevertheless, you cannot allow this, because they minister them according to popish traditions, and not according to the doctrine of the apostles. And they do many other things by reason of their office, which godliness by all means disallows. Added to these are hirelings, helpers, or vicars. There are also joined to these Sacellani, whom they call chaplains, of whom there is an exceeding number.

Like the monkish priests, these consider the chief parts of their duty to be repeating their hours, but especially in mass. As for doctrine, they attribute nothing to it; for you will find some of this company who never in their life made one sermon. For they commit the charge of preaching only to their parish priests and their vicars; they serve those gods to whom their altar or their chapel is consecrated, etc. By all these things, it plainly appears even to blind men, how shamefully the first institution of ministers or pastors is corrupted and turned upside down. They set archpriests over the priests. I used that word in my preface or epistle in the beginning of the first decade.² And I hear that some brethren are offended at it, as though some piece of popish leaven still stuck about us; or as though we thought to bring some unworthy dignity back into the church. But I would not have those brethren fear. There are no popish archpriests with us. Nor did I intend any popish dignity by that word, but the office of overseeing, which others call visiting. For they have charge of all degrees in our country, in admonishing and correcting. They have no prelacy or superiority; they reap no rewards by it.

But we return to our purpose. They derive priests, or sacrificers, from the seventy disciples, whom it is read in the gospel that the Lord chose; the order of bishops, from Peter himself, and the residue from the apostles. And immediately, they divide the order of bishops into three parts; namely, patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops.³ They account the patriarchs the fathers of princes, or highest fathers; and they also call them primates. And primates, they say, have authority over three archbishops, as a king has authority over three dukes. Here I think cardinals have their place, in whom the church of Rome is turned like a gate on its hinges. For in the Decretals of Gregory, De Officio Archip., it reads thus: "Cardinals have their name a cardine" that is, from the hinge of a gate; "for as the gate is ruled by the hinge, so the universal church is governed by cardinals."⁴

Archbishops are the princes of bishops as it were: they are also surnamed metropolitans, because they have their government in the chief cities. Indeed, with the Greeks metropolis is a mother-city from which colonies are deducted as it were; that is, people are sent from there to inhabit some new place.¹ For this reason, the one who governs some one province is called the metropolitan bishop, and he has other bishops under him. These are called both bishops, chief priests, and presuls. But if you compare all these things with what I said before about the bishops and governors of the primitive church, you will say there is a very great difference between them.

But what they write touching the pope, or chief bishop, is far ² from the writings of the apostles and evangelists, and from the first ordaining of ministers made by our Saviour Christ. Our most holy lord, the pope (they say), excels all those bishops in dignity and power; he is called pope, that is, the father of fathers; he is also called universal, because he is chief of the universal church; and he is also called apostolic, and the chief bishop, because he fills the place of the chief of the apostles. ³ For he is Melchizedek, whose priesthood others are not to be compared to, because he is the head of all bishops, from whom they descend as members from the head; and of whose power they all receive, whom he calls to be partakers of his care and burden, but not to be partakers of the fulness of his power. ⁴

They therefore define the pope as the supreme head of the church on earth, and the only universal shepherd of the whole world, who cannot err, nor should he be judged by any man. For, they say, he is the judge of all men, having absolute power. For thus says Pope Innocent the ninth,⁵ in his third question: "The judge ought not to be judged either by the emperor, or by all the clergy, or by kings, or by the people." Upon this statement, this gloss was written: "A general council cannot judge the pope; as it appears in the Extravagants, in the title of election, cap. Significasti. Therefore, if the whole world were to pronounce sentence in any matter against the pope, it seems that we must stand to the pope's judgment." ⁶ To this pertain those common grounds of the clawback,⁷ flattering lawyers of the pope's court, very plausible and authentic: "That all the laws of the pope are to be received by all men, as if they proceeded from the very mouth of Peter. ⁸ That the authority of the pope is greater than the authority of the saints. ⁹ That the pope is all, and above all. ¹ That God and the pope have one consistory;" Hostiensis ² also affirms this In C. Quanto de Transl. proel., ³

"That the pope cannot be brought into order by any man, even if he is accounted a heretic. ⁴ That he has supreme power, nor does he have any equal:⁵ That he has all laws within his breast: That there is a general council where the pope is:⁶ That he has all laws in his breast: ⁷ That he has both swords, by which he may rightly be called an emperor; yes, that he is above the emperor: That he alone can depose the emperor, and pronounce the sentence of the emperor to be of no effect: That he alone may spare whom he will; and may also take away the right of one man, and give it to another; and finally, he may take away privileges." To be short, they say, "He is lord of lords, and has the right of the king of kings over his subjects; yes, and also has fulness of power over the temporal things on earth.⁸ Yes, and also the whole world is the pope's diocese, in which he is the ordinary of all men;⁹ and it stands upon the necessity of salvation, that every man be subject to the bishop of Rome." ¹⁰

For a conclusion, I will add to this the words of the glosser, who says, In Ca. Quinto de Transl. Episcopi, Tit. vii.

"The pope is said to have a heavenly power; and therefore he alters the very nature of things, by applying the things that are of the substance of one thing to another: and of nothing he can make something; and that sentence which is of no force he can make to be of force; because in those things with him, what he wills, his will is instead of reason. Nor is there any who may say to him, Why do you so? For he can dispense above the law, and of unrighteousness make righteousness, correcting and changing laws; for he has the fulness of power." ¹¹

But who hears these things without horror both of body and mind? Who does not understand that the saying of Daniel is fulfilled, "He thinks that he may change times and laws?" ^{Dan 7.25} Who does not understand, that the saying of Paul is fulfilled, who says, "I know this, that after my departing grievous wolves will enter in among you, not sparing the flock; also, men shall arise from among yourselves, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after themselves?" ^{Act 20.29-30} For from bishops, and from those who advance bishops, came forth this man of sin; ^{2The 2.3} who places himself in the throne of the Lamb, and claims those things for himself which are proper only to the Lamb. Of this sort are the supreme government, priesthood, lordship, and full power in the church, about which I have spoken enough in the former sermons. Who is not now moved to think that this saying of Paul is fulfilled: "The adversary, or enemy of Christ shall be revealed, and shall be exalted above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he, as God, sits in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God?" ^{2The 2.3-4}

But the pope's champions argue that it is for the profit and salvation of the church, indeed, that it is necessary for the church, for some one bishop to have preeminence over the others, both in dignity and power. But let them dispute and set forth their idol as they please. Those who simply confess the truth must freely acknowledge that the pope is antichrist; for what these men babble about the supremacy of the pope is flatly repugnant to the doctrine of the gospel and of the apostles. For what more evident thing can be alleged against their disputations, than what the Lord said to his disciples, when they strived for sovereignty?

"The kings of the Gentiles reign over them, and they that bear rule over them are called gracious lords. But you shall not be so; but let the greatest among you be as the least; and the chief, as he that serves. For who is greater; he that sits at table, or he that serves? is not he that sits at table? And I am among you as he that serves." ^{Luk 22.25-27}

I alleged this place and also briefly discussed it in my former sermon.¹ This simple and plain truth shall continue invincible against all the disputations of these harpies.² The most holy apostles of our Lord Christ will not be lords over any man under the pretence of religion;³ Indeed, St. Peter in plain words forbids lordship over God's heritage, and commands bishops to be examples to the flock. ^{1Pet 5.3}

Though they object, that Christ said to Peter, "You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church; and I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven," etc. and, "Feed my sheep;" and thus, St. Peter was appointed over all the apostles, and in them over all priests, ministers ⁴ and bishops, the chief and prince, yes, and the monarch of the whole world — it does nothing at all to establish their dominion or lordship. We willingly grant, that St. Peter is the chief of the apostles; and we also ourselves willingly call St. Peter the prince of the apostles; but it is in that sense that we call Moses, David, Elijah, or Isaiah, the chief or prince of the prophets; that is to say, those who have obtained far more excellent gifts than the rest.

But we deny that Peter was the chief or prince, in the way that these men would have him; and we deny it again most constantly. And with this, we defend St. Peter, and clear him from those spots with which these men strive to defile him, even being dead. He would not have remained faithful towards his master, if he had taken rule or dominion to himself. In all places, we read that Peter was equal with the other disciples; but in no place in the scripture do we read that he was their master. And St. Paul, in the beginning of his epistle to the Galatians, shows in many words, that in apostleship, he is not at all inferior to Peter. Nor when he came to Jerusalem, did he come that he might kiss Peter's feet, or to profess subjection to him; but that by their meeting and friendly conference together, everyone throughout the church might understand there was perfect consent in opinions between Peter and Paul, and that, touching apostleship, their authority was equal. In the same place, Paul calls James, Peter, and John, pillars. ^{Gal 2.9} He does not attribute that prerogative to Peter alone; notwithstanding, he would have rightly done this, if he had received supremacy at the hands of the Lord, as these men affirm. How does it happen that Peter does nothing of his own head, but refers ecclesiastical matters to the rest of the disciples, as to his fellows in authority? We may see this in the Acts. In another place, he calls himself a fellow-elder, ^{iPet 5.1} not the prince of priests. When he was sent by the apostles with John into Samaria, he does not require another to be sent, lest his supremacy seem to be diminished, but he willingly obeys. But if we were to grant that Peter was chief of the apostles in the way that these men affirm; would it follow from this, that the pope is the prince of the whole church, indeed, of the whole world? For just as the pope is not Peter; so the twelve or eleven apostles are not the whole world. Moreover, Peter could not give what he did not have. He did not have an empire over the whole world; therefore he did not give it.

But Constantine gave it to Sylvester, they say.¹ Even if we perfectly agreed that the donation of Constantine was true, and not feigned or forged (which the best learned men affirm), Sylvester himself would still not have received an imperie, or dominion, even though it had been offered to him.

For the voice of the high and heavenly prince, Christ, would have been of more authority with him than the foolish affection of an earthly emperor ("The kings of the nations bear rule over them, but it shall not be so with you,"). Shall we believe that Peter would have received secular power with imperial government, if the emperor Nero had proffered it him? No; in no way. For this word of the Lord took deep root in his inward bowels: "But it shall not be so with you." Before he had received the Holy Ghost, wandering in blindness with the rest of the multitude of Jews, he imagined that the kingdom of Christ on earth would be an earthly kingdom. But after he received the Holy Ghost, he understood that the throne of Christ, the chief king and emperor, was not on the earth, but situated in heaven.² He knew that Christ our Lord fled into the wilderness when the people thought to make him a king. He knew that Elisha by most wholesome counsel refused the reward of Naaman, the prince; and that Gehazi his servant, to his everlasting reproach and the overthrow of his own health, required it afterward from his hand. St. Peter would not take upon himself the charge of the poor, lest he thereby with less diligence attend to prayer and the preaching of the word of God; the Acts of the Apostles witness this. Who therefore thinks it likely that, casting aside the office of apostleship, he would have received the empire even of the whole world? He denies that one man can both happily execute the charge of the ministry of the word, and also minister to the necessity of the poor. But what pope would they give to us, who has the Spirit more fully than Peter had? who can perform what Peter could not? who can not only serve at tables, but also govern the whole world? Therefore, these are trifles which they repeat to us touching the donation of Constantine. Constantine was more sound than to frame such a donation which he knew was repugnant to the doctrine of Christ. Sylvester was more upright than to receive what he knew could not be received without the utter overthrow of the ministry of the word.

But if Constantine gave that altogether, which he is said to have given, and Sylvester did not refuse his donation, then both of them offended, because both dealt against the word of God.

² Ac regnum ejus non esse ex hoc mundo, Lat. omitted; and that his kingdom is not of this world.

5-3. THE THIRD SERMON: OF THE MINISTERS OF GOD'S WORD.

In recent years, I saw what Augustine Steuchus, a man otherwise well-learned and greatly read, has written against Laurentius Valla, touching Constantine's donation.¹ But he brings no sound arguments, though he wonderfully rages, and puts all the force of his eloquence to use, and finally, he busily heaps together from all places whatever, by any manner of means, may seem to further this cause. And truly, that book seems better worthy to be trodden underfoot, than to be occupied in good men's hands. For I do not invent words: he often calls that ecclesiastical kingdom of Rome eternal,² even though the kingdom of Christ and the saints alone is eternal. Does he not manifestly place the pope in the seat of Christ our Lord? For, after he had recited the testimony of one pope Nicolas, he immediately adds:

"You hear that the high bishop of Constantine is called God, and counted for God. This truly was done when he adorned him with that famous edict; he worshipped him as God, as the successor of Christ and Peter. As much as he could, he gave divine honours to him, he worshipped him as the living image of Christ."³

This far, in the sixty-seventh section of his book. Nor has he written differently in the twenty-eighth section. For, recalling certain imaginations of his own, conceived about the pope, he pretends (I cannot tell) what fruit would come of it, if it were made known among the furthest Indians, that all the kingdoms of the world are governed by the pope's beckoning; that kings worship him, as being something very well known to them, that he is the successor of Christ.

And therefore, they do not receive him as a mortal man, so much as God himself in him, who has substituted him in his place on earth. And therefore, we ought to abstain from reproachful words, if he sins in anything as a man, because in him they worship the Son of God.⁴ Do you think Peter would have suffered these wicked rejoicings, and these flattering or rather sacrilegious voices? Peter lifted up Cornelius when he fell down before him, who would have worshipped him, and said, "Arise; I myself am also a man." ^{Act 10.26} We also read that the angel himself said to John, who fell down and would have worshipped at the angel's feet: "See that you do not do it; for I am your fellow-servant, and of your brethren the prophets." ^{Rev 22.9} It is also written of Herod Agrippa, because he did not repress the flattering voices of the people, who cried when he had ended his oration, "It is the voice of a God, and not of a man," ^{Act 12.22} that he was therefore struck by the angel of God, and he rotted away, being eaten by worms. Therefore, since we know that Christ himself, the Son of God, yet reigns in the church, to whom alone all glory and power is given; and he has not substituted any man on the earth, in whom he would be worshipped and served; we worship and serve Christ Jesus alone, the Son of God; and we utterly abhor the pope as antichrist, and a dunghill-god, or (if you will) a god of the jakeshouse,⁵ together with the sacrilegious⁶ clawbacks and blasphemous flatterers.

The Lord indeed said to St. Peter: "You are Peter; and on this rock I will build my church: and I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven," etc. But in what way do these sayings establish the monarchy, prerogative, and dignity of the pope?

Peter is commended of the Lord for the constancy of his faith: upon which also he received his name, being called Peter a petra, that is, of the rock, in which he settled himself by a true faith. Christ is that rock to which Peter stayed. He hears, that this shall be the perpetual foundation of the church; that all will be received into the fellowship of the church, who with a true faith confess with Peter, that Jesus Christ is the very Son of God, and rest upon him as the only rock and salvation. Moreover, the keys of the kingdom of God are promised to Peter. But when they are delivered, they are not given to Peter alone, but to all the apostles. For "the keys" are not (as these men imagine) a certain dominion and jurisdiction; but the ministry of opening and shutting the kingdom of heaven; to let into the church, and to shut out; which is wrought by the preaching of the gospel, as it shall shortly be said more abundantly. In the same manner, when Christ said to Peter, "Feed my sheep," he did not give Peter the monarchy of the whole world and dominion over all creatures, but committed to him a pastoral cure;¹ I have spoken about this in my last sermon, and also elsewhere, both often and largely against the supremacy of the bishop of Rome.² As for the ancient writers of the church which they object to us, testifying I know not what about the supremacy of Peter, we will answer in one word: that we do not care so much what the old writers thought about this, as what Christ the Son of God instituted; and what the apostles practised (whose authority far excels the judgment³ of the old writers), and what they have left both in their writing and in examples for us to judge and follow. I have also spoken of this in the second sermon of this decade.

We have almost gone further than we determined. Therefore, that we may draw to an end, we have spoken about the order or office which the Lord instituted in his church; and whom he has placed over it, by whose labour He will establish, govern, further, and preserve his church. Those things which remain to be said, we will put off until tomorrow. For they are longer than can be finished at this time; but they are more worthy and more excellent than to be restricted to a few words, etc.

5-4. THE FOURTH SERMON: OF THE CALLING TO MINISTRY.

OF CALLING TO THE MINISTRY OF THE WORD OF GOD. WHAT MANNER OF MEN, AND IN WHAT FASHION, MINISTERS OF THE WORD MUST BE ORDAINED IN THE CHURCH.
OF THE KEYS OF THE CHURCH. WHAT THE OFFICE IS OF THOSE WHO ARE ORDAINED.
OF THE MANNER OF TEACHING THE CHURCH; AND OF THE HOLY LIFE OF THE PASTORS.

In this present sermon, by God's assistance, we will as briefly and plainly as we can, set forth for you, dearly beloved, what manner of men ministers should be; and in what way it behoves us ¹ to ordain ministers today — not speaking again of the office, but of persons fit for the office. For I do not think it necessary or profitable to show at large that the order or function instituted by Christ in the church, suffices even today to gather, govern, and preserve the church of God on earth; indeed, without these orders in these last ages, new inventions are instituted. For the thing itself witnesses, and the absolute perfection of the primitive church avouches it. But that it may be plainly understood by all men, whom it behoves the church today to ordain ministers, we will speak a little more amply about the calling of the ministers of the church.

Calling; is nothing other than a lawful appointing of a fit minister. The same may also be called both ordination and election, though one word is larger in signification than the other. Election goes before by nature; for whom we choose, those we call. Ordination comprehends either of them. But there are four kinds of calling numbered by almost all men. The two former are lawful, the two latter are unlawful.

The FIRST kind of calling is where ministers are called neither of men, nor by man, but by God — we read that Isaiah the prophet and the apostle Paul were called this way. This kind is confirmed for the most part with signs or miracles, and it is called a heavenly and secret calling.

The SECOND kind of calling is made of God indeed, but by the ordination of men: We read that Matthew, Luke, and Timothy, were created ministers of the church in this way. This kind is ordinary, public, used by men, and common today. God indeed calls, bestowing necessary gifts upon his ministers, and appointing laws for those who elect them. Following those laws, they ordinarily elect the one whom, by signs, they conjecture was first called of God. By signs, I mean the necessary gifts for ministers.

Now the THIRD kind of calling, which is the first of the unlawful callings, indeed comes from men, but not from God; such as when some unworthy person is ordained for favour and rewards. And here sin is committed, by those who are ordained, as well as by those who bear rule in the ordination. It is sin by those who are ordained, when they desire to be placed in the ministry, for which they either do not understand, or they will not understand, that they are very unfit, being destitute of the necessary gifts; or else, when they are sufficiently furnished with knowledge of the scriptures and other things, yet they do not take the right path to this function — that is to say, when they do not regard the glory of God but their own gain. For what is required of those who are to be ordained, is a testimony of their own conscience, and a secret calling; namely, by which we are well known to ourselves to be moved to take this office upon us, not through ambition, not for covetousness, not for a desire to feed the belly, nor from any other lewd affection; but through the sincere fear and love of God, and a desire to edify the church of God. St. Paul has written of this very eloquently and holily in 1Thess. 2. Besides this, the testimony by others of [the candidate's] sound learning and skilfulness in things, is also required. For all of us please ourselves and esteem ourselves worthy, to have the government of the church committed to us, even though we foully deceive ourselves. And those who have the authority of ordination offend when, in ordaining ministers, they do not regard what God has willed to be done in this as set down by his laws, and what the state and safety of the church requires, but only what is for the commodity of the one to be ordained.

Often-times, therefore, unworthy persons are ordained; or those who are unlearned, and not very sound;¹ or else those who are sufficiently learned, but not of a good reputation;² or those who are simple and good Christians, but unfit and unskilful pastors. And they are allured to this through favour or bribes. Thus they provoke the most heavy wrath of almighty God upon themselves, and make themselves partakers of all those sins of which they are the authors, in that they do not uprightly execute the charge committed to them. Our elders³ called this sin simony, an offence punishable with no less punishment than shameful reproach⁴ and death ever-lasting. Anthemius the emperor,⁵ writing to Armasius,⁶ says among other things:

"Let no man make merchandise of the degree of priesthood by the greatness of price; but let every man be esteemed for his merits, and not according to what he is able to give. Let that profane thirst for covetousness cease to bear rule in the church, and let that horrible fault be banished far from holy congregations. Let the bishop be chosen in our time, in this manner: for being chaste and lowly, so that in whatever place he comes, he may purge all things with the uprightness of his own life. Let a bishop be ordained not with a price, but with prayers. He ought to be so far from a desire for promotion, that he must be sought by compulsion; and being desired, he ought to shun it; and if he is entreated, he ought to fly away. Let this alone be his furtherance: that he is importuned by excuses to avoid it. For truly he is unworthy of the ministry that is not ordained against his will."⁷

This much from him. If he were to come to Rome today, he would think without a doubt that he had come into a strange world; yes, into the mart of Simon — not of Peter, but of Simon Magus the Samaritan, Act 8.9-24 and of Gehazi the Israelite. 2Kng 5.20-27

The FOURTH kind of calling is that by which any man thrusts himself into the ministry of his own private affection,⁸ being neither ordained of God, nor yet by man. About this kind of men, the Lord says in Jeremiah: "I have not sent them, and yet they ran." Jer 23.21 Cyprian, writing to Antonianus,⁹ calls such men schismatics, who usurp for themselves the office of a bishop, no man giving it to them.¹⁰ And this kind of calling is improperly called a calling.

Thus it is evident that in the church, there must be a calling that is public and lawful for many other causes, but especially for these: that the ordinance of God is not neglected, and that the discipline of the church is retained, and that all men in the church may know who are preferred to the ecclesiastical ministry. Therefore, even though Paul, the apostle and doctor of the Gentiles, in the beginning was not sent of men, nor by men, but of God only, yet this same Paul, at the commandment of the Holy Ghost, is separated by the church of Antioch, together with Barnabas, to the ministry of the Gentiles. In the same manner, many others were sent or called of God; nevertheless, it behoved them to be ordained also by men. For Paul says in another place: "And no man takes this honour to himself, but he that is called of God, as Aaron was." ^{Heb 5.4} And again: "How shall they hear without a preacher, and how shall they preach except they be sent?" etc. ^{Rom 10.14}

Concerning that second kind of calling, which is common and received today in the church, and yet appointed by the Lord, there are three things to be considered: first, who they are that call; that is, who have right and authority to call, or to ordain ministers; secondly, who, or what manner of men, are to be ordained; and lastly, in what manner those who are called, are to be ordained.

And first of all, the Lord has given power and authority to his church to elect and ordain fit ministers. We have declared this before, in the second sermon of this decade, by the example of the ancient churches in the world, Jerusalem and Antioch. Of these two, the church of Jerusalem not only ordained seven deacons, but also Matthias the apostle. ^{Act 1.23}

And the church of Antioch separated to the ministry Paul and Barnabas, the famous apostles of Christ. ¹ The churches of the Gentiles being instructed by Paul and Barnabas, they ordained them elders or governors of those churches by election, obtained by voices. ² The primary ones in this election were the pastors themselves; for Peter governing the action, Matthias was created apostle by the church. ^{Act 1.15, 26} The ancient church diligently observed this form or order for many years. For Cyprian says, Epist. Lib. i. Epist. 4:

"The common people especially have power either to choose worthy priests, or to refuse those who are unworthy. Also we see this thing descends from the authority of God; that the priest is chosen in the presence of the common people, before all men's eyes, and is admitted to be worthy and fit by public judgment and witness. As in Numbers, the Lord commanded Moses, saying: 'Take Aaron your brother, and Eleazar his son, and bring them up into the mount, before all the congregation.' God commands the priest to be ordained before the whole congregation: that is, he teaches and shows that the ordaining of priests should not be done without the knowledge of the people being present; that in their presence, either the vices of the evil might be discovered, or the merits of the good commended; and this is a just and lawful ordaining, which shall be examined by the election and judgment of all." ³

This custom and manner endured up to the time of St. Augustine; for it is to be seen in his hundred and tenth epistle which witnesses that the people giving a shout, Augustine ordained Eradius as his successor. ⁴ In these latter times, because the people often made tumults in the elections of pastors, the ordination was committed to chosen men of the pastors, magistrates, and people. These three kinds of men put forward or named notable men, out of whom the one who was thought best was chosen. There is something about this here: In Justiniani Imperat. Novel. Constitut. 123. ⁵

Those who think that all power of ordaining ministers is in the bishops', diocesans', or archbishops' hands, use these places of the scripture: "For this cause I left you in Crete "(says Paul to Titus), "that you should ordain elders in every city." ^{Tit 1.5} And again: "Lay hands hastily on no man." ^{1Tim 5.22} But we say that the apostles did not exercise tyranny in the churches; and that they did not execute all things about election or ordination alone, excluding other men in the church. For the apostles of Christ ordained bishops or elders in the church, but not without communicating their counsel with the churches; yes, and not without having the consent and approbation of the people. This may appear by the election or ordination of Matthias, which we have now recounted once or twice. Truly, the Lord in the law says to Moses: "You shall appoint judges." ^{Deu 16.18} But in another place he says: "You shall seek out among all the people whom you may make rulers." ¹ And again, Moses to the same people: "Bring men of wisdom and understanding, and I will make them rulers over you," etc. Therefore, just as Moses does nothing of his own will in the election of the magistrate, though it was said to him, "You shall appoint judges," but he does all things communicating his counsel with the people, so undoubtedly Titus, though it was said to him, "Ordain elders in every city," he understood that nothing was permitted by this which he might do privately as he thought good, not having the advice and consent of the churches.

Therefore those who shake off the yoke and tyranny of the bishops of Rome for good and reasonable causes, do not sin at all; they recover that ancient right granted by Christ to the churches.

Nor is it any great matter whether discreet men chosen by the church, or the whole church itself, ordain fit ministers; nor whether it is done by voices, by lots, or in some certain necessary and holy manner. For in these things, godly men will not provoke contention, so that all things are done holily and in order. But here I will not dig up the crafts, deceits, practices, and grievous wars, taken in hand for this right of ordaining, along with the shedding of much blood, spoilings, and the lamentable burnings of countries. The histories of the acts of Henry the IV and V, and also of the affairs of the Frederiches,² most evidently witness how impudently and abominably the popes of Rome have behaved themselves, along with the sworn friends of the bishops. Perhaps I will have occasion to speak of this matter elsewhere.

Master Bullinger has written more largely of this matter elsewhere in these words: "Because among the tumults and factions of the people, nothing was done according to the prescript of God's word, but all things were done upon affections, by which the worst were ordained, instead of the best. To the end that this might not be, and that the best, the most learned, and the godliest ministers might be appointed to churches, the whole right of choosing them was granted to bishops," etc. And a little after, "Therefore, if any (of the bishops) well use this right or authority to the edifying of the church, it is very well. But if any of them abuse it through tyranny, let them either be brought into good order by the godly magistrate, or else let the right or authority to appoint ministers be taken from them." ³

Now we will declare what manner of men it behoves us to ordain as ministers. Truly, not whoever lusts, but the choicest men of sound religion, furnished with all kinds of sciences, exercised in the scriptures, skilled in the mystery of faith and religion, strong and constant, earnest, painful, diligent, faithful, watchful, modest, of a holy and approved conversation, lest through their corruption of life and scant good name and fame, the whole ministry become vile, and that which they build up with wholesome doctrine, their wicked life pulls down again.

We will repeat the rule of the apostle. fully comprehending all things pertaining to this matter:

"You shall ordain elders, or bishops, if any are blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, who are not slandered by riot, nor are disobedient; for if a man cannot rule his own house, how will he care for the church of God? For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God; (for it is required in stewards, that a man be found faithful ¹Cor 4.2); not froward, not angry, no striker, but gentle, not given to wine, not covetous, not given to filthy lucre, but barbarous, one who loves goodness, watchful, sober, righteous, godly, temperate, modest, apt to teach, holding fast the faithful word which is according to doctrine, so that he may be able both to exhort in wholesome doctrine, and to improve ¹ those that speak against it, and to stop their mouths: no young scholar, lest being puffed up, he fall into the condemnation of the devil. He must also have a good report of them who are outside, lest he fall into the rebuke and snare of the devil...." ¹Tim 3.2-7; Tit 1.6-9

All these are the words of the apostle, recited out of the first Epistle to Timothy, and in his epistle to Titus.

Therefore, exact judgment and great diligence are very needful in this case, to discuss all the points of doctrine and life. I say a strict trial of life and perfect examination of learning are needful: for this is not a matter of small weight; the whole safety of the church hangs upon this. If any unworthy and unlearned are ordained, the whole church is neglected for the most part, led astray, and overthrown. But we do not mean a childlike and scholar-like examination; but a grave and strait examination of knowledge in the scripture and its true interpretation, of the charge of a pastor, of the mysteries of sound faith, and of other similar points. That the elders in times past were very diligent in these things, it may appear by what Ælius Lampridius recites, in the life of Alexander Severus: that it was the manner among the Christians to offer the names of their bishops to the whole church before they were received, if perhaps any among the people would show a reason why he was unworthy of such an office.²

Thus Justinian the emperor writes, Const. 123: "If at the time of ordination, any accuser stands up and says [the candidate] is unworthy to be ordained, let all things be deferred, and let examination and judgment be had first." ³ And here I will at present recite the decree of the 4th council of Carthage on this matter, which is related in this way:

"When a bishop is to be ordained, let him first be examined, whether he is by nature wise, if he is able to teach, if he is temperate in behaviour, if chaste in life, if he is sober, if careful about his own business, if lowly, if courteous, if merciful, if learned, if instructed in the law of the Lord, if wary and careful in the sense and meaning of the scriptures, if exercised in the opinions of the church; and above all things, if he teaches the grounds of faith with substantial words (or perhaps, of less moment), that is to say, confirming that the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, are one God, and avouching the whole Godhead of the Trinity to be co-essential, and consubstantial, and co-eternal, and co-omnipotent; if he acknowledge every person by himself in the Trinity to be perfect God, and the whole three persons to be one God; if he believes the incarnation of God, not wrought in the Father, nor in the Holy Ghost, but in the Son only: so that he who was the Son of God in the Father, the same should be made the son of Man in the manhood of his mother; very God of the Father, and very man of his mother, having flesh in the womb of his mother, and having in him a human and reasonable soul together of either nature — that is to say, God and man, one person, one Son, one Christ, one Lord, creator of all things. and the author, lord, and governor of all creatures, with the Father and the Holy Ghost; who suffered a true suffering of his flesh, died with the true death of his body, rose again with the true taking again of his flesh and a true taking again of his soul, in which he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

He must also be asked, if he believes one and the self-same author and Lord of the new and old Testament, that is to say, of the law, the prophets, and apostles; if the devil became evil, not by creation, but by choice. He must also be asked, if he believes the resurrection of this flesh which we bear, and none other; if he believes the judgment to come, and that everyone shall receive according to that they have done in the flesh, either punishments or rewards; if he does not forbid marriage, if he does not condemn bigamy or second marriage; if he does not condemn the eating of flesh; if he has fellowship with penitent persons who are reconciled; if he believes that all sins are forgiven in baptism, original sin in which we are born, as well as those sins which we commit willingly; if he believes that none who are outside the catholic church can be saved, etc. When he is examined on all these points, and found fully instructed; then let him be ordained a bishop, with the consent of the clergy and laity, and by the assembly of the bishops of the whole province, and especially of the metropolitan." ¹

This council is said to be celebrated in the year of the Lord 400.

But I do not repeat these things as if I stood upon the decrees of councils and men; or as if I thought all things which pertain to true salvation and perfection were not contained in the holy scriptures; but to admonish our adversaries, that their manners and doings today not only do not agree with the examples and doctrines of the apostles, but they do not so much agree with the decrees of the ancient writers. If perhaps they were to look within themselves, leaving the diverse doctrine of men, they might receive the most ancient tradition and the most infallible doctrine of the holy apostles.

I come now to the declaration of the last point; that is to say, in what manner those who are called, are to be ordained. The apostles in their ordinations exhorted the church to fasting and prayer; and those who were called, they placed and set in the sight of the church, and laying their hands on the heads of those who were ordained, they committed the churches to them. I have spoken elsewhere of the laying on of hands.² It was a signification of the charge committed to them. Nor is it read that among the old fathers there was any other consecrating of pastors, just as all other things in the primitive and apostolic church were also simple and not sumptuous. In the ages following, ceremonies increased, and yet in such a way that to some at the beginning, they did not seem to have altogether exceeded measure.

But to me, that seems to be overmuch which is added to God's institution at man's pleasure. And, I ask you, what need is there to patch men's fancies and customs to the institutions of the apostles? Why does the laying on of hands not suffice you, since it sufficed the blessed apostles, who were far holier than you and more skilful in heavenly matters? Afterward oil was added; the book of the gospels was also added. For in this manner, the fourth council of Carthage decrees: "When a bishop is ordained, let two bishops place and hold over his head and shoulders the book of the gospels; and one pouring upon him the blessing, let all the other bishops that are present touch his head with their hands." ¹ Those of latter times have added a pall to it. ² But today there is no end of ceremonies, or rather, of follies. If any man diligently compares their ceremonies with the attire of Aaron and the Jewish priests, he will swear the whole of Aaronism has been brought back by them into the church. Indeed, this is more sumptuous ³ and burdensome; and it is so contrary to the doctrine of the gospel, that at this time I affirm their consecration is both infamous, and fully stuffed with excess, pride, and offence, and by that means, it is intolerable. There is another thing to be noted, which is that, even if among the old fathers, consecration increased by multiplying ceremonies, it was freely bestowed; nor was there anything in it, or in the whole church of Christ, that was for sale. But today, it is a shame even to speak of how expensive the palls are, sold by that Romish Canaanite,⁴ and the great costs by which consecrations are made. Gregory, in the council at Rome, celebrated in the time of Mauricius and Theodosius, decrees among other things:

"Following the ancient rule of the fathers, I ordain that there be nothing at any time taken for ordinations, nor for giving the pall,⁵ nor for the delivery of the bulls. For seeing that in the ordaining of a bishop, the high bishop lays his hand upon him, and the minister reads the lesson from the gospel, and the notary writes the epistle of his confirmation — just as it is not becoming for the bishop to sell the hand that he lays on him, so in the ordination it is not becoming for the minister to sell his voice, nor for the notary to sell his pen. But if any man presumes to make any gain by it, he will be sure before the judgment-seat of Almighty God, to undergo the sharp sentence due to so horrible an offence." Yet he immediately adds: "But if the one who is ordained were to offer anything, not as required, but of his own free will, and only for favour's sake, we grant that he may." ⁶

I have declared up to here what manner of men, and of what sort, bishops or pastors must be who are ordained in the church of God. And although it may be easily gathered from those things, why we do not allow ourselves today to be ordained by those who are called (and seem to themselves to be the only) "lawful ordinaries" — that is to say, those who in the Romish Church descend from the apostles by continual succession — I will yet, if I can, declare the reason somewhat more plainly. I have spoken elsewhere ⁷ of the continual succession of bishops or pastors, and of the church, so that it would be superfluous here to repeat and rip it up again. I have also proved, that our churches are the true churches of God, though they do not agree with the late upstart church of Rome. And it is evident that true churches have power to ordain pastors, whether it is done by the voices of the whole church, or by the lawful judgment of those who are chosen by the church. It consequently follows, that those who our churches ordain, or rather, which the churches of Christ ordain, are lawfully ordained.

And there are weighty causes why the holy churches of God refuse to have their ministers ordained by popish ordinaries. For St. Paul says: "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preaches any other gospel to you than that which we have preached to you, let him be accursed." ^{Gal 1.8} And these men preach another gospel beside that which Paul preached; we would have this understood as touching the sense (in which there is more danger), and not the words. And therefore these men are struck from heaven with this curse or excommunication. But who can abide to be ordained by those who are struck with a curse, or excommunicated? Moreover, the chief thing in the ordination, is the doctrine of the gospel — seeing that ministers of the church are especially ordained to this end: that they preach the pure gospel of Christ sincerely to the people, and without mingling man's traditions. But this very thing they not only most strictly forbid those who are ordained, but they also compel them to abjure ¹ by a certain kind of oath which they offer to them. For they are bound by that wicked oath, not made to Christ, but to the pope against Christ. For among other things, those who are elected bishops take their oath in this way:

"I, N. elected bishop of N., from this time forth will be faithful and obedient to blessed Peter, and to the holy apostolic church of Rome, and to our lord N. the pope, and to his successors entering canonically. The counsel which they commit to me by themselves or messengers, or by their letters, to their hindrance I will not willingly disclose to any man. I will be a helper to them, to retain and defend against all men the popedom of Rome and the royalties of St. Peter. I will endeavour to keep, defend, increase, and enlarge the rights, honours, privileges, and authority of the church of Rome, of our lord the pope, and of his foresaid successors. Nor will I be in counsel, practice, or treaty, in which shall be imagined against our lord the pope himself, or the church of Rome, any sinister or prejudicial matter to their persons, right, honour, state, or power. And if I understand such things to be imagined or procured by any, I will hinder them as much as it lies in me; and with as much speed as I conveniently may, I will signify it to our said lord, or some other by whom it may come to his knowledge.

The rules of the holy fathers, the decrees, ordinances, sentences, dispositions, reservations, provisions, and apostolic commandments, I will observe with my whole might, and cause them to be observed by others. Heretics, schismatics, and rebels against our lord the pope, I will persecute, and fight against to my ability." ²

Since these men are sworn thus in this manner, who, I beg you, that is a faithful lover of Jesus Christ, of his church, of true faith — yes, and add to this, of the commonwealth — can abide to be ordained by them? There is no talk in their oath of the gospel, nor of our Lord Jesus Christ himself. There is no mention of the holy scriptures; but there is most diligent mention of the rules and ordinances of the fathers. Peter is named; but it is not that apostle of Christ who said, "Silver and gold have I none;" but another Peter, I know not who, having kingly dignity. Indeed, the apostolic church is named; but later, by interpretation, they add what manner of church they would have it understood to be, for they call it the papalty.

This papalty — not the church of God, I say, but the papalty, and the honours, privileges, and rights of the popedom — behold, they promise they will defend this against all men. For they acknowledge the pope as their lord, against whom they would have nothing imagined; indeed, if they know that others devise anything against the pope and popedom, they promise to discover it, and faithfully help against it. I do not think that any man can bind himself more strictly to someone.

² Pontificale Roman, p. 63. Rom 1818. — Among the Simler MSS. in the City Library at Zurich is a letter from Martin Micronius, dated London, 14 April, 1553, in which he inquires of Bullinger, where he had taken this form of oath from: for he says; "Extat forma quoredam juramenti episcoporum, Lib. II. Decretal, de juramento, titul. 24. c. 4. Ego N. sed ea non per omnia respondet formae a te perscriptae."

Neither is it unknown that those whom they call heretics, are not enemies to the Christian faith, nor teachers of opinions contrary to the scriptures, but rebels to the pope. They are, I say, those who, as they neglect the decrees and laws of the pope, and preach the scriptures only, so they give all the glory to Christ, as to the only head and high priest of the church. And therefore, they teach that the pope is neither the head nor the high priest of the church.

But who, loving true godliness, can bind himself with such an oath? Who would renounce and forsake the friendship of Christ, and humble himself to become the bond-slave and footstool of the pope of Rome? To be short, who would desire to be ordained a minister of Christ and of his church, at the hands of those who have done in this manner?

Here may be added, that in the consistory of Rome, all things touching holy orders are most corrupt, insomuch as scarcely any small tokens of Christ's institution appear. I will not repeat at present, that there are many new constitutions of men joined to them; that in a way, no voice of the church remains in the ordination of pastors — no "choice" is made of those whom the church deposes¹ for this end. For the right of presentation, collation, and confirmation, being dispersed among many, has even become a heritage with some; so that both fools and half-wits² may be made ministers or bishops. Nor can I let this pass: that true examination and sharp pastoral discipline is lost with them. An examination remains, but it is altogether childish, one in which those who are ordained are lightly asked what is usually demanded of scholars in common schools: whether one can read well, construe well, sing, and be skilled in numbers?

They cannot deny this; nor also this: that priests are ordained more to read, to sing, and to say mass, than to govern the church with the word of God. Thus more regard is had of the voice, that it is apt for singing, than of skilfulness or experience in the holy scriptures. But they think the matter is nicely handled if some skilful lawyer is preferred to the office of a pastor. For it seems for the most part to be more profitable, to plead craftily in the court for the increase and maintenance of riches, than to preach well in the church for the winning of souls. What? Do we not see men who are sent from the law, and out of the courts of kings and princes, to possess churches, who are better fitted for anything else than governing the churches of God? For ecclesiastical offices have begun to be counted as princes' donatives,³ for which they are called benefices. The bishops of Rome themselves have bestowed priesthoods on their cooks, ravenous soldiers, barbers, and mule-drivers — and this far more honestly, than when they bestowed them on bawds. A great many priests thrust themselves into the holy ministry by violence and simony; an office which nevertheless could not or would not be executed well. And those who are received by a more honest title, are received through commendation and favour; this is greatly availed either by affinity or kindred, and consanguinity. In all these, there is greater regard for the belly than the ministry. They provide better for those who are accounted priests and are not priests, than for the church of God and the salvation of souls. But by this means, all things go to wrack in the church, and the flock of God is oppressed with the weight and ruin of the shepherds.

To this pertains the plurality (as they call it) of benefices. Someone, either soldier or courtier, often rakes to himself — the pope offering it to him — half a dozen benefices or more; of which they take no further care, than to receive the gain. For he never teaches; indeed, he is very seldom at his flock, unless it is when he shears them. In the meantime, the Lord's flock is neglected, and perishes: for the vicars who are set over the flock by them, for the most part, are unlearned and hirelings.

³ Donative: A gift; grant; largess; gratuity; present.

He that is content with the least wages is placed over the flock, whatever manner he may be. And he seems to have enough learning if he can read, sing, say mass, hear confessions, anoint, and read the gospel out of the book on Sunday. What remains to be done beyond that, seems to them to be small matters.

I am ashamed and sorry to repeat what a censure remains for reformation of manners in the church. The thing itself cries, and experience witnesses, that unworthy persons are not shut out from this holy ministry; for all are admitted without difference. And yet whoremongers, drunkards, dice-players, and defiled men, indeed, men overwhelmed with diverse heinous crimes, are allowed in the ministry.

But lest they seem to do nothing in this, the bishop asks at the giving of orders, "Who are worthy of honour?" and his chancellor, or the archdeacon,¹ quickly answers the bishop (who before then, never saw or heard what kind of men they are of whom he bears witness), "They are worthy."² Moreover, they use so many and such kinds of ceremonies in their consecration, that the one who is studious of the truth of the gospel, cannot receive them with a safe conscience. These causes, and others not unlike them, make us such, that we cannot abide being ordained by the ordinaries or bishops of the Romish church.

The LAST POINT remains, which I purposed to declare at the beginning of this treatise: what is the office of the ministers who are ordained in the church. I can show you this in one word: to govern the church of God, or to feed the flock of Christ. For Paul the apostle, speaking to the pastors of Asia, says: "Take heed to yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made you overseers, to rule (or feed)³ the church of God, which he has purchased with his own blood." ^{Act 20.28} And the pastors govern the church of God with God's word, or with wholesome doctrine, and with a holy example of life.

For St. Paul says again to Timothy: "Be an example to those who believe, in word, in conduct, in love, in spirit, in faith, and in pureness." ^{1Tim 4.12} He writes the same to Titus, chapter 2. But the papists forge far other things from the office or function of bishops, and they confirm it, as they also do their other trifles, by the authority or power of "the keys" — as I said when I treated the power of the church.⁴ I will therefore, first of all, say something touching the keys (as much as I think sufficient for this matter).

A key is an instrument very well known to all men, with which gates, doors, and chests, are either shut or opened. It is transferred from bodily things to spiritual things; and it is called the key of knowledge and of the kingdom of heaven. For the Lord says in the gospel of Luke: "Woe to you, interpreters of the law: for you have taken away the key of knowledge; you do not enter in yourselves, and those who came in, you forbade." ^{Luk 11.52} St. Matthew presents the same sentence this way: "Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! because you shut up the kingdom of heaven before men: for you yourselves do not go in, nor do you allow those who would enter, to come in." ^{Mat 23.13} Behold, what Luke calls "taking away the key of knowledge," Matthew expounded as "shutting heaven." The key of knowledge, therefore, is the instruction itself concerning a blessed life: by what means we are made partakers of it. He who takes away the key, is the one who does not instruct the people about true blessedness; or else is a hindrance to it, so that others cannot instruct ¹ them. Therefore, the keys of the kingdom of heaven are nothing else than the ministry of preaching the gospel, or the word of God, committed by God to his ministers, to the end that everyone may be taught which way leads to heaven, and which way carries down to hell. The Lord promised these keys to Peter, and in him to all the other apostles, when he said: "I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatever you bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatever you loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." ^{Mat 16.19}

Let us inquire, therefore, when were the keys delivered to Peter and to the rest? And the agreeable consent of all men is that they were given in the day of the resurrection. But it is evident that this is the same day the ministry or function of preaching the gospel was committed to the apostles. It follows from this, that the keys are nothing else than the ministry of preaching the gospel among all nations. For this is declared to the world; that the salvation purchased by Christ, is communicated to those who believe, and that hell is open for the unbelievers.

But now, let us hear the testimonies of the holy evangelists. John the apostle and evangelist says: "The Lord came to his disciples and said, Peace be to you; as my Father has sent me, so I send you. And when he had said that, he breathed on them, and said to them, Receive the Holy Ghost: whose sins you remit, they are remitted to them; and whose sins you retain, they are retained." ^{Joh 20.22-23} These statements agree with the words by which he promised the keys; for there he said: "Whatever you bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven;" and here he says: "Whose sins you retain, they are retained." There he said: "And whatever you loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven;" and here he says: "Whose sins you remit, they are remitted to them." Therefore, "to bind" is, "to retain sins;" and "to loose" is "to remit sins." You will say, How do men remit sins, since it is written that only God forgives sins? Let other testimonies of the other evangelists therefore be adjoined, expressing that the same history was given in the day of his resurrection. Luke says: "Then the Lord opened their understanding, that they might understand the scriptures; and said to them, Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise again from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." ^{Luk 24.45-47} And Mark says: "He appeared to them as they sat together, and reproveth them for their unbelief and hardness of heart; and he said to them, Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to every creature: he that believes and is baptized, shall be saved; but he that will not believe, shall be damned." ^{Mar 16.14-16}

Therefore, God only forgives sins for those who believe in the name of Christ, that is to say, through ² the merits and propitiation of Christ: but the ministers assuredly declare by the preaching of the gospel, that sins are forgiven; and by that preaching they bind and loose, remit and retain sins. The matter will be made plainer by an example or two. St. Peter, speaking to the citizens of Jerusalem, says: "Repent, and let every one of you be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins; and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." ^{Act 2.38} And so St. Peter used the keys committed to him in this manner: he looses on earth, and remits sins to men, that is, he promises to those who believe, assured remission of sins through Christ. God has confirmed this message, giving remission of sins to the faithful, as they believed. Moreover, the keeper of the prison at Philippi, being amazed, says to Silas and Paul: "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" The apostles answered: "Believe on the Lord Jesus, and you shall be saved, and your whole household." ^{Act 16.30-31} The apostles loosed him that was bound, and forgave him his sins, by the keys, that is, by the preaching of the gospel: since he believed this gospel on earth, the Lord judged him to be loosed in heaven.

These things are taken out of the Acts of the Apostles. In the same book of Acts, we read examples of the contrary in this manner: "The Jews, being filled with indignation, spoke against those things which were spoken by Paul, and railed. But Paul and Barnabas grew bold, and said, It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you: but seeing that you put it away from you, and think yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, look, we turn to the gentiles." ^{Act 13.45-46} Again, when Paul at Corinth had preached Christ to the Jews, and they resisted and reviled him: "The apostle shook his raiment, and said, Your blood be upon your own heads: I am clean: from now on I will go to the gentiles." ^{Act 18.6} And so he bound the unbelievers. And God confirmed the preaching of Paul, because it proceeded from God himself. And unless you put the proper and true key into the lock, you will never open it. The true and right key is the pure word of God; the counterfeit and thievish key is a doctrine and tradition of man, estranged from the word of God.

I think I have sufficiently proved by evident testimonies of the scripture, that the keys given to the apostles and pastors of the church, and so to the church itself, are nothing else than the ministry of teaching the church. For by the doctrine of the gospel, as with certain keys, the gate of the kingdom of heaven is opened — when a sure and ready means and way is shown to attain to the participation of Christ, and the joys of everlasting life, by true faith. Man's record agrees with the testimony of God. For St. John Chrysostom, writing on Matthew chapter 23, says: "The key is the word of the knowledge of the scriptures, by which the gate of truth is opened to men. And the key-bearers are the priests, to whom is committed the word of teaching and interpreting the scriptures." ¹ Because I desire to be brief, I will not bring other testimonies of old interpreters of the scriptures to bear, which do not differ at all from ours.

Since these things are thus, brethren, and they are delivered to us in express scriptures, we do not greatly care what the papists babble touching the power of the keys; and what offices, dignities, preferments, and I know not what other thing, and what authority of priests, they derive from there. We have learned, not out of the words or opinions of men, but out of the manifest word of God, that the keys are the ministry of the preaching of the word of God; and that the keys are given to the apostles, and to their successors. That is to say, the office of preaching remission of sins, repentance, and life everlasting, is committed to them. Thus, we now conclude this: that the chief office of a pastor of the church is to use those very keys which the Lord has delivered to his apostles, and no others; that is, they are to preach the only and pure word of God, and not to fetch any doctrine from any other place, than out of the very word of God. For there is a perpetual and inviolable law today, which was also laid upon our pastors, which we read was laid upon the most ancient governors of the church. The Lord himself witnesses to this in Malachi, saying:

"My covenant was with Levi of life and peace; and I gave him fear, and he feared me, and was afraid before my name. The law of truth was in his mouth, and there was no iniquity found in his lips; he walked with me in-peace and equity, and turned many from their iniquity. For the priest's lips should preserve knowledge, and they should seek the law from his mouth: for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts." ^{Mal 2.4-7} Again, the Lord says to Ezekiel: "You shall hear the word from my mouth, and give them warning from me." ^{Eze 3.17} In Jeremiah the Lord says: "The prophet that has a dream, let him tell a dream; and he that has my word, let him speak my word faithfully." ^{Jer 23.28} He expressly differentiates between heavenly things and earthly things; between those things which are of the word of God, and those that are feigned and chosen by man, which he wills¹ to let pass as uncertain things, and as dreams. For he immediately adds: "Is not my word as fire, says the Lord, and like a hammer that breaks the hard stone?" ^{Jer 23.29} And again: "Do not hear not the words of the prophets who preach to you and deceive you: truly, they teach you vanity; for they speak the meaning of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord." ^{Jer 23.16}

Therefore, all the true prophets of God have this continually in their mouth: "Thus says the Lord; The mouth of the Lord has spoken it." And therefore they delivered to the people nothing contrary to the word of God. The old people also had the scripture; and the prophets were nothing else than interpreters of the law, applying it to their place, time, matters, and persons. Also our Lord Jesus Christ oftentimes says that his doctrine is not his own, but the Father's — which, if you understand this literally and according to his words, I do not know whether anything more absurd can be spoken. Therefore, the Lord means that his doctrine is not of man, but of God. Does he not send us continually to the writings of the law and to the prophets, and confirm his own sayings by them? But Christ is the only teacher of religion, and master of life, appointed to the universal church by God the Father. To this church, he himself also sends teachers, and shows them what they should deliver,² saying: "Teach them to observe those things which I have commanded you."

Also: "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures." ^{Mar 16.15} But the apostle Paul witnesses that the gospel was promised by the prophets of God in the holy scriptures. And the apostles delivered to the nations this doctrine received from Christ, adding nothing to it, taking nothing from it; and with this they also expounded the ancient writings of the prophets. Yet in this matter, they trusted nothing to their own wit, nor to being ruled by their own judgment. For the apostle Peter says: "As every man has received the gift, even so, minister it to one another, as good stewards of the manifold graces of God. If any man speaks, let him talk as the words of God." ^{1Pet 4.10-11} Tertullian also, in his book entitled De Praescript. Haeret. (which I also repeated elsewhere), expressly says:

"It is not lawful for us in anything to rest upon our own fancy or judgment, nor to be negligent markers of what any other man brings forth from his own brain. We have the apostles of the Lord for authors; for they themselves did not choose anything which they might establish after their own fancy; and the doctrine which they received from Christ, they faithfully delivered to the nations. Therefore, even if an angel from heaven were to preach otherwise, he shall be accursed at our hands." ³

We have moreover shown in our sermons about faith and the church, that faith depends upon the word of God alone; and that it wholly stays upon the word of God alone; and also that the churches of God are built and preserved by the word of God, and not by man's doctrine ⁴ — all of which seems to pertain to this matter.

Nor is it left to the bishops of the church of Christ, as the popish pastors falsely boast, to ordain new laws, and to broach new opinions. For the doctrine, which was delivered to the apostles of Christ, is simply to be received by the church, and simply and purely to be delivered by the pastors to the church, which is the congregation of those who believe the word of Christ. Who does not know what is said by the prophet, "All men are liars; God alone is true"? ¹ The church is the pillar and ground of truth because, as it stays upon the truth of the scriptures, it publishes no other doctrine than what is delivered in the scriptures, nor receives any other being published. And who would claim for himself the glory due to God alone? God is the only lawgiver to all mankind, especially in those things which pertain to religion and a blessed life. For Isaiah says: "The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king; and he himself shall be our Saviour." Isa 33.22 And St. James also says: "There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy." Jas 4.12 God claims this as proper to himself: to rule those who are his, with the laws of his word, over whom He alone has authority of life and death.

Moreover, those laws cannot be godly, which presume to prescribe and teach faith, and the service of God, according to their own fancy. The doctrine concerning faith and the worship of God, unless it is heavenly, is nothing more than what it is said to be. God alone teaches us what is true faith, and what worship he delights in. And therefore, in Matthew the Son of God pronounces from Isaiah: "In vain they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." Mat 15.9 Join to this also, that from the new constitutions of men, there always springs up a wonderful neglect, and yes, a contempt, of the word of God and of heavenly laws. For through our own traditions, as the Lord also says in the gospel, we go astray, and despise the commandments of God. Mat 15.3

Now, since it is manifest where the pastor or doctor must fetch his doctrine from, namely, no other place than out of the scripture of the old and new Testaments, which is the infallible and undoubted word of God; and therefore, this doctrine is certain and immutable.² There now remains something to be said about the manner of teaching, which the teacher or pastor of the church should follow. And here I will only briefly touch the short sum or effect of matters.

Before all other things, therefore, it is required of pastors, that they continually consider it to be spoken to them, which the apostle commanded to be told to Archippus: "Take heed to the ministry that you have received in the Lord, that you fulfil it." Col 4.17 And moreover, that they never turn their eyes away from that lively picture of a good and evil shepherd, which Ezekiel, that famous prophet, sets out in this manner:

"Thus says the Lord God, Woe to the shepherds of Israel who feed themselves: should not the shepherds feed the flocks? You eat the fat; you clothe yourselves with the wool; you kill those who are fed; but you do not feed the sheep: the weak you have not strengthened, the sick you have not healed, nor have you bound up the broken, nor brought back what was driven away, nor sought what was lost; but with cruelty and with rigour you have ruled them." Eze 34.2-4

And again:

"I will feed my sheep, says the Lord God; I will seek what was lost, and bring back what was driven away, and bind up what was broken, and strengthen the weak; but I will destroy the fat and the strong, and I will feed them with judgment." Eze 34.15-16

Hereby we gather that it is the duty of a good pastor or shepherd to feed, and not to devour, the flock; to minister, not to exercise dominion; to seek the safety of his sheep, not his private gain; and also to seek again the lost sheep, that is to say, to bring back those which cannot abide the truth, and wander in the darkness of errors — to bring them home to the church and to the light of the truth; and to restore and bring back again the sheep that is driven or chased away, namely, those who are separated from the fellowship of the saints, or the godly, because of some private affection; to heal or bind up those who are broken; for he means the wounds of sins, which

² definitam, Lat. – definitive.

Jeremiah also commands us to heal. To be short, to strengthen the weak and feeble sheep, and not altogether tread them underfoot; and to bridle those sheep who are strong, that is to say, men flourishing in virtues, lest they be proud and puffed up with the gifts of God, and so fall away. But let him think that these things cannot be performed, except through sound and continual teaching derived out of God's word.

The manner of teaching extends itself to public and private doctrines. By public doctrine the pastor either catechises, that is to say, he instructs, those who are younglings in religion, or others who are grounded in it. To the younglings or ignorant sort, he opens the principles of true religion. For catechesis, or the form of catechising, comprehends the grounds or principles of faith and Christian doctrine; namely, the chief points of the covenant, the Ten Commandments, the articles of faith ¹ or the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and a brief exposition of the sacraments. The ancient churches had catechisers ² properly appointed to this charge. And the Lord commends to us, both in the old Testament and in the new, with great earnestness, the charge of the youth — commanding us to instruct them in true religion, both timely and diligently. Moreover, he sets out great rewards and grievous punishments in that behalf.

Assuredly, no profit or fruit is to be looked for in the church from those hearers who are not perfectly instructed in the principles of religion by catechising. For they do not know not what the pastor in the church speaks of, when they hear the terms covenant, commandment, law, grace, faith, prayer, and the sacraments. Therefore, greatest diligence ought to be used in this, if in anything.

The doctrine, which pertains to the more perfect sort, is specially occupied in the exposition of holy scripture. It may appear out of the writings of the old bishops, that it was the custom in that happy and most holy primitive church, to expound to the churches, not certain parcels of the canonical books, nor some chosen passages from them, but the whole books of the new Testament, as well as of the old. And in so doing, no small fruit came to the churches.³ Just as today we also see by experience, that churches cannot be better instructed, nor more vehemently stirred up, than with the words of God himself, and with the faithful interpretation of the books of the gospel, the law, the prophets, and the apostles.

Here, by the way, we give warning that the interpretation of the scriptures is not a liberty to imagine whatever one desires, and to twist the scriptures whichever way one would; but it is a careful comparing of the scripture, and a special gift of the Holy Ghost. For St. Peter says: "No prophecy in the scripture is of any private interpretation." ^{2Pet 1.20} Therefore, no man has power to interpret the scriptures according to his own fantasy. Nor is the best exposition, that which has the most favourers; as if the best interpretation had the consent of the greater number. For then Arianism and Turkism would excel Christianity by many degrees. That exposition is best, which is not repugnant to faith and love, nor is twisted to defend and spread abroad the glory and covetousness of men. But I have spoken about interpretation of the scriptures in the second sermon of the first decade.⁴

A teacher's exposition of the canonical books of the scripture will be fruitless to the people, unless the scripture is aptly applied, regarding the place, time, matter, and persons of each church. And it must be to this end (which I also taught in the third sermon of this decade ¹): that the church may be edified, not that the teacher in the church may seem better learned or more eloquent. The Lord commends to us the wise steward, and says: "Who is a faithful and wise steward, whom his Lord has made ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season?" ^{Luk 12.42} and following. St. Paul also, writing to Timothy the bishop, says: "Study to show yourself approved to God, a workman not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." ^{2Tim 2.15} Meat is unprofitable unless it is divided and cut into parts. But here the householder knows what portions he should give to every one in his family, not having regard to what delights every one, but to what is most profitable for every one. The same apostle, teaching that all the actions of a preacher in the church ought to be directed to edification, says: "He that prophesies, speaks to men to edifying, and to exhortation, and to comfort." ^{1Cor 14.3} Therefore, teaching of the better sort needs not only the exposition of the holy scripture, but also a plain demonstration, manifest as possible, of the principles and grounds of Christianity.

And chief is an evident doctrine of repentance and remission of sins in the name of Christ; and also a sharp rebuking to be used in due time, or a grave yet wise reproving of their faults. For speaking to his apostles, the Lord says: "You are the salt of the earth; if the salt becomes unsavoury, with what shall it be salted?" ^{Mat 5.13} To this also pertains the confuting of errors and repressing of heresies, and the defence of sound doctrine. Paul says that the "mouths of vain talkers and seducers of minds must be stopped and sharply rebuked." ^{Tit 1.10-11} Nor is it enough simply to teach true religion, unless the teacher in the church, by often teaching, constantly urges, defends, and maintains it. To this chiefly belong these words of Paul:

"I charge [or adjure] you, therefore, before God and before the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and dead at his appearing and in his kingdom; preach the word, be instant in season and out of season, improve, rebuke, exhort, with long-suffering and doctrine. For the time will come when they will not endure wholesome doctrine; but having their ears itching, they will get themselves a heap of teachers according to their own lusts, and turn their ears from the truth, and be given to fables. But watch in all things, suffer adversity, do the work of an evangelist, make your ministry fully known." ^{2Tim 4.1-5}

Therefore, they need very frequent exhortations so that what the church, by frequent and plain teaching, understands either to be followed or to be avoided, she may either constantly follow or refuse — being stirred up and compelled by a fervent exhortation. And here it is needful for a preacher to use long-sufferance, lest he throw away all hope if he does not see by and by, the happy success that he wishes for; and some mighty and impudent adversaries obstinately argue that against him. For Paul says:

"The servants of the Lord must not argue; but be gentle to all men, apt to teach, suffering evil with meekness, instructing those who are contrary-minded — if God at any time would give those repentance, that they may come to the knowledge of the truth and to themselves again, out of the snares of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will." ^{1Tim 2.24-26}

Moreover, there needs to be mild and enlivening comfort: for many are troubled, being tried with diverse temptations. Unless you faithfully comfort them, they are overcome by Satan. These and other things like it, pertain to the teaching of the more perfect sort.

Here I may also mention the care of the poor; for this especially pertains to a minister and to his public preaching, by which he may continually provoke the richer sort to mercy, that they may be ready to distribute. The apostle Paul has left us notable examples of this matter in almost all of his epistles; but specially in the sixteenth chapter to the Romans, and the first of first Corinthians, and also in the eighth and ninth chapters of second Corinthians. St. Peter, James, and John, very diligently commended the care of the poor to St. Paul; as Paul himself repeats in the second chapter to the Galatians. And although Peter in Acts 6.2, refuses the office of distribution, he is altogether careful in this: that godly and faithful dispensers may be appointed for the poor. Therefore, the care of the poor pertains chiefly to the pastors, so that the poor are not neglected, but tenderly cherished, as the members of Christ.

The private kind of teaching, in itself, does not differ at all from the public kind; but it is called private in respect to the learners. For someone comes to the pastor, in the manner of Nicodemus, and desires very to be familiarly instructed by him in things properly concerning himself. Besides that, this shepherd goes privately and instructs those whom, by evident tokens, he has learned may be more easily won to Christ by private conference than by public preaching. Moreover, he privately admonishes, and takes heed in time, lest those who are more unadvised, be more deeply plunged in evil. To this pertains the visitation of both sick persons and prisoners, none of whom a faithful pastor neglects; but he visits them that much more diligently, as he perceives them more grievously tempted. For a good pastor is always watchful over the whole flock of Christ for whom Satan lays snares, ranging about, seeking whom he may devour. The pastor resists him by prayer, admonitions, teaching, and exhortations.

If every church had such a pastor who would not easily forsake the flock, how great the fruit would be that we hope for! Thus it is not without cause that we are commanded incessantly and earnestly to pray to God, that he would give to his church faithful, wise, godly, and diligent pastors.

Thus I have spoken up to here about the doctrine of bishops in the church of God. And unless a bishop teaches in this manner, and does those things which are joined to teaching, he is unworthy of the name of bishop, pastor, or doctor, however he may pretend to an apostolic title. For certain things are joined to the doctrine of the church, which are also required of a preacher of the gospel, and belong to his office, such as: to gather together a holy assembly in which he may preach, conceive prayer, and minister the sacraments. But these things will be spoken of in their place.

Now there remains to be considered, how bishops may govern the church of Christ with the holy example of their life. In the gospel, the Lord says to his apostles: "You are the light of the world: a city that is set on a high hill cannot be hidden; nor do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick, and it gives light to all who are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father who is in heaven." ^{Mat 5.14-16} Therefore pastors, not only in doctrine but in holy life, give light to the church. And beholding that their pastor's life agrees with his doctrine, the church is herself moved to practise innocence of life. For the example of a good man greatly prevails to further the love of virtues. And contrariwise, the scripture witnesses that the corrupt example of the sons of Eli, the chief rulers in religion, corrupted the people. For the scripture says: "And the sin of the children of Eli was too abominable before the face of the Lord, so that the people began to abhor the sacrifices of the Lord." ^{1Sam 2.17} For men, seeing the corrupt life of the ministers of the church, begin to somewhat doubt the whole doctrine, crying: If the pastor thought those things true which he teaches us, he would not live so dissolutely. Therefore, such teachers are said to overthrow with their naughty life, what they have built with wholesome doctrine.

This is why Paul requires a bishop, or pastor of the people, to be blameless; that is to say, who cannot rightly and worthily be reprehended by the faithful. For otherwise, by however much every bishop is more sincere and upright, he is that much more subject to slanders and reproaches by the wicked. The Lord himself foretold of it in the gospel: "If they have called the Lord of the house Beelzebub, then how much more shall they call those of his household!" ^{Mat 10.25} And, "If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you." ^{Joh 15.20} And again, "Blessed are you, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and lying shall say all manner of evil saying against you for my sake. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven." ^{Mat 5.11-12} Therefore, a pastor should very carefully, and as much as it is in him, take heed that both at home and abroad, he lives a life worthy of himself and his calling. ^{Eph 4.1} Let him live chastely, both single as well as married. Let temperance, soberness, thriftiness or good husbandry, hospitality, and other virtues, which I have repeated before from the apostle, flourish in a bishop. Let him govern his own household wisely, and reverently instruct them; and so bridle them, that he gives no occasion of offence to the church through riotousness or other misdeeds. For so the apostle Paul has also commanded, who says (framing again the exercises of a bishop): "Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, and doctrine." ^{1Tim 4.13} He requires of Timothy a diligent reading, that is to say, a continual study, by which he may more perfectly exhort and teach. Paul requires of this man who has been brought up in the knowledge of the scriptures since childhood (as he writes elsewhere), a continual study of the scriptures. How great is the diligence then, that the apostle requires of those who, as they have not obtained such plentiful gifts of the Spirit as Timothy had, are not exercised in the scriptures from their infancy! Let some ¹ therefore be ashamed of their unskilfulness; let them be ashamed of leisure that is not given to study, and of their idleness when travelling. For just as many read nothing at all, but continually live idly and rot away in idleness as it were, so countless others are busied in those things which are not at all fitting for bishops.

Therefore the apostle says: "No man who goes to war entangles himself with the affairs of this life, so that he may please the one who has chosen him to be a soldier." ^{2Tim 2.4} Here would be a fit place to speak of stipends due to pastors; but we will defer it to another place. But if at any time bishops go abroad among the people for business' sake, and are present in assemblies of honest men, they should endeavour with no less care, lest they give any just occasion of offence to the church either by deed, word, apparel, by the company they keep, or finally, in the whole course of their life. In all places and at all times, let there appear in pastors, holy uprightness, fit ripeness of judgment, honest behaviour, wisdom, modesty, humanity, humility, and authority worthy of God's ministers; but let the contrary vices and wicked misdeeds be far from them.

In these few words, I think, are contained those things which others have handled at large, in treating the discipline and behaviour of the clergy. For all ages understood that a dissolute and loose life was evil in all degrees and kinds of men; but in the ministers of the church, it is worse and most intolerable. For what can a minister of the church do in the church, whose authority is altogether lost? Authority therefore is requisite in pastors.

Many complain of the lack of this authority; and seeing it trodden underfoot, they set about to rear it up again with I cannot tell what kind of props of titles and ceremonies. But authority is not gotten with such light and vain things. It is rather obtained by the grace of God, through the love of truth and uprightness of life. If happily God touches men's hearts, they may understand that God works his work in the church by his ministers as by his instruments. They may perceive that ministers are to do the work of the Lord with ferventness of spirit, and not coldly; that they are not to fear anything in a good cause — no, not even the wicked and mighty men of this world — but resist them. And yet they are to do nothing from hatred or malice, but do all things out of a fatherly affection, with good courage, constancy, and wisdom. If there is joined to this, not a hypocritical, but indeed a holy and upright life, together with honest, modest, and attractive behaviour, then all wise men will perceive that there is sufficient authority proved by this, for a godly minister.

Yet, I would not have the Donatists or anabaptists,¹ hereby claim any kind of defence or protection, however small. They contend that the ministry of the word and sacraments, executed by a minister whose life is unclean, thereby becomes of no value. But even if a holy life were requisite in a minister, their ministry does not become of no value through the minister's dishonest life, so long as his doctrine is sound and perfect. For the Lord in the gospel commands us to hear those who teach in Moses' chair, but he forbids us to follow their doings; for they teach good things, but do not do them. I have spoken of this matter in the second sermon of this decade.² Nazianzen very properly says: "The print of a seal is all the same, whether it is graven in iron or in gold."³ And it is one and the same gospel, it is one and the self-same heavenly treasure sent by the Father, whether it is brought by a good messenger or a bad one. But in the meantime, the dishonest life of the ministers of the church should not be winked at, but be chastened; and those who are past cure should be put out of the ministry, lest through their continual offences, they make the holy ministry infamous.

But many will ask: Why do you handle these things in public preaching? These things were to be told the ministers privately. I answer that the very laws which properly pertained to the priests, were in times past communicated to the magistrates and governors of the people, and were read before the people themselves. Moreover, it is manifest that Christ our Lord handled those things in public sermons, which properly pertained to the doctors and pastors of the people. To this it may be added that St. Paul, speaking of elders or ministers, says: "Those who sin, rebuke openly, that the rest also may fear."⁴ ^{1Tim 5.20}

The holy scripture, describes good and faithful shepherds and teachers with great diligence; with no less faithfulness and diligence, it paints the false teachers and false shepherds or wolves,⁴ to the end that all men⁵ may know them, and beware of them. These things are everywhere to be seen in the writings of the prophets and apostles. Yet singular places, if any man would know, are to be seen in Deu 13 and 18, Isa 56, Jer 23, Eze 34, Dan 11, Mat 7 and 23. The epistles of Paul are plentiful in describing and confuting them; and St. Peter spends a great part of his second epistle in overthrowing such men. The testimonies and examples of the same prophets and apostles show that godly ministers and faithful pastors will be vexed with all kinds of afflictions and persecutions. Yet nevertheless, they also witness evidently that the ministry will never be utterly oppressed, but the ministers will continually have the victory, yes, even when they are slain. For the Lord always gives ministers to his church, who, though they are tried as gold in the fire, yet they overcome through him who has overcome the world and the prince of the world.

The last times will be very wicked, as we read the times of Noah and Lot were. But we read that in that uttermost corruption, those two most excellent men, with a few other singular men in all godliness, who were true worshippers of God, flourished and did their duty. Even so, to the very end of the world, the ministry of the word shall also endure; and worthy doctors and pastors will flourish, striving against and persecuting all ungodliness and looseness of life. Let the enemies of the truth cease to hope for the overthrow of the ministry and ministers of the word of God. "I will," says the Lord in the gospel, "be with you always, even to the end of the world." He cannot lie who has spoken this. "He shall consume antichrist," says the apostle, "with the spirit of his mouth; and shall abolish him with the brightness of his coming for judgment." ^{2The 2.8} There will therefore be ministers in the church, and preachers, yes, at the very gates of hell, however horribly they may rage, even to the end of the world.

These things up to here have I comprehended, as briefly as I could, touching the ministry of the word, and the ministers of the churches of Christ. But it is not in our power to frame or give such pastors. By the grace and goodness of God, good pastors are given, and the wicked are taken away. Let us all therefore call upon God, asking Him to give us faithful and godly ministers, by which his name may be always sanctified and the church of God may be happily governed, to the salvation of all those who believe.

5-5. THE FIFTH SERMON: OF PRAYER, SINGING, & THANKSGIVING.

OF THE FORM AND MANNER OF HOW TO PRAY TO GOD; THAT IS, OF CALLING ON THE NAME OF THE LORD: WHERE ALSO THE LORD'S PRAYER IS EXPOUNDED; AND ALSO SINGING, THANKSGIVING, AND THE FORCE OF PRAYER, IS TREATED.

The ministry of the word of God in the church of Christ being handled, I think I have a convenient place to treat the prayer of the faithful, which godly ministers never leave, to stir up the church.

PRAYING

The word PRAYER is widely used among writers, and it is in daily use. At present, we will use it in the same manner that David the prophet used it, saying: "Hear my prayer, God; and let my cry come to you." ^{Psa 102.1} For prayer is a humble and earnest laying forth of a faithful mind, by which we either ask good things from God's hands, or else we give him thanks for those things which we have received. And there are chiefly two parts of prayer: invocation (or asking), and thanksgiving. By petition, we lay open to God the requests and desires of our heart; beseeching him to give us good things, and that he will turn evil things away from us, as it may be to his glory and good pleasure, and according to our necessity.

In invocation or petition, we comprehend obsecration,¹ which is a more vehement prayer; and also intercession, by which we commend other men's matters to the Lord. For we offer prayers to the Lord our God, not only for ourselves, but also for our brethren, and for their manifold necessities; for those who are distressed with perils; for those who are sick; for those who suffer persecution, or are oppressed in some way with other calamities and afflictions. Nor do we exclude beseechings, by which we earnestly desire evils to be turned away from ourselves or from others. There are also complaints, by which the saints in their prayers holily expostulate with God. Thanksgiving comprehends both divine praises, and it also celebrates with a joyful spirit God's noble power, and the benefits received from his hand. A great part of the Psalms is referred to this. One part pertains to invocation or calling upon God; other parts serve to teach or instruct; and some serve to declare or expound. There is no place to speak of this at present. Paul, the blessed apostle of Christ, acknowledging these parts of prayer in writing to the Colossians, says: "Continue in prayer, and watch in this with thanksgiving." ^{Col 4.2} And to the Philippians he says: "Let your requests be shown to God, in prayer and supplication with giving of thanks." ^{Phi 4.6} And again to Timothy: "I exhort, therefore," says Paul, "that first of all prayers, supplications, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all men." ^{1Tim 2.1}

THE KINDS OF PRAYERS

Kinds of prayers are these: there is a PRIVATE prayer of every faithful man; and there is also a PUBLIC prayer of the whole church.

PRIVATE prayer is made to God by every faithful man, in whatever place, either in the house or out of doors, in the closet of his heart and temple of his own body. For St. Peter went up into the uppermost part of the house and prayed. St. Paul says, "I would, therefore, that the men pray everywhere, lifting up pure hands;" ^{1Tim 2.8} and Christ our Lord, very often departed even out of the temple into the mount to pray. And in the gospel he says: "When you pray, enter into your chamber; and when you have shut your door, pray to your Father who is in secret." ^{Mat 6.6}

PUBLIC prayer is that which is used by the church; these prayers are made to God in the holy assembly, according to the accustomed order of every church. Now the pastor's duty is, as Paul also admonishes in 1 Timothy 2 (and as we repeated in the sermon before this), to gather together, instruct, and preserve the assemblies, in which supplications or common prayers are made. And those who are more negligent than becomes them in this, are greatly to be blamed; nor indeed are those pastors to be suffered, who seldom or never teach diligently, and are cold in stirring up a desire in men, to pray. Men by nature are slow and slack in the study of religion; and therefore we need a sharp spur; and the charge and office of stirring up, and provoking, is committed to the pastors of churches. The prophets somewhere cry: "Blow the trumpet in Zion, assemble a congregation." ^{Joe 2.15} For in a holy congregation, three things are chiefly used: the teaching of the gospel, faithful prayers, and religious celebration or administration of the sacraments: and sometimes there is a collection made for relieving the poor and the church. The holy scripture witnesses that these things are not instituted at the will and pleasure of man, but by the authority of God; yes, and immediately after the first beginnings; and they were also used by the most holy worshippers of God. There is no doubt they were used by the most ancient patriarchs, both those before the flood and those who followed immediately after. For the scripture plainly witnesses this about Jacob himself, the grandson of Abraham, that he erected an altar in Bethel, at which he assembled his whole household, though exceedingly great; and there he offered sacrifice to God. He instituted holy assemblies in Moses' time by the law, in most evident commandments. Indeed, he diligently commands in the Ten Commandments to sanctify the sabbath-day, which also comprehends holy assemblies. The holy prophets of God everywhere praise and commend the ecclesiastical assemblies of God's people. Nor did Christ our Lord disallow them, when he came in the flesh. For it was in the most notable assemblies and feasts that he taught with great diligence; even so, he gathered and assembled together both the people and his disciples, whom he specially commanded that they not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father. When they were gathered together in an assembly and in prayer, we read in the Acts that this was then performed.

There also, the assembly of the faithful is commended to us; as it appears both in the 11th and 14th chapters of Paul's first epistle to Corinth. Those supplications which Paul commands to be made for all those who are set in authority, are made chiefly in holy assemblies. Truly, Pliny, a heathen author, writing to Trajan the emperor, makes obvious mention of holy assemblies.¹ Holy assemblies in olden times held very excellent promises; as we may see in the prayer of Solomon, which is described to you in the first book of Kings, 8th chapter. And today, the church of Christ has promises that are not at all inferior to them. Christ our Lord says: "I say to you, that if two of you agree on earth touching anything that they ask, it shall be done for them by my Father who is in heaven. For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them." ^{Mat 18.19-20} Behold, the Lord himself is in the midst of the assemblies of saints; and where the Lord is, there is both plenty and the treasure of all good things. And therefore, the experience which we have about matters, teaches us that the supplications of the church are effectual; for the Lord hears the prayers of the church, and delivers from evil those whose safety the church commends to Him. We have oftentimes experienced that those who were in extreme danger have found very present help, even at the same instant in which the congregation has offered their prayers to the Lord. Moreover, the example moves very many who are otherwise hard-hearted and barbarous; for they see the devout godliness of the holy congregation, and the fervency of the faithful in assemblies, and they are thereby moved; so that looking within themselves, they acknowledged that they are miserable, and desire to be partakers of this fellowship, according to the saying of St. Paul:

"If therefore, when the whole church comes together in one place, and all speak strange tongues, and those who are unlearned come in, or those who do not believe — will they not say that you are out of your wits? But if all prophesy, and one who does not believe comes in, or one who is unlearned, he is rebuked by all men, and judged by all. And so the secrets of his heart are made manifest; and so he will fall down on his face, and worship God, and say plainly that God is in you indeed." ^{1Cor 14.23-25}

With what confidence, therefore, and how shamefully, some dare to treat holy assemblies lightly; and not only that, but tjeu also scorn them, as if they were assembled together without any profit at all. David in his banishment complains of nothing so much as being compelled to wander in the wilderness, and be shut out from holy assemblies. For he promises the Lord, he will enter into his holy congregation if he is ever restored again. ^{Psa 22.22} Truly, when the Lord says in the gospel, "He who is of God, hears God's word;" ^{Joh 8.47} it follows that those who love the congregation, in which the word of God is preached, have the natural mark of sons of God.

But many not only loathe holy assemblies, but also say that prayers are altogether superfluous, vain, and unprofitable. Therefore, before we proceed any further, we will show that the godly must pray, and that the prayers of the faithful are both effectual, profitable, and necessary. They say, All things are done by the providence of God, and therefore prayers are unprofitable; for what God has foreknown, he will truly bring to pass in the manner of his foreknowledge; nor can it be hindered by prayers. But these men abuse the providence of God; for out of it they gather what the holy scriptures do not teach them to gather. For in Deuteronomy, Moses has left written in express words: "The Lord had determined to destroy you; therefore I made intercession to the Lord, and I found favour." ^{Deu 9.19} Jonah threatens such certain destruction to the Ninevites from the Lord, that he even foretold the number of days. But when the men of Nineveh believed the Lord, and repented, the Lord became favourable to them again; nor did he destroy them when they repented.

Moreover, Isaiah had spoken to Hezekiah out of the mouth of the Lord, "You shall die, and not live." ^{Isa 38.1} But when the king poured out his prayers, from the bottom of his heart to the Lord, God changed his sentence that he had pronounced. For the Lord himself says in Jeremiah: "I will speak suddenly against a nation or a kingdom, to pluck it up, and to root it out, and to destroy it. But if this nation against whom I have pronounced, turns from its wickedness, I will repent of the plague that I thought to bring upon them," etc. ^{Jer 18.7-8} Therefore, the prayers of the faithful are effectual, staying the wrathful judgments of God, yes, and removing them.

They object again, that prayer is a declaration of things which we require of the Lord; and God foreknows all things; therefore, these things are unprofitably and superfluously declared to him which he already knows; and for that reason, prayer is unprofitable. This is confuted by Christ our Lord himself, who plainly said, "Your heavenly Father knows what things you need, before you ask of him." ^{Mat 6.8} Nevertheless, adding a form of prayer, he then teaches us to pray. In another place, he commands and stirs us up to pray often: "Watch and pray, lest you fall into temptation." ^{Mat 26.41} And Paul says: "Rejoice always; pray continually." ^{1The 5.16-17} In every place there are many precepts of this kind. Nor do we declare our matters to him as to one who does not know them; but we utter them to the one who understands the desires of our heart, and humble ourselves at the feet of his majesty. We ask of him what we know we lack, and yet it is certainly to be received from him, who is the author of all goodness; for we believe his sure and infallible promises. In the meantime, prayers are not superfluous, for the Lord would assuredly give what we asked. The Lord promised the delivery of his people, which the godly did not doubt at all. Yet they prayed to the Lord with incessant supplications, crying, "Deliver us, O Lord our God;" ^{Psa 106.47} nor did they think they laboured in vain.

The anabaptists ¹ pretend absolute pureness. Therefore, being pure, they neither can nor should pray, "Forgive us our debts," ^{Mat 6.12} since [they claim] there remain no debts. The most holy evangelist and apostle John answers such a claim, saying: "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we acknowledge our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us." ^{1Joh 1.8-10} For as long as we live in this world, there remain remnants of sin to be washed away every moment by the grace of Christ.

Moreover, they object that it is written, "We know that God does not hear sinners;" ^{Joh 9.31} and we are all sinners. Therefore, God hears none of us, and so men's prayers are found to be unprofitable. We answer, that some sinners are altogether ungodly and despisers of God: those God does not hear. There are again repentant men, and those who fear God; they are nevertheless sinners, and rightly called such because of the remnants of sin: those God hears. This might be shown by the examples of David, Manasseh, Peter, the thief crucified with Christ, and many others, who were sinners; and yet when they prayed, they were heard.

Therefore, we say that the prayers of the faithful are not only profitable and effectual, but also necessary for men. For we men are defiled with sin, destitute and void of all goodness. "Every good giving, and every perfect gift is from above, and comes down from the Father of lights." ^{Jas 1.17} He commands us to pray, and offers very large promises to those who pray. Therefore, our fathers were often exercised and very fervent in prayer; by their example, they teach us that prayers are necessary. The scripture also diligently and at large recites how they obtained great things by their prayers in very weighty affairs and dangers, indeed, in most necessary matters, from our most true and most bountiful Lord and God. The apostles pray for the Holy Ghost, faith, and the increase of faith; and they received their requests, not sparingly, but liberally, being made partakers of all kinds of graces from Christ. In the gospel, the publican prays in the temple, and says: "God, be merciful to me, a sinner;" ^{Luk 18.13} and immediately he found the Lord merciful to him. The holy history records what and how great were the things that Elijah obtained from the Lord by his prayers.

And the blessed apostle James applies his example to us also, that in faith we too should call upon God. I repeat this, lest any man think that it does not pertain to us at all. Again, it would take too long to recite how much the faithful prayers of Moses, David, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and other valiant men prevailed in wars, in famines, in sickness, and in other exceedingly great dangers. These examples prove that prayer is always necessary to men, and also very effectual. For we plainly see that God is moved with the prayers of his faithful; for he is good and merciful; he loves us; he took on flesh that he might be touched by feeling our infirmities, lest we be dismayed at him. He is true and faithful, performing those things faithfully which he promises. What? Does he not freely, liberally, and bountifully call all men to him, offering himself wholly to those who call upon him in faith?

But just because those who pray do not always receive what they ask, it does not prove that prayer is altogether unprofitable; for it is oftentimes profitable for the one who prays, not to receive his requests. There are, moreover, many causes for which God either puts off the things that are asked, or does not grant them. There is a kind of man who prays, of whom it is written: "He that shuts his ear at the cry of the poor, will cry himself, and not be heard." ^{Pro 21.13} Again: "Though you make many prayers, yet I will hear nothing at all, seeing that your hands are full of blood." ^{Isa 1.15} So again in Solomon, Wisdom cries out, testifying that she will not hear those who call on her, because they would not first hear her giving a warning in time. ^{Pro 1.20-30} All these things are gathered in a way from the person who prays: what follows is derived from the thing which they pray for. St. James says: "You ask and do not receive, because you ask amiss, to consume it upon your lusts." ^{Jas 4.3} For the Lord, in answering two of his chosen disciples, who demanded the highest places in the kingdom of Christ, says this: "You do not know what you ask." ^{Mat 20.22} Furthermore, when holy men ask for holy and necessary things, or at least not unjust or evil things, which nevertheless they do not receive from the Lord, they immediately think that God is a God of judgment and justice, and therefore that he will not immediately deliver them out of afflictions: yet desire they deliverance with continual prayers.

"Whom the Lord loves he chastens." ^{Heb 12.6, 10} And whom he chastens, he does not chasten to destroy them; but "that they should not be condemned with the wicked world." ^{Gal 1.4} For it is lawful in such distress to pray with David, "Do not rebuke me in your anger, O Lord; nor chasten me in your displeasure;" ^{Psa 38.1} and with Jeremiah, "Lord, correct me in judgment, not in fury;" ^{Jer 10.24} and with Habakkuk, "When you are angry, remember your mercy." ^{Hab 3.2} The godly doubt nothing of the power and goodness of God toward men. That which God wills, and which is profitable for the children of God, God can do. The old and new Testaments afford us countless examples of this. Therefore, when we are not delivered, when we do not obtain our desires, it is most sure that God would have it so, and that it is profitable for us that it should so be. By this means he hears our prayers when he hears us. For our prayers tend to this end only: that it might go well with us. God, since he is only wise, knows what can profit and what can hurt us, and he does not give us what we ask; and yet, by not giving, he indeed grants what is good for us. Therefore, the lawful prayer of the faithful is always effectual, and it evermore obtains his purpose; the Lord granting to his people, what he knows to be good.

Furthermore, the Lord defers performing what is asked, yes, and at times he seems to neglect our prayers altogether. But by prolonging, he tests his people, that he may make their faith more fervent, and his gifts more acceptable; they are that much more joyfully received, by how much they are looked for with an ardent desire. In this temptation, let that saying of the prophet comfort us: "Can a woman forget her child, and not have compassion on the son of her own womb? Though they forget, yet I will not forget you." ^{Isa 49.15} For the church would have said, "God has forsaken me, and my Lord has forgotten me."

THE MANNER OF PRAYER

Let us now consider what manner of prayer it should be, which he that calls upon God uses. That question cannot be better resolved, than by weighing the chief circumstances.

First, therefore, let us consider WHO must be called upon by those who pray. None truly, but the one and only God. For three things are required of the one who is prayed to: first, that he hear the prayers of all the men in the whole world; that he pierce and exactly know their hearts; indeed, that he know more rightly and better, all the desires of men, than men themselves can utter them; secondly, that he be present everywhere, and have power over all things in heaven, on earth, and in hell; and has in his power all the ways and all the means to help; thirdly, that his will be exceedingly good and ready prepared; that what he can do, he may also be willing to do. And these properties are found in God only. For only God searches the reins and the hearts; only he sees and hears all things; only he knows more perfectly those things which are within and without man, than man himself; only he is present in all places; only he is almighty; only he is wise. The will of God alone embraces man with most perfect goodness, and is always ready, and faithfully procures only that which is profitable for man. Therefore, only God should be called upon. But if these properties were attributed to the most chosen souls in heaven, who could do so without blasphemy and sacrilege? Therefore, the souls in heaven, living with God, are not to be called upon, especially since the scripture in plain words testifies, that "Abraham and Jacob do not know us;" ^{Isa 63.16} and it commands us to call on God, and forbids us to communicate those things which are God's, to creatures. And if we say nothing else, to whom, I ask you, of all the saints or angels in heaven, can we say without blushing, "Our Father, which art in heaven," ^{Mat 6.9} and then what follows in the Lord's prayer? Let us therefore call upon God only, that heavenly Father, whom alone all the saints or godly men, as many as have been in the church, have called upon.

No mortal man, however good ¹ he seems to be, is worthy to come into the sight of the eternal and most holy God — which all men confess with one voice. And yet, many and diverse patrons, intercessors, and advocates, are chosen and received by those who pray; by whose intercession either they themselves might be brought to God, or their prayers might be presented to God.

This is why some have chosen angels for themselves; others have chosen apostles; others the most holy and among all other women, that most blessed virgin, the mother of Christ; ² some others have chosen others, as they have put confidence in this man or that man. But they have forged these things for themselves out of the imagination of their own heart, and have not learned them from the mouth of the Lord. The scripture, that only rule of truth, sets forth for us one mediator, intercessor, patron, and advocate, by whom we may come to God, and by whom we may present our prayers to the Lord. All the prayers of all men are unpleasant and abominable, which are not made by Jesus Christ. Nor does true faith teach us to forge and imagine another advocate for Christ, or some other with Christ, in the sight of God; nor should we ourselves alone, without our advocate Christ, rush into the presence of God the Father. Here, true Christians are separated from Jews, from Turks,³ yes, and from papists also. For, despising the Son of God, they call upon the Father alone, without the mediation of Christ Jesus. But the voice of God, by the gospel and his apostles, pronounces against them. In the gospel, we read that the Lord said: "The Father has committed all judgment to the Son, because that all men should honour the Son, even as they honour the Father. He that honours not the Son, the same honours not the Father which has sent him." ^{Joh 5.22-23} And again: "I am the way, and the truth, and the life. No man comes to the Father, but by me." ^{Joh 14.6} And John, the apostle and evangelist, says: "Whoever denies the Son, does not have the Father." ^{1Joh 2.23} But these men do not acknowledge Christ as the only intercessor; but they teach that saints in his stead, or with Christ, should be called upon as patrons before God. But the same John, showing who is an advocate for Christians, did not appoint himself; he did not lay before us saints instead of Christ, nor them along with Christ; "but," he says, "we have an advocate with God the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous." ^{1Joh 2.1} Nor does Paul show us any other in 1Timothy chapter 2, and Hebrews chapter 7.

To the Ephesians, in chapter 3, Paul says: "By Christ we have boldness and entrance with confidence, by faith in him." ^{Eph 3.12} Christ is sufficient for those who believe, as the Father has stored up all good things in him alone, commanding us to ask those things in him and by him, through prayer. These things are sufficient for minds that do not desire contention. Those who would, let them search further in the fifth sermon of the fourth decade.⁴

THE SPIRIT OF PRAYER

I have told you who is to be prayed to or called upon by the godly worshippers of God, and by whom: namely, to God alone, through the only Son of God, our Lord Jesus Christ. Let us now see, what should stir up man to call upon God. Surely, the Spirit of our God principally; for prayer is rightly counted among the gifts of grace. For we could neither earnestly nor heartily call upon our God, unless we are stirred up and provoked to it by the Spirit of God. For even though the commandment of God wills us to pray, and present necessity and danger drive us to pray, and the example of others allure us to pray; yet all these things would do nothing, unless the Spirit forces our minds to His will, and guides and keeps us in prayer. Therefore, though there are many concurring causes which move men to prayer, yet the chief origin of prayer is the Holy Ghost. Whoever prays with any fruit, begs with a holy preface at the entrance of all prayers, for His motion and government. To this pertain these words of the holy apostle:

"The Spirit also helps our infirmities; for we do not know what to pray as we should; but the Spirit itself makes requests for us with sighs which cannot be expressed. But he who searches the hearts knows what the meaning of the Spirit is; for He makes requests for the saints according to the will of God." Rom 8.26-27

Indeed, the Spirit of God is said to make intercession; not that he indeed prays and groans; but because he stirs up our minds to pray and to sigh. And he brings to pass, according to the pleasure of God, that we should make intercession or pray for the saints; that is to say, for ourselves.

THE ABILITY TO PRAY

But let us consider with what abilities someone must be furnished, who comes to purposefully pray to God.

By God's Mercy. First, it is necessary that he lay aside all opinions of his own worthiness and righteousness; that he acknowledge himself to be a sinner, and to stand in need of all good things; and so let him yield himself to the mere mercy of God, desiring by His mercy to be filled with all things that are good.

For that great prophet of God, Daniel, says this: "We do not present our prayers before you in our own righteousness, but in your manifold mercies." Also, you read a similar prayer offered to God in Psalm 79. For the people of the Lord cry out: "Help us, O Lord of our salvation, for the glory of your name: deliver us, and be merciful to our sins, for your name's sake. Do not remember our sins of old; make haste, and let your mercy deliver us." Psa 79.8-10 In the new Testament, the Pharisee in Luke, trusting in his own righteousness, is put aside and cast off from the Lord; but the publican, freely confessing his sins and craving mercy from God, is heard and justified. Luk 18.10f For unless we acknowledge our nakedness, weakness, and poverty, who, I ask you, would pray to God? "For it is not those who are strong, but those who are sick, that need the physician." Mat 9.12 And the Lord in the gospel says: "Ask, and you shall receive; knock, and it shall be opened to you; seek, and you shall find." Mat 7.7-8 Therefore, he that is commanded to ask so that he may receive, does not yet have what he asks for; he that knocks, by knocking, signifies that he stands outside the door; and he which seeks, has lost what he yet seeks. Therefore, being shut out from the joys of paradise, we seek and ask by prayer for what we have lost and do not have. Therefore, though David and Hezekiah and other saints of God, allege in prayer their own righteousness, for which they seem to worthily demand to be heard — truly, they do not regard their own worthiness, but rather the truth of God. He has promised that he will hear those who worship him. Therefore, the godly say, Behold, we are your worshippers: therefore it is fitting that you not neglect us, but deliver us.

Meanwhile, in other places they speak in such a way about their righteousness, that we cannot doubt that in their prayers they mention their righteousness with a certain measure and limitation. "Do not enter into judgment with your servant," says David; "for in your sight no man living shall be justified," etc. ^{Psa 143.2}

In Faith. Furthermore, and what is chief of all, it is needful that those who pray must have a true and fervent faith. Let the doctrine of faith, therefore, in the matter of prayer, show us light as the morning-star; and with an assured hope to obtain from God the thing which is asked, let him that prays make his petition. ^{Mar 11.24; 1Joh 5.15}

"Let him ask in faith," says St. James, "nothing wavering: for he that wavers is like a wave of the sea, tossed by the wind, and carried with violence. Nor let that man think that he will receive anything from the Lord." ^{Jas 1.6-7} And Paul also says: "How shall they call upon him, on whom they have not believed?" ^{Rom 10.14} I have spoken of faith in the fourth sermon of the first decade. But to the end that faith may increase in just measure, and flourish and continue stable, we must labour in the promises and examples from every place gathered together. We will recite a few. In the book of Psalms we read: "Offer to God thanksgiving, and pay your vows to the most High." ^{Psa 50.14} And: "Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver you, and you shall glorify me." ^{Psa 50.15} Again: "The Lord is near to all who call upon him, to all those who call upon him in truth (or faithfully). He will fulfil the desire of those who fear him: he will also hear their cry, and will save them." ^{Psa 145.18-19} Again, in Isaiah the Lord says: "And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer them; and while they are still thinking how to speak,¹ I will hear them." ^{Isa 65.24} In Matthew, the Lord says: "Ask, and it shall be given to you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you. For whoever asks receives, and whoever seeks finds, and to him that knocks it shall be opened," etc. ^{Mat 7.7-8} In the same gospel, the Lord says: "And whatever you ask in prayer, believing, you shall receive it." ^{Mat 21.22} In the 11th chapter of Mark, the same sentence is put this way: "Whatever you desire when you pray, believe that you have it, and it shall be done for you." ^{Mar 11.24} Again, in the gospel of St. John the Lord says: "Whatever you ask in my name, that I will do." ^{Joh 14.13} Again: "Truly, truly, I say to you, Whatever you shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it to you. Ask, and you shall receive." ^{Joh 14.13-14} David frames an argument from the example of the fathers, and says: "Our fathers hoped in you, they trusted in you, and you delivered them; they called upon you, and they were helped; they put their trust in you, and were not confounded." ^{Psa 22.4-5}

From this, David gathers that he also will not be forsaken by the Lord. In the history of the gospel, there are very many examples to be seen, which exceedingly confirm and establish the faith of the godly.

With Godliness. But since faith is not a vain imagination, but an effectual power, working by the Holy Ghost all kinds of good works (though they neither trust to these, nor think they will be heard in consideration of them), yet nevertheless, those sinners who are faithful do not impudently, and without repentance, trust to their own wits,² dealing only in words with the Lord; but they join a holy life to their prayers. For Solomon says: "He that turns his ear from hearing the law, his prayer will be abominable." ^{Pro 28.9} And the Lord says in Isaiah: "Though you make many prayers, yet will I hear nothing at all, seeing your hands are full of blood." ^{Isa 1.15} About such impenitent persons, we understand that in the gospel: "God does not hear sinners." But what is more, the saints will obtain nothing if they continue in prayer for them. For Jeremiah, praying earnestly for his people who were otherwise being obstinately wicked, hears this:

"You shall not pray for this people; you shall neither give thanks nor bid prayer for them; make no intercession for them; for in no way will I hear you. Do you not see what they do in the cities of Judah? The children gather sticks, the fathers kindle the fire, the women knead the dough to make cakes for the queen of heaven. They pour out drink-offerings to strange gods, to provoke me to wrath." ^{Jer 7.18}

In the same manner, the Lord says in Ezekiel: "If I send a pestilence into this land, and if Noah, Job, and Daniel, were in it," (or in the midst of it,) "as truly as I live, says the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter, but save their own souls in their righteousness." ^{Eze 14.19-20}

Therefore, it follows that the supplications of unrepentant men, impudently persevering in their sins, even though they cry without ceasing, "Help us, O God, our Saviour; deliver us, Lord; we beseech you to hear us," these are altogether fruitless; for they desire to be preserved, so that they might take their further pleasure and commit wickedness. And though God gives us freely those things which we ask, yet it is necessary that an affection or desire to live well accompanies such great benefits received from the hands of God. For here we should most diligently to take heed, that we not think we will be heard for our virtues' sake, but for the mere mercy of God in Christ Jesus.

Heavenly-Minded. Moreover, whoever desires to have his prayers acceptable to God, let him lift up his mind toward heavenly things from earthly things. Touching this, the blessed martyr of Christ, Cyprian, eloquently and holily entreats us, saying:

"When we stand occupied in prayer, we must with our whole heart watch, and be diligent in prayer. Let all worldly and fleshly thoughts depart; neither let the mind think upon anything else at that time, except that which it prays. Let your breast be shut against the adversary, and let it be open to God only; nor let it allow the enemy of God to enter into it in the time of prayer. For he oftentimes steals upon us, and enters in; and subtly deceiving us, he turns our prayers away from God, so that we have one thing in our heart, and another thing in our mouth. It is not the sound of the voice, but the mind and sense, that ought to pray to God with an unfeigned affection." ¹

But that the mind of him who prays may be lifted up from earthly things to heavenly things, is chiefly the work of the spirit of true faith, the steadfastness of hope, and the fervent love of God — if we also remember the dreadful majesty of God, before whose eyes we stand praying.

All the creatures in heaven and earth worship and reverence Him; thousands upon thousands of angels serve Him. Let us think to ourselves how profitable and necessary are the things that we ask of God, without which we cannot be happy. Let us moreover remove from us all those things which either detain and keep us in this world, or which pull us back to earthly things. Of this sort are slothfulness, covetousness, and surfeiting — and to be short, all other sins like these. And contrariwise, let us apply ourselves to watchfulness, soberness, gentleness, and liberality.

With Fasting. Surely the scripture almost everywhere joins fasting and mercy to prayer; for these virtues make us more cheerful and ready to pray through faith. Daniel says: "I turned my face to the Lord God, and sought him by prayer and supplication, with fasting, sackcloth, and ashes." Nor do Jonah and Joel teach unlike this. Indeed, in the gospel and writings of the apostles

we hear everywhere: "Watch; be fervent in prayer; be sober." For if the belly is full, either no prayers at all are made, or else fat and unwieldy ones. We read that St. Augustine said of this: "Would you have your prayer fly up to God? Then make it upon two wings: fasting and alms-deeds." ¹ For in the Acts of the Apostles the angel of the Lord says to Cornelius the centurion: "Your prayers and alms-deeds are held in remembrance in the sight of God." ^{Act 10.4}

With Charity. And surely God requires fervent prayer from us; but it cannot choose but be cold, if not inflamed with charity. Therefore, those who are cruel and unwilling to forgive their brethren their trespasses, and still retain hatred toward their brethren, cannot pray before God, who says: "And when you stand praying, forgive, if you have anything against any man, so that your Father who is in heaven may also forgive you your trespasses." ^{Mar 11.25} And again: "If you forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father shall also forgive you: but if you do not forgive men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive you your trespasses." ^{Mat 6.14-15} And in another place he says: "Therefore if you bring your gift to the altar, and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there before the altar, and go your way; first be reconciled to your brother, and then come and offer your gift." ^{Mat 5.23-24}

For otherwise, all your gifts will not be acceptable to God. Let us therefore willingly forgive, and let us love and do good to our neighbours, so that our prayers will pierce the heavens.

Mindful. Agreeable to this, is that we pray not only with the mouth or voice, but with the mind and inward affection of the heart, and with the spirit and fervency. There was no voice heard from Moses nor from Hannah, the mother of Samuel, when they prayed; but they cried to God most earnestly in spirit. God heard Moses, and led him safely with all the people of Israel through the Red sea, out of the most bloody hands of the Egyptians. And God made Hannah fruitful, who before was barren. And contrariwise, we read in the gospel, that the Lord alleged these words against the Pharisees, out of Isaiah: "This people draws near to me with their mouth, and honours me with their lips, howbeit their heart is far from me: but in vain do they worship me, teaching doctrines precepts of men." ^{Mat 15.8-9} Therefore, Paul aptly said: "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also." ^{1Cor 14.15} Here he calls the living breath and voice of man "spirit." ²

Freely Offered. By these heavenly testimonies, their prayers are condemned, who with a marvellous rolling and swiftness of the tongue, babble many words in a short space. And their prayers are maimed and curtailed, who utter words without sense; for their mind is otherwise occupied. No other desire is felt by them, unless this happens to be a desire: that they pant and blow, hasting to make an end of praying. Monks and priests are chief among this kind of men; they pray for money and for their hire; that is, they sell nothing for a great price to mad people. Not that prayers are vain of themselves, but because, being used in that way, they become vain. In the gospel, the Lord pronounces this against such men: "Woe to you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites; for you devour widows' houses, and do it under a pretence of long prayer; therefore you will receive the greater damnation." ^{Mat 23.14} I know what those sophisters here bring forth and allege for the defence of prayers said for reward or stipend; but in a few words I give them this knot to loose.

These men who pray in this way, either have faith and charity, or else they do not. If they have it, then they pray without reward, for charity's sake; and if they do not have it, then their prayers are of no effect. And therefore, it is with a false show that they deceive ignorant people, who pay their money for lawful prayers, but are requited with unlawful ones; and if they were lawful, then they were to be neither sold nor bought.

In God's Will. This is also required of the one who prays: that he does not desire things that are unworthy for God to grant, nor require those things that are contrary to the laws of God. For St. John the apostle says, "If we ask anything according to his will, he hears us." ^{1Joh 5-14} Therefore, when we ask things that are unworthy for God to grant, he does not hear us. Moreover, always and in all our prayers, our will and our desires ought to be obedient to God and his will. Therefore, let no man go about wickedly tying God to certain circumstances; let no man prescribe to God at what time, in what place, or in what manner, he will bring to pass anything that he will do. God, who is only wise, knows when it is time to help. He is also both faithful and omnipotent, and indeed able to do greater things than we can either ask or understand; We also read that Paul has said this. ^{Eph 3.20}

Therefore, that most honest widow, Judith, was not without cause very angry with Ozias the priest, ^{Jdt 8} because he appointed a set number of days to God, which being ended, God should deliver, or otherwise they would give up the city. For Judith says:

"What manner of sentence is this to which Ozias has consented: to deliver this city to the Assyrians if relief does not come to us within five days? And who are you that tempt the Lord? This is not a sentence likely to obtain mercy, but rather to provoke wrath and kindle displeasure. You have set the mercy of God a time limit, and have appointed him a day according to your own phantasy. But because the Lord is patient, let us rather repent, and crave pardon from his hands, by pouring out tears." ^{Jdt 8.10-14}

Therefore, being in extreme danger, we read that David spoke this most godly: "If I find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me back; but if he says to me, I have no delight in you; behold, here I am; let him do with me what seems good in his eyes." ^{2Sam 15.25-26}

Persistent. And now, long continuance is also very needful in prayers. The Lord says in the gospel, "Ask, and it shall be given to you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you." ^{Mat 7-7} By heaping together these words, he reminds us ¹ of continuance in prayer. "Ask," he says, earnestly and constantly, as those do who require things they stand in need of; "seek," as those do who search for things that are hidden and precious; "knock," as those do who with earnest desire long to come to their friend. For all these sayings not only signify a desire, but also a continual study to obtain the things required. In the gospel of St. Luke, the Lord presented a parable tending "to this end, that we should always pray, and never be wearied." ^{Luk 18.1} For Paul also says: "Rejoice always; pray continually; in all things give thanks." ^{1The 5-16-18} Yet, let no man think that by these words of the Lord and the apostle, the error of the heretics Psallini, or Euchitae,² is confirmed. They did nothing else but pray. The Lord commands us to pray always; that is to say, as often as we conveniently may, at all times and in all places, we are to be of an upright heart toward God ³ in all things, who should always wait for good things from God's hand, and give him thanks for the benefits received; who should also continually ask favour from Him. Such an endeavour is commended to us in Anna, the daughter of Phanuel. Luke mentions that she "did not depart from the temple, but night and day served the Lord with fastings and prayers." ^{Luk 2.36-37} It was not that she did nothing else, having no regard for her body, nor did not at any time eat, drink, or sleep; but because prayer was her continual and chief business. For today, speaking in the same way, we say that the husbandman labours without ceasing, and the student reads night and day. All men understand that this kind of speech signifies a continual and exceedingly great diligence in work and reading. The woman of Syrophenicia, in Matthew, chapter 15,¹ shows us a notable example of unwearied continuance in prayer or invocation. But if God seems to neglect us, or to defer our requests longer than seems fit, let us always remember what the prophet Habakkuk has said: "Yet a little while, and he that comes will come, and will not tarry;" and, "The just shall live by faith," etc. ^{Hab 2.3-4}

Timely. From this it will be very easy to show the time of prayer — when we ought to pray. We should therefore PRIVATELY pray always; for continually while we live, there is diverse and manifold matter offered to us for prayer. Pray therefore as often as the Spirit moves you, and as often as necessity itself or matter provokes you to pray. Yet, let nothing here be done by constraint; let all things proceed from a willing and free spirit. But PUBLIC prayers are restrained as to time; for there are set and appointed hours to pray. Set hours are those certain times received by the church, during which the whole congregation assembles together in the morning or evening, to hear the word of God, to pray, and to receive the sacraments. Socrates bears witness in his history, that the ancient churches in times past did not meet together in a holy assembly all at one time, and at the same hours. And there is no danger in this diversity.² Let it be left to the discretion of the churches to come together³ for the service of God, whenever it seems most necessary, customary, fitting, and profitable for themselves. Moreover, appointed hours of prayer are those which are set or forewarned for a certain time by the church, for present necessity's sake. In dangerous times, and in weighty affairs, the holy apostles appointed prayers and fastings; these are also lawful today, without superstition, and with just moderation. And it appears from these words of the prophet Joel, that this is a most ancient ordinance: "Blow the trumpet in Zion, sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly, gather the people together," etc. ^{Joe 2.15-16} Does the apostle not command man and wife privately to separate themselves for a time, and to abstain from their lawful delights, so that prayer in necessity may be more fervent? ^{1Cor 7.5}

THE PLACE OF PRAYER

And now, it will also not be hard to judge about the place of prayer; for I said in the beginning of this sermon, that holy men may pray at all times privately, and also in all places.

v.184

For the true prayer of holy men is not tied to any place, nor is it judged better in one place than in another; for the goodness or worthiness of the prayer is not esteemed by the place, but by the mind of the one who prays. For the Lord says in the gospel: "The hour will come, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit to pray in and in truth," etc. ^{Joh 4.23} But those who are persuaded that the godly may pray in no other place than at home in their chamber, are in no way passed over in this passage. In confirmation of this, they twist these words of our Saviour: "But when you pray, enter into your chamber; and when you have shut your door, pray to your Father, who is in secret; and your Father, who sees in secret, will reward you openly." ^{Mat 6.6} But these words are an antithesis, or a contrary sentence, to that which goes before it; and this is what goes before it: "And when you pray, you shall not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to stand praying in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen by men." ^{Mat 6.5} Against this he immediately opposes: "But you, when you pray, enter into your chamber." In reproving the abuse of prayer, he did not condemn the place properly, but rather he spoke figuratively in this manner: The Pharisees, with their prayers which they make in the streets, hunt for praise and commendation by the people; so on the contrary part, by mentioning a chamber, he did not mean that the place itself makes the prayer either better or worse; but he taught by figurative speech, that we should pray with an upright mind, and be most free of hunting for the praise of men. For he that prays with a mind not troubled with affections, having regard only to God, "prays in his chamber," whether he prays in the church or in the street. For otherwise, the Lord prayed with his disciples in the temple, in the city, in the field, and wherever occasion was offered. It also follows: "And the Father, who sees you in secret, will reward you openly;" that is to say, the Father, who allows a mind that is not proud, but humble and free from ambition, will reward you openly. But PUBLIC prayers are used in the church or assembly of saints. If any man despises them, saying prayer should not to be tied to any place, I cannot think he is worthy of the name of a Christian, since he shamefully abuses Christian liberty. Finally, I have spoken before about assemblies;¹ and we will perhaps say more in the last sermon of this decade.

³ Conveniant ecclesiae, Lat.: let the churches come together (convene).

THE POSTURE OF PRAYER

Here, the posture of those who pray also comes to be handled. But let all riot, all pride, all immoderate trimming of the body, be far from those who come into the church of Christ to pray. Someone would seem to filthily scorn the godly magistrate, who in coming to crave pardon for his fault, would lay aside his mourning clothes; and putting on white apparel, proudly appear before the assembly of grave and godly senators. Such a person might be judged worthy, not only to be denied his request, but also to be cast into prison. And who would deny that they more shamefully mock God, who coming into the church to ask His pardon, and being oppressed with the burden of their sins, yet in that place are so far from being humble, that they rather appear before the presence of God and his saints having their bodies so attired, as they thereby both provoke anew the wrath of God against them, and grievously offend the most godly who are in the church? Therefore, Paul teaches at large that modesty, proper and humble behaviour, is to be used in the church. This is seen in the eleventh chapter of first Corinthians. What remains about this matter, the blessed martyr of Christ, Cyprian, comprehends in these words:

"Let the words and prayers of those who pray, be governed in an orderly way, keeping modesty and shame-facedness. Let us think that we stand in the sight of God. God's eyes must be delighted both in the posture of our body, and the manner of our words. For just as it is the part of an impudent person to use clamorous shouts in praying; so contrariwise, it is fitting for a shamefaced person to pray with modest prayers."²

Some foolishly imagine, that prayer is made either better or worse by the posture of our bodies. Therefore, let them hear St. Augustine, Lib. ii. ad Simplicianian, Quaest. 4, saying:

"It does not matter in what way our bodies are placed, so long as the mind, being present with God, brings her purpose to pass. For we pray standing — as it is written, 'The publican stood afar off;' — and kneeling, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles; — and sitting, as David and Elijah did. And unless he was praying lying down, it would not have been written in the Psalms, 'Every night wash I my bed.' ^{Psa 6.6} For when any man seeks to pray, he places the members of his body in a manner which seems most fit to him at the time, to stir up his devotion. But when prayer is not sought, but an appetite or desire for prayer is offered — when anything comes suddenly to our mind, by which we are devoutly moved to pray with sighs that cannot be uttered;

Rom 8.26 in whatever manner it finds a man — doubtless, prayer is not to be deferred until we have sought in what place we may sit, or where we may stand or kneel down." ¹

Tertullian, in his Apology against the Gentiles, mentions the behaviour of the Christians of his time when they prayed. He says: "We Christians are all of us evermore praying for all men, looking up into heaven with our hands spread abroad, because we are harmless; we are bare-headed, because we are not ashamed; to be short, we need no one to put us in remembrance, because we pray from the heart." ²

Notwithstanding, what we must chiefly remember is the doctrine of our Saviour in the gospel, saying: "When you pray, you shall not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, so that they may be seen by men. Truly, I say to you, they have their reward." ^{Mat 6.5} For above all things, we must beware that we neither pray privately nor publicly to this end; nor should we fashion the posture of our body in order to get the vain praise of the people, so that we may seem to be renowned and considered holy before men. It suffices that we please God, and are allowed by his judgment.

THE SUBJECTS OF PRAYER

In the discourse of prayer, no man would say that it is the smallest thing to know what you ought to pray, what you should ask for from God, or for whom you should pray. Here the persons and things of prayer are to be considered. Persons are either public or private.

PUBLIC persons are bishops, teachers, magistrates, and all who are set in authority. The writings of the prophets, evangelists, and apostles, command us to pray for these men. Paul more than once requires intercessions to be made by the church to the Lord for him, that he might be delivered from disordered and froward men; and that he might freely preach the gospel, as it became him to preach it. ³ The same Paul commands us to pray for all those who are set in authority, "that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." ^{1Tim 2.2}

PRIVATE persons are our parents, wife, children, kinsfolk, allies, neighbours, citizens, friends, enemies, sick persons, captives, those who are afflicted, and, to be short, all who are nearby us, whose health and safety, both nature and Christian charity would have us commend to God by prayers. And there are testimonies and examples of these in the scripture.

But the THINGS we should pray for are those good things that are to be desired; some of which are heavenly, spiritual, or eternal; and others which are earthly, corporal, or temporal. Moreover, some things truly are common, and others again are private. Those things that are common pertain to the whole church and commonwealth; nor do they belong to a few, as private things do. And spiritual things are chiefly reckoned to be these: faith, hope, charity, perseverance, and that whole company of virtues, the profit and safety of the church, forgiveness of sins, and life everlasting. Among these are not unfitly reckoned the gifts of understanding, the liberal sciences,⁴ well ordered schools, faithful teachers, godly magistrates, and upright laws.

Corporal things are a peaceable commonwealth, strong and valiant armies for war, health, strength, a handsome body, abundance or sufficient wealth, the safe prosperity of wife and children, the protection and defence of friends and citizens, peace, a good name, and other things of this kind. But no man is ignorant, that we ought to have a greater care for spiritual things than corporal things, and to principally desire heavenly things. And there is also a choice to be made in corporal things: that the profit of the commonwealth be preferred before our own private gain. For if the commonwealth continues in safety, the citizens may also be safe; and so long as schools and universities or places of learning are maintained, there is hope that the commonwealth will never be destitute of wise and upright governors. In temporal goods, some things are also better than others. Those that are best, the saints or godly men therefore chiefly require from the Lord. Nevertheless, those which are of less value, they understand to come from Him, and therefore they also ask for them from the Lord. Those who are poorly exercised in the scriptures assert that it is not lawful in prayer to ask for corporal goods from the Lord; but they are confuted by many examples from the scripture. For not only the patriarchs and prophets, but also the apostles of Christ, asked for temporal goods from the Lord — such as defence against their enemies, a good report, and other things necessary for the body. We will learn this shortly by the form of prayer which the Lord himself has taught us, diligently showing us what we should ask for.

THE LANGUAGE OF PRAYER

This also comes in question, In what tongue must prayer be made? Those who assert that we must pray in Latin privately and publicly, seem in my judgment to be out of their wits, unless they speak of those who are skilful in the Latin tongue. For since we must pray not only with our mouth and voice, but also with our heart and mind, how, I ask you, will someone pray with heart and mind, who uses a language he does not understand? Indeed, he utters godly words, but he does not know what he says. For it all comes to one reckoning: to never pray at all, or to babble words which are not understood. Let every nation therefore pray in that language which it understands best and most familiarly.

And it is no less madness to use a strange language in public assemblies. This has been the root of the greatest evils in the church. Whatever the priests who were ordained by God, and the prophets who were sent from him, spoke or repeated to the people of olden times in the church, they did not speak or recite in the Chaldean, Indian, or Persian tongue, but in the Hebrew tongue — that is, in their vulgar ¹ and mother-tongue. They also wrote books in their vulgar tongue. Christ our Lord, together with his apostles, used the vulgar tongue. He furnished the apostles with the gift of tongues, that they might speak to every nation; and because in that age the Greek tongue was most plentiful and common of all, the apostles did not write in the Hebrew tongue, but in the vulgar Greek tongue. Truly, it behoves us that those things which are done in the public church for the holy assemblies' sake, should be understood of all men; for otherwise so many men would be assembled together in vain. From this it is clearer than daylight that those who have brought strange tongues into the church of God, have troubled all things, have quenched the fervency of men's minds, yes, and banished out of the church both prayer and the use of prayer, and all the fruit and profit that would come of things done in the church. And truly, the Roman and Latin prince [the pope] has brought this Latin abomination into the church of God. He cries out that it is wickedly done if Germany, England, France, Poland, and Hungary, both in prayer and other kinds of service in the church, do not use the Roman or Latin tongue, but use Dutch or German, English, French, Polish, or the Hungarian language. St. Paul, handling this controversy once, says in plain words:

¹ Vulgar: native and common - everyday language that is widely understood.

"If I pray in a strange tongue, my spirit or voice prays, but my understanding is without fruit. What is it then? I will pray with the spirit, but I will pray with the understanding also. I will sing with the spirit, but I will sing with the understanding also.

Otherwise, when you bless with the spirit, how will the unlearned say Amen at your giving of thanks, seeing that he does not know what you say? You may truly give thanks well, but the other is not edified. I thank my God, I speak languages more than you all: yet I would rather speak five words in the church with my understanding, that I might also instruct others, than to speak ten thousand words in a strange tongue." ¹Cor 14.14-19

And truly, Justinian the emperor cites this very place In Novell. Const. 123, where he strictly commands bishops and ministers to recite the holy oblation and prayers used in holy baptism, not secretly, but with a loud voice which might be heard by the people, with the intent that the minds of the hearers might thereby be stirred to set forth the praises of God with greater devotion.¹ Moreover, it is evident that Gregory himself, who is called the Great, spoke to the citizens in the city of Rome in their country's language. He himself witnesses to this in the preface of his commentary on Ezekiel, to Marianus the bishop.² Of the Greek bishops, no man is ignorant that in their churches they had their whole service in their native language, and they have left their writings to us in the same tongue. We might therefore be worthily judged mad and void of understanding if we too did not use our own language in the administration of divine service in the church. Because so many and such excellent examples have gone before us from the most famous churches, and the most singular bishops and governors of the church, I will not speak again about this most express and manifest doctrine of St. Paul the apostle.

SINGING

This place now requires that I say something about singing in the church, and of canonical hours. But let no man think, that prayers sung with man's voice are more acceptable to God than if they were plainly spoken or uttered; for God is neither allured with the sweetness of man's voice, nor is he offended if prayer is uttered in a hoarse or a base sound. Prayer is commended for faith and godliness of mind, and not for any outward show. Those outward things are used rather as a means to stir us up; even though they have little effect unless the Spirit of God inflames our hearts. Nor can any man deny that the custom of singing is very ancient; for the holy scripture witnesses that the Levites sang in the ancient church, long before the coming of Christ; yes, and they sang at the commandment of God. And again; I think no man can deny that the same skilled kind of music brought into the church of God by David, was both accounted among the ceremonies, and it was abolished together with the temple and the ceremonies. We do not read that our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the true Messiah and full perfection of the law, sung in any place, either in the temple or outside the temple; or that anywhere he taught his disciples to sing, or commanded them to ordain singing in the churches. For what is read in Matthew and Mark — "And when they had sung a hymn, or psalm, they went out into the mount of Olives," ^{Mat 26.30} — is such a saying, that it does not necessarily force us to understand that the Lord sang with his disciples. For a hymn, which is the praise due to God, may be humbly uttered without the voice quavering.³ Truly, the old translation in both places, in Matthew as well as in Mark, consistently interprets it: Et hymno dicto exierunt in montem Olivarum; that is to say: "When they had said a hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives." In Matthew, Erasmus has translated it, Et cum hymnum cecinnissent; "When they had sung a hymn:" but translating Mark, he says, Et cum hymnum dixissent; "When they had said a hymn:" but in either place it is $\upsilon\mu\nu\eta\sigma\alpha\nu\tau\epsilon\varsigma$ (umnesantes). And $\upsilon\mu\nu\epsilon\omega$ (umneoo) signifies, to praise, or to set forth one's praise; which has customarily been done both by singing, and also without singing.

We do not read that the Lord himself commanded singing to his apostles, nor that they ordained singing in the church; nor do we read in the Acts of the Apostles that they themselves sang in holy assemblies. Yet Paul did not rebuke the church at Corinth, which began to sing, either of her own accord, or by a certain imitation of the old church; because he saw their manner of singing differed much from the old. He therefore allowed the singing of psalms; but in the meantime, he preferred prophecy above it, or the office of preaching. He also required of those who sang, a measure to be kept, and also that it should be done with understanding; without this, doubtless, both prayer and singing is not only unprofitable, but also hurtful.

"I will pray with the spirit," says the apostle, "and I will pray with the understanding also. I will sing with the spirit, and I will sing with the understanding also." ¹Cor 14-15 Nor do I know of any place else where the apostle mentions singing in holy assemblies; unless we're inclined to apply here, what Paul has left written in the 3rd chapter to the Colossians (though that may seem to be a private institution). For he has left these words written in the epistle to the Ephesians: "Do not be drunk with wine, in which is excess; but be fulfilled with the Spirit; speaking to yourselves in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody to the Lord in your hearts; giving thanks always for all things to God, even the Father, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." ^{Eph 5.19-20} What manner of saying this is, is easily judged by the occasion and order of the words. For he says nothing about the public singing customarily used in the church, but of the private manner of singing. For he refers to riotous banquets where, for the most part, songs which were not very honest used to be sung by those who were well tippled [or tipsy]. "Therefore, do not be drunk with wine," says the apostle, lest you sing songs that are scarcely honest; rather, if you are inclined to sing, then sing psalms and spiritual songs. To this may also be added that even in those kinds of songs, he requires the song to be of the heart, rather than the warbling of the voice. This is far from at any time allowing unattractive shriekings, either public or private.

Even so, the sense and meaning will be simpler and plainer, if we understand that in corde (which signifies "in the heart" ^{Eph 5.19}) is used in that verse instead of "joyfully," or "from the heart." This is why no man can or should disallow moderate and godly singing of psalms, whether it is publicly-used in holy assemblies, or at home in private houses. And truly, you will find many testimonies in the ecclesiastical history written by Eusebius and Sozomenus, declaring that the eastern churches, even immediately after the time of the apostles, used to sing psalms and hymns to Christ our Lord. ¹ You will also find this: that it was ordained by certain decrees of councils, that nothing else should either be read or sung in holy assemblies except the canonical scripture. ² For early on, a mean ³ was not kept in the church, nor was only the canonical scripture used, for certain men intermixed their own songs.

Yet here, dearly beloved, I thought it good to put you in -mind of two excellent things concerning this matter. The first of them is that the singing of the ancient church was a far different kind of singing than what is used today. For Erasmus Rotterdam rightly judges that the singing used in the ancient churches was none other than a distinct and measured pronunciation, such as used today in some places in pronouncing the Psalms, the Gospel, and the Lord's Prayer.¹ Truly, Pliny, who was the proconsul in Asia, by a diligent search or examination of matters, found out that Christians met at certain appointed times before daybreak, and sang a psalm among themselves to Christ their God. That place from Pliny may be seen in book 10 of his Epistles to Trajan the emperor.² Also Rabanus Maurus says, lib. Instit. Cler. 2. cap. 48: "The primitive church sang in such a way, that with a little altering of the voice, it made the one who sang heard further; the singing was more like a loud reading than a song."³

These things he borrowed out of the 33rd chap. of St. Augustine's 10th book of Confessions. In that one place, he plainly confesses that he sins when he is more delighted with the sweetness of the voices than with the sense of the words. And therefore he desires that all the melodious tunes of sweet songs, with which the Psalter of David is replenished, might be removed from his ears and from the hearing of the church. For it seemed safer, which he remembered he had often heard concerning Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria: he made the reader of the psalm utter it with such little straining of the voice, that he seemed to read rather than to sing.⁴

By the things I just said, I would put you in mind that singing, however ancient an institution it may be, was nevertheless never universal, nor thrust upon the churches as a necessity; rather, it was free; nor was it always used in all churches. To this may be added what Sozomenus witnesses: that those churches which sang, did not use the very same kinds of prayers, or psalms, or readings, or the very same time.⁵ Socrates also says in the 5th book of his history, chap. 22: "To be short, in all countries, everywhere, you will not find two churches which in all points agree together in prayer."⁶

And it appears that it was a long time before the western churches received melody, or the custom of singing, even by the testimony of Augustine. In his 9th book of Confessions, chapter 7, he recounts that Ambrose, being oppressed with the snares and persecutions of Justina, the Arian empress, ordained that hymns and psalms should be sung according to the custom of the eastern parts. Since that time, the custom of singing has been retained and also received by other parts of the world.⁷ Nevertheless, before the western churches received the order of singing, they were esteemed by all those of the east to be true churches; nor did it enter anyone's head, that therefore they were heretical and schismatic churches, or not rightly governed, because they were destitute of song or melody. No man gathered that because the eastern churches sing, and the western churches do not, that therefore they are not churches.

If this uprightness and liberty had remained safe and unaltered⁸ — that is to say, if, according to that ancient use of singing, nothing had been sung but canonical scriptures; if it had still been in the liberty of the churches to sing or not to sing — then truly there would be no controversy in the church today about singing in the church. For those churches, which use singing in the ancient manner practised in singing, would sing only the word of God and the praises of God; nor would they think that they surpassed other churches in this point; nor would they condemn those churches that do not sing at all — and these would not despise those which used to sing soberly and reverently. For if godly men persevere in the study of godliness, and in daily ¹ prayers, even though they do not sing, yet they nevertheless remain the sons of God.

Nor does all singing edify in every place; nor are all churches fit to sing. Rabanus says in the same place that I just now cited, "The custom of singing is instituted in the church for fleshly-minded men's sake, and not for those who are guided by the Spirit; so that those who are not moved by words, may be allured with the sweetness of the melody." etc. ²

But the singing, about which there is controversy today, is not that sort of ancient singing; but it is more that, both in matter and tune, for the most part, it is clean contrary to the old. The common sort call it Gregory's singing. Doubtless it is not referring to Gregory the Great who, it seems, was not very friendly to singing. This appears from his constitution, described in the Registry, in the fifth part of it, chapter 44. ³ We would therefore seem to judge more truly, if we refer it to Gregory the fifth, who is said to have been enthroned about the year of our Lord 995, and moreover to have used the help of one Robertus Carnotensis.⁴ Yet there are some who ascribe it to Vitalianus, some to Gelasius.⁵ It would irk me to repeat what Durandus has patched together about this matter in his Rat. Divin. lib. v.; for I give it little weight.

There are many things in this latter kind of singing to be discommended. First of all, many things, even most things, are sung contrary to true godliness; nor are all things that are sung taken out of the holy scriptures, but instead out of I know not what kind of legends and the traditions of men. And those things which are sung out of the scriptures are for the most part so twisted and corrupted, that no part of the heavenly sense or meaning remains. Creatures and dead men are called upon. Moreover, this kind of singing is commanded by them; and they do not sing of their own accord or good will, but under constraint. Indeed, they sing for money, and to the end that they may get an ecclesiastical benefice, as they term it.

Only clerics hired for that purpose sing now-a-days; not the whole church of Christ, as was customary in times past. Nor is there any end or limit in their singing; they sing day and night. And there is more attributed to this foolish and ungodly kind of singing, as if to a heavenly or meritorious work, than true faith allows. A man may well say that it is so much babbling, which the Lord in Matthew forbids and condemns as a heathenish superstition. ^{Mat 6.7} Moreover, they sing in a strange tongue, which few understand; and that is done without any profit at all to the church. A long sound is heard, quavered,⁶ and strained to and fro, backward and forward, of which a man cannot understand one word. Often the singers compete for the excellence of their voices. By this it comes to pass that the whole church rings with a hoarse kind of yelling, and through the strife that arises between their voices, the hearers little understand what is sung. I say nothing at present about their music, which they call "figurative," and about their musical instruments, all of which in a way are contained in their "organs" as they term them. I say nothing about their dirges, or prayers for the dead. I treated this in another place.¹ But these, and other like things, so occupied the whole time of divine service in the church, that very little or none was left for true prayers, and for the holy and heavenly preaching of the word of God. Therefore, it was for most just causes that those who believe the gospel, neither use such singing, nor allow it in the church of God. They seem to deal very devoutly and most wisely, who bestow most of the time (or even the whole time) of ecclesiastical assemblies, in fervent and quiet prayers, and in the wholesome preaching of the word of God, omitting such singing. This is especially true since it is a hard thing to limit or restrain singing which is otherwise tolerable, lest it exceed and go beyond the appointed bounds at some point.

Furthermore, all the holy scripture witnesses in many places that our ancient predecessors had certain canonical and appointed hours, in which they prayed both privately in their houses and publicly in assemblies.

David more than once in his Psalms says that he would go to the Lord in the morning and evening. Daniel prayed to the Lord at three separate hours or times of the day. ^{Dan 6.10} Again, David says: "Seven times in a day I praise you;" ^{Psa 119.164} but by seven times he means many times. For elsewhere we read: "I will strike you for your sins seven times;" ^{Lev 26.24} and again: "The just man falls seven times, and rises up again;" ^{Pro 24.16} and also: "If your brother sins seven times in a day, and returns seven times in a day to you," etc. ^{Luk 17.4} In diverse places, therefore, as in this place of David, seven times is used for many times. And Christ our Lord has tied the private prayers of the faithful (as we told you before ²) neither to place, nor to time. He has not taken away public prayers; for he is not the Lord of confusion, but of order. But his disciples, when they were in the land of Jerusalem, also observed the customary hours of praying which that nation kept, out of liberty, not necessity, and especially for the assembly's sake. For Peter and John go up into the temple at the ninth hour of prayer. ^{Act 3.1} In the day of Pentecost, all the saints with one accord were gathered together, and received the Holy Ghost, at the third hour of the day. ^{Act 2.15} And it is also read, that Peter privately went up into the upper part of the house about the sixth hour. ^{Act 10.9}

The temple being destroyed, and the Jews scattered abroad, the churches gathered out of the gentiles did not observe the same hours of gathering together, or assemblies; but at their own liberty, as it seemed most fitting and convenient to every church. Truly, the ecclesiastical history also mentions this diversity;³ yet for the most part, there were hours in the morning and evening used for assemblies. St. Jerome, in his epitaph on Paula, does not expound the rite or order of the universal church as to what it should do in holy assemblies, but what the companies of solitary virgins usually did of their own accord. He says: "In the morning, at three, six, and nine o'clock, at evening, at midnight, they sang the Psalter in order. Only on Sunday they went to the church, near which they dwelt," etc. ⁴

So it pertains to private institution. The same sort of thing is written to Lacta, touching the institution of her daughter;⁵ and to Demetriades, De Custodienda Virginitate.⁶

And truly, the greater or more famous and solemn churches (which today they call cathedrals, namely, from cathedra, a chair, or from the order of prophets teaching or professing there; as at one the church of Antioch, Corinth, Alexandria, and similar ones, seemed to have been), at certain hours, namely, in the morning, at noon, yes, and evening also, assembled to expound or discuss the holy canonical scriptures. The foundations of that observation seem to be laid in the church of the Corinthians; of which the apostle abundantly witnesses in 1Corinthians 14th chapter. Eusebius, in the fifth book of his ecclesiastical history, ninth chapter, mentions an ecclesiastical school at Alexandria. He says: "From a long time ago, the doctrine and exercise of the holy scriptures flourished among them. This custom also continues even to our time; which we have heard also to be instituted by men mighty in eloquence, and in the study of the holy scriptures;" ¹ namely, following the example of the Corinthian church. Some marks ² of this most wholesome rite or custom appeared at some time in the occidental or western church, as gathered from the writings of St. Ambrose and Augustine.

But truly, in these very times, and in the times immediately following, all nations were in a way held by the ears with perpetual wars. The Roman empire was torn in pieces in revenge for the blood of Christ, and of his holy apostles and martyrs, according to the prophecy of Daniel and St. John the apostle and evangelist. It was made the prey of all people ³ — the Goths or Germans rushing them on this side, the Huns and other barbarous soldiers assaulting Rome sharply on the other side — the best schools were destroyed, extensive libraries were burned, honest and good studies perished. For this reason, doctors or teachers were given to the churches, who were most unlike the ancient doctors and teachers; they were not furnished with such an ability that they could deal in the holy scriptures with the same dexterity and fruitfulness as their predecessors. In this disorder and downfall, lest nothing remain untouched of the canonical scriptures, it is evident that men rose up who were not altogether negligent of the canonical doctrine, who divided the whole canonical scripture into such parts, that they might read over the whole bible once in the course of a year, and the psalter more often — yes, even in a sevensnight. ⁴ They used the Psalms instead of prayers; and as time went by, many other prayers were also joined to these. And lest the very reading of the scriptures seem to lack all exposition, the readings, lectures, or homilies of the fathers were at length added to it. It was not that the priests should read them secretly to themselves (as they are prone to do today), or that they should with a post-haste reading, mumble them in place of matins;⁵ but that they should thoroughly handle them in the open church, as an exercise before the people, to the edification of the church. ⁶ I need not repeat that this rite was not received by all men, so far is it from being strictly commanded. There remain some tokens or proofs of this In Distinct. 15. Sancta Rom. ⁷

Furthermore, it is from reading the canonical scriptures at specific hours, that they are named canonical hours; ⁸ just as the canons ⁹ are also named from studying and reading the canonical scriptures. But at what time this was done, and who did it, is not certainly known. Some attribute some part of it to Jerome, others to Damasus, and some to Pelagius (the second of that name); also some others to Gelasius and Gregory. ¹

Not a few homilies and lectures were said to be Bede's, and other doctors of later times.² In the end, many other things are read in those hourly prayers, which do not savour a whit of antiquity. And thus, truly, because it is an institution patched up in various ways and at sundry times, it is far newer than the papists think or take it to be. Nor are there any lacking who, at the request of Carolus Magnus, Paulus Diaconus (or monk) of Cassina, and monk Isuard, ordained and delivered to the church selected or chosen lessons, especially those which concern the saints and are customarily read at these hours. ³ But however the matter stands, it is most certain that those hours commanded today, and called canonical, are the invention of man and not of God. They are rasped or rotten relics or shadows of the old law. ⁴ Beside this, it cannot be denied that there are many fables, toys, and follies annexed to it. Truly, today there appears such a mingle-mangle or hodgepodge, that it seems utterly unworthy either to be used or suffered any longer in the church of Christ — unless we would rather that care be taken for the bellies of some, than for the good state and welfare of the whole church. This much and thus far about this.

THE LORD'S PRAYER

It remains, in the last place, to discuss how we must pray; what words, or what form of prayer, we must use. Truly, there are many forms of prayer; but none is better than that which our Lord, the only-beloved Son of God the Father, has delivered. Nor is there a more certain form comprehending all in all in few words. In this summary, he has prescribed what is worthy of him, what is acceptable to him, what is necessary for us, and to be short, what he is willing to grant. Expounding the Lord's Prayer, St. Cyprian says of this, among other things:

"He that made us to live, has also taught us to pray; even of his bountifulness by which he has granted both to give and to bestow all other things whatever. So that, when we speak with the Father in that prayer and supplication which the Son has taught us, we may be more easily or readily heard, and may truly and spiritually worship him. For what prayer can be more spiritual, than that which is given to us by Christ, from whom also the Holy Ghost is sent to us? What prayer before the Father is more true than that of the Son, proceeding out of his mouth, who is truth itself? So that, to pray otherwise than he has taught is not only ignorance, but also offence, since he himself has set down and said: 'You cast aside the commandment of God to establish your own tradition.' ^{Mar 7.8} Therefore, dearly beloved brethren, let us pray as God our master has taught us. It is a friendly and familiar prayer, to call upon God in such manner that he has taught us, when that prayer of Christ comes to his ears. Let the Father acknowledge the words of his Son when we pray. He that dwells within the heart, let him also be in the tongue. And since we have him as our advocate with the Father for our sins, and being sinners, when we ask pardon for our offences, let us utter the words of our advocate. For since he says, 'Whatever you ask the Father in my name, he will give it to you,' how much more effectually do we obtain what we ask in the name of Christ, if we ask it in his prayer!" ⁵

From here arises a question, "Whether we are so tied to the words of the Lord's Prayer, that we may not pray in other words at all? I answer that the Lord would not tie us to his words set down and conceived, as though it were not lawful to use other words or another form; but he set forth certain universal things for us, to which we might refer all our prayers. For Augustine writing to Proba about praying to God, de Orando Deo, shows that there is nothing in any place in the holy scriptures that is prayed for, which is not comprehended in the Lord's Prayer. "For," he says, "if you run over and through all the words of all holy prayers, you will find nothing which this prayer of the Lord does not comprehend and contain." He immediately adds: "So that it is free to use such and such words in praying, if it is to say the same things; but it is not free to speak other things." ¹ Therefore, they most warily and wisely act, who refer all their prayers to the Lord's Prayer, to which they attribute the chief and principal place; and keeping it continually in their mind, they meditate on it, and exercise themselves in it.

There is usually another question also to be asked, "What need there is to express and open our desires in words to God, since he already knows all things? We told you shortly after the beginning of this sermon, that prayer is humbling ourselves before the majesty of God.

To this, moreover, we add this: we do not express and open our desires to God, as though he did not know them, or as though we would teach him, being ignorant; or that we would entreat and get God's favour with our intricate, laboursome, and eloquent prayer. But it is for our own sakes that we use words with which to stir ourselves up. And to this end also the most holy men of God are, in the Psalms and holy histories, said to have largely declared their desires to the Lord. "We are not," says St. Jerome, "declarers, but cravers. For it is one thing to declare a thing to someone who is ignorant, and another thing to crave a thing from someone who knows — in that, it is a declaration; in this, it is a duty; there we faithfully declare; here we lamentably beseech." ² And St. Augustine says: "Words are needful for us, with which we may be moved and diligently consider what we should ask; not with which we should believe that the Lord is either taught or entreated." ³

Therefore, when the Lord forbade much babbling or vain lip-labour in prayer, he did not simply tie the prayer of the faithful to the sum of a few words. Rather, he forbids us, in the way of heathens, ^{Mat 6.7} to pour out many words without wit, reason, meaning, and understanding; and so to think that we will be heard for the sake of much babbling, and oft-repeated prayers; as they falsely think today, who say a certain number of prayers which they call Rosaries. ⁴

For the Lord adds: "They think they will be heard for the sake of babbling much." ^{Mat 6.7} St. Augustine differentiates between babbling much, and praying much.

"To babble much in praying, is to make many superfluous words in a necessary matter. But to pray much, is to call to him whom we pray to, with a long and godly stirring up of the heart. This business, for the most part, is accomplished more with sighings than with speakings... It is not wicked and fruitless to pray longer, when we have leisure; for it is written about our Lord himself, that he spent the whole night in prayer, and prayed a long time. What else did he do in this, but give us an example?" ⁵

The bead-roll, by which the private devotions of multitudes in the church of Rome are reckoned, was made up of tens of smaller beads, having a bead of a larger size between each decade. In the Rosary, properly so called, there were five of these decades: and the Ave Maria was repeated fifty times, the Pater Noster five times, and the Credo once.

And if it is a hard matter for any man to pray long and continually, he may break off his prayer. However, he must go to it again, and oftentimes renew it afresh; for such short speaking in prayer is praiseworthy. And that we may make an end of this place, let no man think that in praying, he declares our affairs to God as if not knowing them. Let no man think that he is heard for his presentation, and even for his laboursome and exact presentation, and that being often repeated, and with most earnest outcries instilled or poured into the ears of God. Let no man think that his prayer must stand on a certain number — that is to say, that Paternosters must be summed up for our God as if He did not have a good memory, and to a Lord who is ill to be trusted, upon corals and beads put together on a lace,¹ serving to keep a reckoning or account as it were.²

And because I have said what all godly men throughout the whole world confess, that a most perfect platform of praying is delivered to us in the Lord's Prayer by our Lord Jesus Christ himself, it remains that we cite word for word that most holy form of praying

It is orderly made with most divine words even by the mouth of the Lord, as Matthew the apostle has left it recorded for us. And then we will expound it as briefly and plainly as possible, with the intent that everyone may better understand what he prays, and feel a more effectual working inwardly. This is the form of that most heavenly prayer:

O our Father, which art in heaven; hallowed be your name. Your kingdom come. Your will be done, as well on earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our trespasses [or debts], as we forgive those who trespass against us [or our debtors]. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Amen. Mat 6.9-13

This most holy prayer of our Lord Jesus Christ, our saviour, our doctor or teacher, and highest priest, delivered to the catholic church to be a catholic form or rule to pray to God, is usually divided into a little PREFACE, and SIX PETITIONS. Some reckon seven. Some say, that the three former petitions serve chiefly to spread abroad God's glory; the three latter concern the care of ourselves, and ask those things that are needful for us. But they all seem to contain both in manner.

PREFACE — The little preface is this: "our Father, which art in heaven." By this we call upon God; and, dedicating ourselves to him, we commit ourselves wholly to his protection and mercy. And every word has his high mysteries; for our Lord would have us pray with understanding rather than with words. These therefore admonish us, and suffice to be thought upon. But the mind, being instructed with the Holy Ghost (which I told you is needful above all things for those who pray), and being lifted up to behold God and heavenly things, devoutly and ardently meditates on these things.

And truly the word, "Father," puts us in mind of many things together. For first, it teaches us that all our prayers ought to be offered to none other than to Him who is a father; that is to say, that only God is to be called upon, and not another for him, or another with him.

For our God and Father is one, the fulness and sufficiency of all good things, in whom only the faithful are quieted and rest, and without whom they seek nothing that is truly good. And truly this prayer can be offered to no creature. For to which of the angels, or the saints, can you say without sacrilege: "Our Father, which art in heaven?" etc.

Furthermore, this word Father teaches us through whom we should call upon this Father; not by the mediation or by the mouths of saints, but by Jesus Christ our Lord — through whom alone we are made the sons of God, who were otherwise children of wrath by birth and by nature. Eph 2:3 Who, I pray you, dares come before the presence of the most high and everlasting God, and call him "Father," and call himself "son," unless the Father in his beloved and natural Son had adopted us as the sons of grace? Therefore, when we say "Father," we speak from the mouth of the Son, who has taught us so to pray, and by whom we are promoted into this dignity. So that it is not at all needed to add the name of Christ, and to say, We pray you, heavenly Father, for Christ's sake; since in the first word "Father," we comprehend the whole mystery of the Son of God and our redemption. For insomuch as he is our Father, we are his sons, and that is by the merit of Christ. Therefore, we call upon the Father, and so we call him through Christ; to repeat, we pray so from the mouth of Christ. Moreover, this sweet and favourable word, "Father," clean disburdens us from all distrust of heart; for we call him "Father" not so much in consideration of his creating of all things, as for his singular and fatherly good-will toward us. Thus, even though he is Lord God, and indeed a great Lord, and an Almighty God — yet when we pray, we attribute none of these names to him; but we call him Father because indeed he wishes us well, loves us, takes care and charge over us, and having pity upon us, he desires to store and heap upon us all good things whatever; indeed, this is of his own accord and good-will toward us. To this pertain the testimonies of the prophets, especially that of David:

"The Lord is full of compassion and mercy, slow to anger, and of great kindness. He will not always chide, nor keep his anger forever. He has not dealt with us according to our sins, nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. For as high as the heaven is above the earth, so great is his mercy toward those who fear him.

As far as the east is from the west, so far has he removed our sins from us. As a father has compassion on his children, so the Lord has compassion on those who fear him. For he knows what we are made of, and he remembers that we are but dust." Psa 103:8-14

A very excellent example of this is to be seen in the gospel of St. Luke, where the loving father is painted with wonderful affections, receiving into favour again that prodigal son and waster of his wealth.

To this is added the word "Our;" which puts us in mind of two things. For first, it is not enough to acknowledge God to be the God and Father of all, or to be the God and Father of others, unless we also believe that he is our Father; unless we dedicate and yield ourselves wholly into his faith and protection, as our Father, who wishes us well, loves us, cares over us, and at no time and place neglects us. For unless we believe so, our prayer is not commended either with faith or with the love of God; and therefore, it is not a whit acceptable to God. But we understand that the best and greatest God is our God, by his manifold benefits, as well as (and especially by) the mystery of our redemption through Christ. We have spoken of this elsewhere.¹ Furthermore, since immediately, at the very beginning, he bid us to pray "Our Father," and not "My Father;" he requires love from us. For his will is that we should not only take care for our own salvation, but for the salvation of all other men. For we are all the members of one body — upon which each individual one prays not individually for themselves, but every one prays for the safety of all the members, and also for the whole body. Touching this matter, I spoke before, when I treated the manner of praying to God.²

There is later added, "Which art in heaven;" not that God is shut up in heaven as in a prison. Solomon, the happiest and wisest king of all, confuting that error long ago, said: "If the heavens of heavens are not able to contain you, then how much less this house!" ^{1Kng 8.27} To these words I think may be annexed those which Stephen alleged in the Acts of the Apostles (out of Isaiah ^{Isa 66.1}) concerning the same thing. ^{Act 7.49} God is therefore said to be in heaven, because his divine majesty, and power, and glory, shines most of all in the heavens.

For in the whole course of nature there is nothing more glorious, nothing more beautiful, than the heavens. Moreover, the Father exhibits and gives himself to us to be enjoyed in the heavens. Heaven is the country common to us all, where we believe God and our Father dwells, and where we worship God and our Father; even though we believe that he is in every place, and is always present with all. For as heaven compasses and covers all things, and is everywhere distant from the earth by even spaces, so the presence of his Majesty also fails us in no place. We have heaven everywhere in our sight; we are everywhere in the sight of God. But beside this, by the mention of heaven, we are put in mind of our duty and of our wretchedness. It is our duty to be lifted up in our minds, by praying into heaven, and to forget earthly things; and to be delighted with that heavenly Father and country more than with this earthly prison and exile. It is our wretchedness, that being banished out of that country for our sins, and wandering in this earth, we are subject to diverse calamities; and therefore, being constrained by necessity, we never cease crying to the Father. By first of all saying, "Which art in heaven," we differentiate between the Father whom we call upon, saying "our," and our earthly father; attributing almightiness to God. Surely the one who is called upon and ought to hear, must know all, see all, and hear all; yes, and moreover, He wills and is able to do all. Therefore, we expressed his good-will toward us in these words, "Our Father." And to this we now join His knowledge of all things, and His power to do all things, by adding, "Which art in heaven." By these words, the faith of those who pray is stirred up and confirmed.

SIX PETITIONS – Now six petitions follow in order.

The FIRST is, "Hallowed be your name." We have called God our Father, and ourselves his sons. But it is the part of sons to honour or glorify their father; and therefore immediately at the beginning, we desire that the name of the Lord God, and our Father, might be sanctified or hallowed. Truly, it is always holy and undefiled in itself; nor is it made any whit better or worse by us. Thus we pray that what is and remains holy in itself, should be acknowledged as such by us, and always sanctified by us.

A name is the definition of anything whatsoever; and names are invented to differentiate one thing from another — a means by which they might be known among themselves. But God is infinite and unmeasurable; moreover, he is one. Therefore, he does not have a name by which to be defined; and he does not need a name by which to be discerned from other gods. Those names that are attributed to him in the scriptures are attributed for our infirmity; to the end that, by some reason and comparison, we might understand some things that are said about the One who is unmeasurable and infinite. Therefore, the name of God is indeed God himself, with all his majesty and glory.

To "sanctify," or "hallow," otherwise signifies to separate things from a profane to a holy use. In this place, it signifies to magnify, to praise, and to glorify. We therefore desire that God himself, who of his own nature is a good, holy, and forever blessed, gentle, bountiful, and a merciful Father, might (as he is in himself) be acknowledged and magnified by all of us; that all nations, leaving their error and heresies, might consecrate themselves in truth to this one and only Father and God; that all things which defile the name of the Lord — of which sort are wicked deceits or practices, ungodliness, epicurism, an unclean life, and especially corrupt and anti-Christian doctrine — may be taken away; and that, being enlightened, we might sanctify or hallow the name of the Lord.

Therefore, in this petition we desire the Holy Ghost, the only author of all true sanctification; we pray for true faith in God by Christ throughout the whole world; we pray for holy thoughts and a pure life, with which we might glorify the name of the Lord. This is done while each one does his own duty; while Satan, the author of all uncleanness, is cast out; while corrupt doctrine is taken away, and deceit ceases; and while the filthiness of the world is banished. The most excellent king and prophet David presents this petition in these words: "God be merciful to us, and bless us, show us the light of his countenance, and be merciful to us; that your way may be known upon earth, your saving health among all nations. Let the people praise you, God; indeed, let all the people praise you;" and as follows in the 67th psalm. To this belongs the whole prayer of our Saviour, described by St. John in the 17th chapter of his gospel.

The SECOND petition is, "your kingdom come;" for the name of God and our Father cannot be sanctified or hallowed unless he reigns in us. There is one kingdom of God, another of the devil. Furthermore, one kingdom of God is said to be of glory, and another rightly of grace. The kingdom of glory is not of this world, but of another world. The kingdom of grace is the kingdom of Christ in this world. In this kingdom, Christ reigns by the Holy Spirit in his faithful ones, who of their own accord submit themselves to him to be governed, saying and doing those things which beautify and befit Christians. The devil also reigns, but in the children of unbelief, who yield themselves to him to be governed according to his ungodliness and wickedness — doing those things which are not only delightful to the flesh, but which turn to the reproach of God's majesty. After this life, by the just judgment of God, the devil, the king of the ungodly, is caught unto hell, into the kingdom of death and judgment, there to continually burn. Moreover, the earthly kingdom, which princes of this world govern, is called either the kingdom of God, or the kingdom of the devil, as it fashions and frames itself to one of the two. All these things we knit up in few words, because we have more plentifully treated them in another place.¹ Thus, we pray in this second petition, that Christ might reign and live in us, and we in him; that the kingdom of Christ might be spread abroad and enlarged, and prevail throughout the whole world; that doctors or teachers, and ecclesiastical magistrates, and finally, that princes, and, yes, schools too, and whoever may further the kingdom of Christ — being anointed and watered with His graces, may flourish, overcome, and triumph. Furthermore, we pray that the kingdom of the devil and antichrist may be broken and vanquished, lest it hurt and trouble the saints; that along with the kingdom of the devil, all ungodliness may be dashed and trodden underfoot — to be short, that all the weapons and armour of anti-Christianism may be broken into slivers, and come to nothing.

Lastly, we pray in this second petition, that, after we have sailed out of the tempestuous gulf² of this world, we might be received and gathered to Christ and all the saints, into the everlasting kingdom of glory. For as we desire the kingdom of God to come to us, and God to reign in us, so we pray to come or to be received into his kingdom, and to live forever with him most holily.

The THIRD petition is: "your will be done, on earth as well as it is in heaven." God does not reign in us, unless we are obedient to him. Therefore, after his kingdom, we desire the grace of perfect obedience. For we do not desire that God does what he will; for God's will is continually done, even though we never pray for it, and even though we wrestle and strive against it with all our might. For the prophet says: "Our God is in heaven; he has done whatever pleased him in heaven and on earth." ^{Psa 115.3} We ask, therefore, that what he wills, he may make us both to will and to do. For his will is always good; but through the corruption of sin, our will is evil. Therefore, we pray him to be present with us with his grace, that our will may be regenerated and framed to the good will of God; that of its own accord, it yield itself to the Holy Ghost to be framed; that his grace wills what he inspires;¹ that he finish in us what he has well begun, and gives us, moreover, strength and patience for it; that in prosperity as well as in adversity, we may acknowledge the will of God,² lest we will anything of ourselves, and swell and be puffed up in prosperity, and also faint and perish in adversity. Rather, we pray that we may apply ourselves in all things, and through all things, to be governed by his will; namely, to submit our will to his will in this manner. Furthermore, if we ask anything contrary to his will, that he would not grant it, but rather pardon our foolishness, and weaken our own will (for our will is not good for us); to instruct and teach us in His good will, to the end that we may doubt nothing, that this will is always to be followed, that this will is always good, and that this will works all things for our commodity and benefit.

In this point, the faithful feel a very great battle in themselves. Paul witnesses to this, saying: "The flesh lusts against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh. And these two are at mutual enmity between themselves, that what things you would do, you cannot do." ^{Gal 5.17} Therefore, we do not desire any kind of framing of our will to God's will, and yet we add: "On earth, as well as it is in heaven" — that is, Grant, O Father, that your will may be done in us earthly men, as it is done in your saints,³ the blessed spirits. These spirits do not strive against your most holy will in heaven. But being in one mind, they only will that which you will, yes rather, in this one thing they are blessed and happy: that they agree and quiet themselves in your will. Truly, it is not the least part of felicity or happiness in earth, to will what God wills; it is the greatest unhappiness, not to will what God wills. And truly, this might be declared by infinite examples. I will allege only one, and a common one too. Someone is grievously sick, and feels pains and torments scarcely tolerable; but in the meantime, he acknowledges that he suffers these things by the commandment and will of God, his most good, bountiful, and just Father, who wishes him well, and has sent this grievous calamity for his salvation and for his own glory. Does he not, in the midst of his torments, by submitting himself to the will of God, feel refreshing? And that which seemed most sharp and most bitter to man, by this voluntary and free submission, he makes it delightful and most sweet. Again; another is sick, though not vexed with a very great disease; but this man does not acknowledge that this sickness is laid on him by the good will of God. Rather, he thinks that God does not know about the disease, that God does not care about the disease. Therefore this man attributes it to diverse and sundry causes, and he imagines and seeks diverse means to heal it. And in these things, he is awfully vexed and afflicted; and yet, by striving so against the will of God, he feels no refreshing or comfort at all. Therefore, not willing what God wills, what else does he do (as they are prone to do) than double the evil, by using ill means to avoid it?

Therefore, the foundation of all happiness is faithful obedience, by which we fully submit ourselves and whatever else belongs to us, to the good will of God. And therefore, in this greatest petition, we pray to the Father that he would give us regeneration or newness of heart, true obedience, persevering patience, and a mind that is always and in all things agreeing with and obeying God.

³ coelitibus tuis, Lat.: in your heavenly ones.

The FOURTH petition is such: "Give us this day our daily bread." For the will of God cannot be done in us, unless we are nourished and strengthened with the bread of God. Bread, among the Hebricians, signifies all kinds of food, and the preserving or sustenance of the substance of man. Thus we read in the prophet: "I will break the staff of bread." ^{Eze 4.16} But man consists of two substances, the soul and body. The soul is the spirit; the body is made of earth and other elements. Therefore, it is preserved with two kinds of bread, spiritual and corporal. The spiritual food of the soul, by which it is preserved in life, is the very word of God, proceeding out of the mouth of God; out of the law, ^{Deu 8.3} the Lord repeats and says: "Man does not live by bread only, but by every word that comes out of the mouth of God." ^{Mat 4.4} And because this presents to the faithful, the eternal and incarnate Word of God — I mean, the very Son of God — we rightly acknowledge that he is the food of the soul, indeed, the food of a whole faithful man. For he himself witnesses that he is "the bread that came down from heaven; of which those who eat, shall not die," but have life everlasting. ^{Joh 6.51} Corporal bread consists of elements, and it is earthly; it comprehends food, drink, raiment, prosperous health of body, maintenance — to be short, the safety and good estate of man's life.

And this bread, truly, we call ours; not that it is not the gift and benefit of God, but because it is appointed for us, and pertains to our preservation, and is necessary for us. Yet, when we call it daily, we signify that it is the most excellent of all, which alone can sustain and preserve our substance — as much as is sufficient and as long as it is fitting, and altogether in the same manner and order which is needed. For we said before, it is not our part to prescribe to God the manner of doing or giving.

To this also pertain the following words, "Give us this day:" for it belongs only to God to give; nor does this petition apply to any creature. David says: "All things wait upon you, that you may give them food in due season. When you give them, they gather it; when you open your hand, all things are filled with good." ^{Psa 104.27-28} Again: "The eyes of all things do look upon you, O Lord, and you give them food in due season; you open your hand, and fill with your blessing every living creature." ^{Psa 145.15-16} Now, we pray "Give us," and not "Give me." This puts us in mind again both of brotherly love and unity. For we should not only seek our own, but also to pray for the safety and preservation of all other men. The word, "this day," appoints us a measure. For we are saying this: Suffice us, Lord, daily and every moment, with as much as is necessary and enough for us, which you alone know best of all. For we are admonished, by the way, that we should not burn with immoderate desire for transitory things; and we should not lavish them riotously when we have them, losing both our goods and our souls. And therefore, that wise man has said:

"Two things have I requested of you; do not deny me these before I die. Remove far from me vanity and lies; give me neither poverty nor riches; only feed me with food convenient for me: lest perhaps being full, I should deny you, and say, Who is the Lord? or being oppressed with poverty, fall to stealing, and forswear the name of my God." ^{Pro 30.7-9}

Therefore, in this fourth petition, we yield ourselves wholly into the care and tuition of God the Father, and commit ourselves to his providence — that he who alone is able to save us, might feed, defend, and save us. For unless he pours his blessing upon us, unless he gives us strength by those things that are the means of our sustentation ¹ and maintenance, all things are of no force. We pray for the happy course of the word of God; for the pastors of the church themselves; for the maintainers of the commonweal; for the safety of the church and commonweal. We crave that the bountiful Father would supply all wants, and give whatever things are necessary for the sustentation both of the body and the soul.

The FIFTH petition. Furthermore, lest anyone think himself unworthy of the daily bread, because it is for children and not dogs, Mar 7.27 and therefore that he should pray hesitantly, and with less courage, the Lord, preventing ¹ this cautiousness of the godly, adds the fifth petition. It is this: "And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors." In these words, we ask forgiveness of our sins. And that we may obtain forgiveness of our sins, it is needful that we confess ourselves to be sinners. For unless we do this, how will we pray that our sins should be forgiven? Truly, all the saints use this order of praying; therefore, all of them acknowledge themselves to be sinners. For there remain relics, yea, even in the regenerate and most holy men, which daily burst out into evil thoughts, evil sayings and doings, yea, and often into heinous offences. But whatever our faults and sins, first, truly we confess them humbly to God the Father, and afterward pray him to forgive them. We call our sins "debts," as God himself teaches us, because we are indebted for the punishment of them (as the price) due to God. And he forgives our debts, when he does not punish us as we deserve. He judges us as if we were not indebted to him at all. For the allusion is made to corporal debts: which if the creditor forgives the debtor, he has no further power to cast into prison, or to punish the one who was his debtor. Therefore, not only is the fault forgiven us, but the punishment also. Nor do we speak any words about our merits to the Father.; but we say, "Remit, or forgive, us our debts." The word remission means a free forgiveness of sins; he forgives us, because we are not able to pay. Thus we read in the gospel: "When the debtors were not able to pay, he forgave them both their debts." Luk 7.42 The same is set down in Matthew 18.25. Therefore, it is by no merits of ours, by no satisfaction of ours, but by the bountifulness of God through Christ, that we pray that all our sins may be forgiven. Nor do the saints doubt the certainty of forgiveness here; for the Lord says in the gospel: "Whatever you ask in my name, believing, you shall receive it." Therefore, those who pray in faith, do not doubt that their sins are forgiven for Christ's sake; for so we also confess in our creed: "I believe the forgiveness of sins."

We quickly add to this: "As we forgive our debtors" —not that we should think, through our forgiveness, that we deserve or obtain forgiveness of our sins; for otherwise the reason for remission would not be certain. For if someone either brings or does anything for which his sin is taken away, or if he satisfies for his sin, nothing is forgiven. Rather, he is recompensed as he deserves. Therefore, these things seem to be added for other causes. First, as much as we care about forgiveness (which many may doubt), the Lord's will is to comfort our insecurity by adding this phrase. It is a sign, as it were, by which we might understand that our sins are surely forgiven by God, so far as we are sure that we have remitted and forgiven others their offences with which they have offended us. Furthermore, his will was to drive out of us all old grudges, hatred, and malice; and to drive into us the study and desire of love and charity; and to admonish us of our duty, that, if as yet there stuck in our minds any part of old enmities, we may know that it should altogether be laid aside and cast out of our stomach — yes, and that even now, we must call upon the Lord to move our hearts, that we may be able to do it. Surely, it is hard ² to lay down old injuries and offences. But it is fitting that we forgive our brethren lesser faults, when we have obtained pardon of very great sins by our most gracious Father. That is, unless we wish to haply test our fortune, like the one in the parable of the gospel. He had proof of the great bountifulness and liberality of his Lord in forgiving him, while he was fierce and cruel toward his brother, in exacting from him a very small and trifling debt. The parable is very well known in the eighteenth chapter of St. Matthew. Mat 18.23-35

The SIXTH and last petition is: "And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil;" for sin is never so forgiven, that concupiscence does not remain in the flesh, which temptations stir up, and lead us into diverse kinds of sins. And these temptations are of diverse sorts. For first, God tempts us when he bids us do any thing by which to prove us, such as when he asked Abraham to offer up his son; or else, when he sends adversity upon us, so that with the fire of temptation, he may both exercise our faith, and cleanse away the dross of our misdeeds. These temptations of God tend to the salvation of the faithful. Therefore, we do not simply pray not to be tempted: for the temptation of God is profitable. For the man who suffers temptation is said to be blessed:

"For when he is tried, he will receive the crown of life." ^{Jas 1.12} We also pray that we are not led into temptation: for the devil likewise tempts us; and we are tempted by the world, and by our flesh. There are temptations on our right hand and on our left, tending to this end: to overthrow us, to drown us in the bottomless pit of our sins, and thereby to destroy us. When that is done, we are not only tempted, but we are led into and also entrapped in temptation. Therefore, we make such a petition as this: If it pleases you, heavenly Father, to exercise us with your wholesome temptations, we beseech you to grant that we may be found approved. And do not allow us to be led by a devilish and wicked temptation, so that, leaving you, and being made bond-slaves to our enemy, and drowned in the gulf of wickednesses, we are caught and kept by him in evil, sin, and in our own destruction.

For now we add the contrary clause, which also expounds the former. Others say it is the seventh petition: "But deliver us from evil;" απο του πονηρου; I say, from that evil, namely, from Satan, who elsewhere is called a tempter. Deliver us from Satan, and from all evils which he sends: deliver us from snares, crafty practices, deceivings; from war, famine, captivity, plague; from all those things which are evil, hurtful, and dangerous. Those things which our heavenly Father knows very well, to whom we say here: "Give us healthful and good things; take away from us those things which you know to be hurtful and evil."

And so, we briefly conclude the Lord's Prayer, adding moreover, "Amen." That confirmation and giving of assent, was common and usual of old, as we see in Deu. 27, Neh. 8, and 1Cor. 14. To begin with, it expresses our desire; for we confess that we heartily desire those things which we pray for. Besides that, it declares the certainty of our faith, as if we were to say, I believe assuredly that these things are granted to me by God. For "Amen" is the same as saying, "So be it." And the Lord in the gospel oftentimes says, "Amen, Amen, I said to you" — that is, of a certainty I tell you the truth; or I utter and pronounce to you the undoubted truth. And so the faithful, after they have offered prayers to God, having their minds pacified, now joyfully wait for the gifts of the Lord.

Furthermore, before the word, "Amen," immediately after reciting these words, "But deliver us from evil," some add, "For yours is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen." But Erasmus Rotterdam, in his annotations on the new Testament, witnesses that those words are not found in any old Latin copy, but are found added in all Greek copies; and yet they are not expounded by any of the interpreters, except by Chrysostom and his follower Theophylact. And therefore, they seemed to him to be added to the Lord's Prayer, as some have added these to the Psalms: "Glory be to the Father, to the Son," etc. Erasmus immediately adjoins:

"Therefore, there is no cause why Laurentius Valla should stomach the matter, that a good part of the Lord's Prayer was curtailed. Their rashness was rather to be reprov'd, who did not fear to patch their own toys to so heavenly a prayer. For I may call them toys, in comparison to that which God has taught, whatever has proceeded from men; especially if that which men have added and put to, is compared with Christ the author of prayer." ¹

Nor did only Erasmus doubt this addition. For the Spanish copy, called Codex Complutensis, has this: "It seems more credible that these words are not a part of the Lord's prayer, as a member of the whole, but was put in through the fault of some certain writers, or printers."

In the same book is shortly added:

"And even though St. Chrysostom in his Commentaries on Matthew, Homil. xx., expounds these words as if they were of the text; yet it is conjectured to be more true that even in his time, the originals in his treatise were corrupted. Thus, none of the Latins, not of the ancient interpreters or commentators, has made any mention of these words." ²

And surely, this is truly said. For the most diligent interpreters, each of whom has taken in hand to expound the Lord's Prayer word for word, as did St. Cyprian, Jerome, and Augustine, have not spoken so much as one word about this addition.

I have said this much up to here about the Lord's Prayer, and about calling on God's name; of which Solomon, the wisest that ever was, most truly pronounces: "The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runs to it, and is exalted;" ³ that is, he stands and is preserved in a safe, or in a high place, out of the reach of any weapon.

THANKSGIVING

We will say something (as we have done with this) about thanksgiving, another kind of prayer. And though this is also comprehended in the Lord's Prayer (for it comprehends all things belonging to true prayer, therefore it contains thanksgiving also), after expounding that, I would also treat this by itself, lest by mingling things, there arise a confusion or disorder in our minds. And truly, the Lord requires thanksgiving of us — of which there are not a few arguments for it in the holy scriptures. For how many praises, rejoicings, and thanksgivings, are read in the Psalms, written and left both by David and other prophets! And in the law also, the Lord instituted a particular kind of oblation and sacrifice, which we have said is called the Eucharist, or the sacrifice of thanksgiving.⁴

What else was the supper of the Passover, but a thanksgiving for deliverance out of Egyptian captivity? Surely, our Lord Jesus Christ, instituting a remembrance of all his benefits and specially of the redemption purchased by his death, and knitting up all the sacrifices in brief, delivered the Eucharist, or sacrament of thanksgiving, to his church. We will declare this in a convenient place; and we partly showed it in our former sermons.⁵ Mankind in prosperity is all about lustiness and jollity, and seldom thinks to himself, where prosperity comes from. So he does not regard those spiritual mysteries and benefits so much as he otherwise would. But they seem to be swine, and not men, who not only fail to regard the benefits of God as they should, but moreover contemn them, and tread them underfoot. The heavy judgment of God waits for them.

Furthermore, the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving is due to God only: for he is the only giver and author of all good things; though in the meanwhile He uses the means and ministry of men and other creatures. Some prince sends you a most royal gift; and that is done by a courtier not of the lowest degree, but a most chosen man. Yet nevertheless, though he is a nobleman, you do not give thanks to him, but to the prince from whom the gift came. In the meanwhile, however, you honestly confess that the courtier in this bestowed his labour for your sake. But he would not have bestowed it unless his prince had so commanded. And so the whole benefit at length redounds to the prince himself, and to him alone. As all our invocation or calling upon God is acceptable to God the Father through Jesus Christ our Lord, so no thanksgiving of ours is acceptable to God, unless it is offered through Jesus Christ. To this pertains the mystery of the altar of incense, which is mentioned in the ceremonies of the law.¹ But the apostle also says: "Give thanks always for all things to God the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." And again he says: "By him we offer a sacrifice of praise always to God, that is, the fruit of lips confessing his name."

But that we may be thankful for all the benefits of God, and offer continual thanksgiving to God, it is needful to first acknowledge and weigh well with ourselves, the benefits of God; for if these are not yet known or rightly weighed, our mind is not set on fire to give God thanks for his benefits.

And these are quite diverse; indeed, they are infinite: for they are private and public, general and special, spiritual and corporal, temporal and eternal, ecclesiastical and political, singular and excellent. But who can reckon up all their kinds and parts? God created, beautified, garnished, and made this world fruitful for man. To the ministry of this, he severally appoints angelic spirits, whom he had created to be ministers for himself. He gives us souls and bodies, which he furnishes and stores with infinite gifts and abilities; and, that which far passes all other benefits, he loosed man, being entangled in sin; he delivered him, being a bond-slave to the devil. For the Son of God sets us free into the liberty of the sons of God. By dying, he quickens; by shedding his blood, he purges and cleanses;² he also gives us his Spirit, by which we may be guided and preserved in this banishment, until we are received into our everlasting and true country. Those who consider these things with a true faith cannot help but be rapt into the praise and setting forth of God's goodness, and into wonderment at a thing that is doubtless to be marvelled at — that the gracious and mighty God has such a special care for men, than whom this earth has nothing more wretched or miserable.

Here the saints of God are destitute of words, nor do they have words fit enough for so great a matter. David cries: "O Lord our God, how wonderful is your name in the whole world; for you have set your glory above the heavens;" and following in the eighth psalm. ^{Psa 8.1} And again, "Who am I, O Lord God, and what is the house of my father, that you have brought me here (or so advanced me)? And what can David say further to you? for you, Lord God, know your servant;" and so forth, as follows in the 2nd book of Samuel, chap. 7. ^{2Sam 7.18-20} This David has set down a most notable form of blessing, or praising, or giving thanks to God, in the 103rd Psalm, which begins thus: "Bless the Lord, my soul; and all that is within me, bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits; who forgives all your wickedness;" and so forth.

But what need is there of any more words? The Lord's Prayer may be a most perfect form of praising God, and giving thanks to God for all his benefits, and serve instead of many. For as the preface and all the petitions call to our remembrance, and absolutely set forth for us, God's greatest benefits which are most liberally bestowed upon us, and also upon all others. So, if we consider that it is our duty to give thanks to God for every one of these, and later begin, even at the beginning of the Lord's Prayer, to weigh this chiefly with ourselves, that God the Father, of his unspeakable mercy toward us, has adopted us miserable sinners into the number of sons, by whom we will be sanctified, and in whom God will reign, and at last also translate to his everlasting kingdom. What a plentiful matter of praising God and giving thanks to him is to be ministered here, to say nothing of all the other petitions! But these things are better and more rightly understood by good, godly, and devout exercise, than by precepts, however diligent.

And the Lord so much esteems this thanksgiving, offered to him with true humility of mind, and also faith, that he receives it and considers it a most acceptable sacrifice. There is often mention of this in the old Testament, as when it is said: "Whoever offers me thanks and praise, honours me. I will not reprove you because of your sacrifices. I will take no bullocks out of your house, nor goats out of your folds.¹ Offer to God the sacrifice of praise, and pay your vows to the most High; and call upon me in the day of trouble; I will hear you (and ² deliver you), and you shall glorify me." Psa 50.14-15, ⁹ Again: "I will offer you the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and I will call upon the name of the Lord." Psa 116.17 And Hosea also says: "Take these words with you, and turn to the Lord, and say to him, O forgive us all our sins, and receive us graciously (Nim rechtfur gut); and then will we offer the calves [sacrifices] of our lips to you." Hos 14.2 Accordingly, Malachi has also left written: "I have no pleasure in you, says the Lord of hosts; nor will I receive an offering at your hand. For from the rising of the sun to its going down, my name is great among the gentiles; and in every place, incense and a pure offering shall be offered to my name: for my name is great among the gentiles, says the Lord of hosts." Mal 1.10-11

Furthermore, ³ with great consent, all the old interpreters (Irenaeus chiefly, and Tertullian) understand this "pure offering" to be Eucharistia — that is to say, praises and thanksgivings, and prayer proceeding from a pure heart and a good conscience and an unfeigned faith.⁴ Truly, the ancient fathers have called the Eucharist, or mystical supper of Christ, a sacrifice, for no other cause than in it praise and thanksgiving are offered to God. For the apostle Paul shows that Christ was once offered, and cannot be offered often nor any more.

For great is the worthiness, power, and virtue, not only of praise or thanksgiving, but also of prayer wholly; I mean of the invocation too. Although I have already said something about this, ⁵ where I declared that our prayers are effectual, yet I add these few words. The saints truly had a most ardent desire for praying, because of the wonderful force of prayer. For, to say nothing of those most ancient fathers before and shortly after the flood, did not Abraham pray when he received the promises? And as often as he changed his dwelling, did he not call upon God? At Abraham's prayer, king Abimelech is delivered from death and from barrenness, which the Lord, being displeased, laid upon his house; he is cured. Gen 20.17-18 Jacob poured forth most ardent prayers to God, and received inestimable benefits from Him. In Exodus, Moses prays, not once, but often; and takes away the plagues from the Egyptians, which the Lord had brought upon them by his just judgment. At the prayer of Moses, the Amalekites turn their backs; and when he ceased or left off, the Israelites fled away. Exo 17.9-11 Again, when the fire of the Lord devoured the outlying tents of Israel, they cried to Moses; and Moses again cried to the Lord: and suddenly the fire that devoured them was consumed. Again, the people murmured against the Lord, and vengeance is prepared; but Moses by mild and continual prayer quenches the wrath of God; for it is said to him: "I have let them go according to Your word." shortly after, when the people began afresh to murmur against Moses and Aaron, and the vengeance of God had already consumed fourteen thousand and seven hundred men, Aaron, at the commandment of Moses, burns incense, and standing between the dead and those that were living, though near and appointed to death, he pleads for and obtains pardon by prayers. Num 16.41-48 Innumerable others of this kind are read about Moses. By prayers Joshua, Moses' successor, made the course of the sun and moon stay so long, until he had revenged himself upon his enemies. Jos 10.12-13

By prayer, without any audible voice, Hannah puts away from her the reproach of barrenness, and immediately is made a fruitful mother of very many children. 1Sam 1.13; 2.21 Samuel, the most godly son of godly Hannah, vanquishes the Philistines by prayer; at harvest time, a mighty tempest of thunder and rain was suddenly raised up. 1Sam 7.8-11 We also read things not unlike Elijah. Jonah in like manner prayed in the whale's belly, and was cast on the shore safe. Jon 2.1-9 Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah, most religious kings, by prayers that were poured forth to God by faith, triumph over their most powerful enemies. Nehemiah asked nothing of his king before he had first prayed to the Lord of heaven; Neh 1.4; 2.5 therefore he obtained all things. Neh 2.8 By prayer, the most valiant and virile Judith overthrew and slew Holofernes, the most proud enemy of God's people, and the terror of all nations. Jdt 13.3-11 Daniel brought all his affairs to pass by prayers to God; so too, Esther took a deed in hand that was necessary for God's people, and with three days' fasting and daily ¹ prayers, brings it to a happy end. Est 5.1f In the most blessed and most desired birth of our Lord Jesus, companies of angels are heard singing praises together to God. Luk 2.13 What, and when our Lord's life was in extreme danger, did he not take himself to prayer; and later heard the voice of an angel comforting him? The apostles, together with the rest of the church, prayed with one accord about the third hour or the day, and shortly after, they received the Holy Ghost. Act 2.1-15

And when the apostles were in danger, the church cries suppliantly for God's help, and without delay, quickly finds succour. Act 12.5 They receive great liberty to speak, and work very great signs and miracles among the people. Peter is brought out of a very strong and fenced prison by an angel of God. Act 5.19 What should I say about Paul and Silas praying and praising the Lord in prison? Is it not read, that the foundations of the prison were all shaken with an earthquake, and by that occasion the keeper of the prison was turned unto God? Act 16.25-26 I could bring countless examples of this sort, truly; but I am persuaded that for the godly, these are sufficient. And faithful men do not attribute these forces, effects, or virtues, to prayer, as though to a work of ours, but as proceeding from faith; and so they attribute them to God himself, who promises these things, and performs them for the faithful.

For the judgment of Paul touching these is known in the 11th chap. to the Hebrews: that all glory is due to one God: may He grant to so illuminate all our minds, that our prayer may always please him. Amen.

5-6. THE SIXTH SERMON: OF SIGNS & SACRAMENTS.

OF SIGNS, AND THE MANNER ¹ OF SIGNS; OF SACRAMENTAL SIGNS: WHAT A SACRAMENT IS; OF WHOM, FOR WHAT CAUSES, AND HOW MANY SACRAMENTS WERE INSTITUTED BY CHRIST FOR THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH; WHAT THINGS THEY CONSIST OF; HOW THESE ARE CONSECRATED; HOW THE SIGN AND THE THING SIGNIFIED IN THE SACRAMENTS ARE EITHER JOINED TOGETHER OR DISTINGUISHED; AND OF THE KIND OF SPEECH USED IN THE SACRAMENTS.

The treatise on the sacraments remains, which we heard is joined to the word of God and prayer. But in speaking of sacraments, delivered by Christ our king and high-priest, and received and lawfully used by his holy and catholic church, I will, by God's grace and assistance, observe this order: first, we treat them generally, and then particularly or severally.

SIGNS DEFINED. And here, beforehand, I will determine the certain signification of a sign or sacrament. If I am somewhat long or tedious in this, dearly beloved, I crave pardon; for I hope it will not be altogether fruitless.

Signum, a sign, the Latin writers call a token, a representing, a mark and show of something that has signification. So say Tully ² and Fabius. Fabius says: "Some call signum σημεῖον, (semeion) though some term it indicium; some others vestigium, a mark or token by which a thing is understood, such as slaughter by blood." ³ St. Aurelius Augustine, the famous ecclesiastical writer, cap. 4, De Magistro, says: "We generally call all those things signs, which signify something; where we also find words to be." ⁴ Again, Lib. ii. De Doctrina Christiana, cap. 1, he says: "A sign is a thing beside the semblance which it lays before our senses, making of itself something to come into our mind or thought; such as, by seeing smoke, we believe there is fire." ⁵

The said Aurelius Augustine divides signs into natural signs and given signs. "He calls those natural which, without any will or desire to signify, beside themselves, they make something else known, such as smoke signifying fire; for smoke does not have any will in itself to signify. Given signs are those which all living creatures give to one another, to declare as well as they can, the affections of their mind, or anything which they conceive, mean, or understand." And given signs he divides again by the senses. For some belong to the eyes; as the ensigns or banners of captains, the moving of the hands, and of all the members.

Some again belong to the ears; as the trumpet and other instruments of music, yea, and words themselves, which are chief and principal among men, when they intend to make their meaning known. To smelling he refers that sweet savour of ointment mentioned in the gospel, whereby it pleases the Lord to signify something. To the taste he refers the supper of the Lord; for, he says, "by taking the sacrament of his body and blood, he gave or made a sign of his will." He also adds an example of touching: "and when the woman by touching the hem of his vesture is made whole, that is not a sign of nothing, but signifies something." ⁶ St. Augustine has treated the kinds and differences of signs in this way.

⁶ August, ibid. cap. 3, fol. 5, col. 3.

Others also, whose opinion does not differ at all from his, distinguish signs according to the order of times. For they say about signs, that some are of things present, some of things past, and some of things to come. They think that signs of things present, represent current things: ivy-garland lets us understand that wine is sold wherever it is hung up. The signs that our master Christ worked, signified that the Messiah and the kingdom of God had come, promised by the prophets.

Signs past comprise all tombs, monuments of the dead, and those stones stacked by Joshua in the midst of the Jordan, signifying to those who came after, what was done in previous times. Gideon's fleece gave a sign of things to come; that is to say, it was a sign of the victory which he would have over his enemies.

But these signs, being well-considered and not neglected,¹ may more amply and plainly be divided into other signs: some are given by men, and some ordained by God himself. Signs or tokens are given by men, to show and signify something, to keep it in memory among men, or in a way, to seal up what they would have certain and sure. In this sense, every demonstrative description or picture is called a sign. In Ezekiel chapter 4, Jerusalem, portrayed in a tile,² is called a sign. ^{Eze 4.1} Also in ancient times, they treated the images of the dead as signs, because by those images they would renew afresh the memory of those [who had died], and keep them in remembrance, as if they were alive. Yes, and the holy scripture calls idols signs; as it appears in Isaiah chapter 45, ^{Isa 45.20} and the 2nd Paralip. 33.³ So stones being set up or laid down to mark out anything, such as landmarks, and all tombs and monuments, are signs. Rahab of Jericho said to the Israelites:⁴ "Give me a sign by oath, that you will show mercy to me; and they gave her a rope to hang out of her window." ^{Jos 2.12,21} Behold, the rope was a sign of their faith and truth, with which (as we would say) they sealed themselves surely and without any dissimulation, to take diligent heed that Rahab would not be destroyed. We Zwicers ⁵ term such signs that are given or received in confirmation of faith and truth, wortzeichen, because they are added to the words, and seal them, as it were; and also wahrzeichen, because we give witness by them, as it were, that in good faith and without any fraud or guile, we will perform in deed what we promised in word.

Now these kinds of signs are of diverse sorts. Some are mute or dumb, and pertain to the sense of the eyes. Of this sort are the standards used in war, such as crosses, banners, and flaming fires, which are mentioned in Numbers 2, Psalm 73, etc. Nor is any man able to reckon up all those of this sort. For new ones come in constantly and quickly, as it pleases men. Judas gave a sign to his company: "Whomever I kiss," he says, "that is the one: take him." ^{Mat 26.48} The joining of right hands which pertains to the sense of feeling, is a sign of faithfulness, help, and fellowship; indeed, it is the silent sign that Paul calls "the right hand of fellowship." ^{Gal 2.9} To this belong various movings and gestures. Some of them pertain to the voice. These are perceived by hearing, and uttered by man's voice, or by the sound of things which have no life. By man's voice are uttered words, whistling, and other things of this kind. To this may be added watch-words uttered by the voice, such as Shibboleth in the twelfth chapter of Judges. ^{Jdg 12.6} Voices without life are those made by trumpets, flutes, horns, guns, drums, by ringing bells and sounding instruments, which also extend very far and largely.

⁵ Germani, Lat.: Swiss.

Now signs are given by God to this end: to teach and admonish us about things to come, or about things past: either to lay before the eyes of their beholders, and represent in a certain likeness, the things of which they are signs; or else to seal, as it were, the promises and words of God with some visible ceremony celebrated by men by God's institution. To be short, they are given that they might exercise our faith, and gather together in one assembly or company, those who are scattered. And these are not all of one sort, but they greatly differ between themselves. For some have their beginning from natural causes, and yet they are nevertheless given as signs by God, to put us in mind of things, or to renew His promises,¹ and to teach men of things that have been done — such as the rainbow mentioned by Moses in Genesis 9.

For when the flood ceased, God made a new league with Noah, and ordained the rainbow for a sign of his covenant. He did not make it anew; but being made long before, and appearing by natural causes, he consecrated it by a new institution, with the intent that it might cause us to call the flood to remembrance, and renew the promise of God as it were — that is to say, that it would never come to pass again, that the earth would be drowned with water. Now, this sign does not have any ceremony ordained, by which it might be celebrated among men; nor does it gather us together into the society of any body or fellowship. But this sign is referred chiefly to God, saying: "I will set my rainbow in the clouds,² that when I see it, I may remember the everlasting covenant made between me and you." Not much different than this, are signs and wonders — signs, I say, given in the sun, moon, and stars, which forewarn men of destruction and calamities to come, unless they amend by repentance. But neither do these have any ceremony ordained to celebrate the remembrance of them, nor to gather us together, etc.

Again, there are other signs that are altogether miraculous; they are not natural, even though there are natural things in them. Of this sort is Gideon's fleece, and the shadow of the sun going backward on the dial of king Hezekiah. These signs, just as we read they were shown only once, so they are not commanded to be followed by any institution, or to be celebrated for some particular end. They were given to Hezekiah at that time, to signify and witness the victory which he would have against his enemies, and the recovery of his health. Altogether and merely marvellous, are those things which our Lord Jesus Christ, in the last chapter of Mark, called signs, gifts, means of healing, and speaking with tongues.³ These were given to and bestowed upon men, not by any power of man or virtue of healing in him, but by the power and virtue of Christ only. Those signs declared to men that it was the true and undoubted preaching of the gospel, by which Christ is declared to be Lord of all — Lord of life and death, and of Satan, and also of hell itself.

For now, when the dead rise, and diseases are driven out, through the name of Christ — by these very signs, it is proved that what is said is true: that Christ is Lord of all things. So the wonders which Moses and Aaron wrought in Egypt, Exodus 4, are called signs in the scripture; for they were witnesses both of God's lawful sending, and tokens of his mighty power to be executed against Egypt. But neither of these had any ceremony with them, nor did they gather anyone together into a society.

Now, we also read that some signs are paradigmatic. That is, they are indeed used by men, but it is not without God's commandment — so that these may also be said to be signs from God. They are altogether free from miracles; indeed, they are not only fetched from natural things, but also from things that are common and usual. Such were the bonds, pitcher, and chains of the holy prophet Jeremiah. ^{Jer 27.2f} Being willed by God to do so, Jeremiah laid these things before them in a certain evident form and figure; I mean, as a visible sign to be seen with men's eyes, which by his preaching, he had prophesied would befall them. We may see similar things in Ezekiel, the 17th and 24th chapters. In some things, these paradigmatic signs are like those exercises of rhetoric called chriae activae; rather, they are mixed chriae, so-termed because they consist partly in words and partly in deeds.¹ Aphthonius defines an active chria, "to be that which declares and plainly shows a thing by action, deed, or gesture: as when Pythagoras was asked how long man's life lasted; he stood still for a while, so that they might look at him; but shortly he shrunk away, and withdrew from their sight: this action signified that man's life is but short and momentary."²

But for the most part, chriae mixtae are set down in the scripture, consisting of word and deed — as when Christ took a child,³ and set him in the midst of his disciples, and spoke these words: "Truly I say to you, Unless you turn, and become as little children, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." ^{Mat 18.3} But these actions or signs do not have the institution and commandment of God, charging us to renew this very action by solemnly celebrating it. Nevertheless, sacramental signs have some affinity with these — namely, baptism and the Lord's Supper; for they are given to us from above, and are taken from natural things, without any miracle; indeed, they are instituted in the form of natural and sensible things, and in very common things, such as water, bread, and wine. They have this in common with other signs given by God, in that they renew things past, and foreshadow things to come, and represent things by a sign. They differ peculiarly from other signs, in that they have ceremonies joined with the commandment of God, which He has commanded his church to solemnize. And this is also peculiar to them: that being seals of God's promises, they couple us visibly to God and to all the saints; and they are dedicated to the most holy mysteries of God in Christ. I will treat these more largely and diligently later.

The sacramental signs of Christ and of Christ's church, namely, those which Christ our Lord has delivered to his church, and which his church has received from him and lawfully uses,⁴ are called "sacraments" by Latin writers. But the word is not found in the whole of scripture except as used by interpreters.⁵ Yet, the word "sign" is often used in the scriptures; what helps for our purpose, is most significantly set down in Genesis 17 and Romans 4. Meanwhile, we do not reject the Latin word sacramentum, a sacrament, by regarding it lightly; nor do we reject it by forging or devising a new one. I like the word sacrament well enough, as it is used lawfully.

St. Augustine, in his fifth epistle to Marcellinus, says: "It would take too long to dispute about the diversity of signs which, as they pertain to holy things, are termed sacraments."⁶ From this doubtless sprang this common definition or description: "a sacrament is a sign of a holy thing."⁷ Though it cannot be rejected, it is clear to see that the nature of the thing is not fully comprehended or expressed in it; nor is it separated from other things which are also holy signs.

⁷ Sacramentum est sacrae rei signum. — Lombard. Sentent. Lib. iv. dist. 1. b. fol. 304. Par. 1575.

There is another definition, therefore, that is suggested and used, which is indeed more perfect than the first: "a sacrament is a visible sign of an invisible grace." ¹ But because this also does not express the nature of the thing in all points, the following definition seems more allowable to many, stated this way: "Sacraments are ceremonies with which God exercises his people, first to stir up, increase, and maintain their faith; then to the end of testifying of his religion before men." ² This is a true and right definition. But what if you define a sacrament somewhat more fully and largely in this manner?

"Sacraments are holy actions, consisting of words or promises of the gospel, or of prescribed rites or ceremonies, given to the church by God from heaven, for this end: to be witnesses and seals of the preaching of the gospel, to exercise and try faith, and to represent and set before our eyes the deep mysteries of God, by earthly and visible things. In short, to gather together a visible church or congregation, and to admonish them of their duty."

This definition truly is far-reaching, large, and manifold; a definition, I say, gathered of many parts. But we mean to go at it simply and plainly, and to lay out the whole matter before your eyes to be seen; then will we make manifest every part of it, and confirm it with testimonies of scripture.

Now, that I may more fully treat the names that are given to this thing, I find that Latin writers call a sacrament an oath, or a religious bond. This is because it was not thoroughly done (I think), and to the proof, without certain ceremonies. M. Varro, in his second book De Lingua Latina, declaring what it means to contend with an oath, says:

"In some things, the plaintiff and the defendant each bet ³ five hundred pieces of silver at the place appointed for that purpose; and in other things, they gaged a set number of ounces; so that the one who recovered in judgment would receive back his gage; but the one who lost would forfeit it to the treasury." ⁴

Interposing holy things for the gage, ⁵ through partaking of the sacraments, we are bound to God and to all the saints, as if by obligation; and also God himself, by the testimony of the sacraments, has bound himself to us by an oath. It therefore appears that the name sacrament is very aptly and properly applied to our signs. We also read in Latin writers, about an oath that soldiers used to take; for it was not lawful for them to fight unless they were put to their oath and sworn. They took a solemn oath, having someone recite the form of the oath to them word by word (as Yegetius says in his book De Re Militari ⁶), that they would stoutly and readily do whatever their captain commanded them, and that they would never forsake the field in the defence of the commonweal of Rome.

They had a donation given to each of them as a pledge or earnest; they gave their name to be enrolled; and they were marked so that they might be known from other soldiers.⁷ Now, because we are received and enrolled as Christ's soldiers by our sacraments (especially by baptism); and by receiving the sacraments, we profess and testify that we are under the banner of Christ our captain;¹ the signs of Christ and his church are therefore not mistakenly called sacraments, nor without reason. Meanwhile, I will not stoutly contend that the word sacrament was, for that cause, chiefly attributed by those in ancient time to these, our signs.² For Erasmus Rot., a man very well gifted in the tongues, and thoroughly tried in old and ancient writers,³ none better, says in Cathe. sua Symb. v.:

"Those who speak most exquisitely call sacramentum an oath or bond, confirmed by the authority of God and the reverence of religion. But our elders used this word for what the Greeks call a mystery — which a man may call a religious secret, because the common people were excluded from meddling with them."⁴

Therefore, the old writers⁵ called those signs sacraments, instead of mysteries. For the same signs are called mysteries by the Greeks, which the Latin writers for the most part interpret as holy and religious secrets — holy secrets, I say, which the profane common people were excluded and debarred from celebrating. For Caelius in Lectio. Antiqui. supposes that they were called mysteries, οτι δει μυσαντας τηρειν ενδον, because it behoved those who hid them, or administered them, to keep them close, and not show them to any common person.⁶

Thus mysteries may well be called separated and holy secrets, known only to those who were ordained for that purpose,⁷ and to be celebrated only by saints or holy men. Yet it may seem that the Greek musterion is derived from mustes and muoo, just as apoduterion is derived from apo and duoo — so that the etymon⁸ of it may have no more force with the Greeks than testamentum has among the Latins, which is a witness-bearing of the mind (although I am not ignorant what some also reason in this case). Sacraments, therefore, are called mysteries, because in a dark speech⁹ they hide other things which are more holy. And Paul willingly uses this word in his epistles. There is a plain reason why this word was attributed to the holy signs of the Christian church: for these things are known only to the faithful, and are hidden from those who are profane and unholy. And surely the preaching of the gospel itself is called, "The mystery of the kingdom of God;"^{Mar 4.11} this is to teach us that the unclean being shut out, it is revealed only to the children of God. For our chief interpreter of mysteries says: "Do not cast your pearls before swine, nor give that which is holy to dogs."^{Mat 7.6} And Paul: "If our gospel lies hidden as yet," he says, "it is hidden in those who are lost, in whom the god of this world has blinded the minds of those who do not believe,"^{2Cor 4.}

Furthermore, many of the Greek doctors of the church have called our sacraments symbola; this word is also received and often used by the Latins. It is derived from symballoo, that is to say, confero, to confer or compare together; for by comparing one thing with another, symbols are made apparent and rightly perceived. Symbolum therefore signifies a sign which has relation to some other thing, as we said about the standard, etc.

And truly, among the Grecians in olden times, the use of symbols or signs was diverse; for in their sacrifices ¹ they had their symbols, signs (I say) allegorically meaning something — as in the sacrifices of Bacchus, a sieve was their symbol or sign, and they carried it about when they were well tippled;² thereby it signified that those who are drunk are blabs, and can keep nothing secret. What if I can prove by an allegory or dark speech, that the opinions of men, containing something of deep understanding, are called symbols? For Pythagoras' symbols are known well enough. So mystical divinity began to be called symbolic, because it was wrapped in more hidden and secret mysteries. So that which is darkly uttered and in the manner of a riddle, is mystical; ³ it has in it a far more contrary meaning than it seems to offer by words. Again, the gift and token of faith and truth, which by mutual consent passes between the bride and the bridegroom, whereby it is not lawful for them to shrink or go back from their word, promise, or covenant, is called a symbol. Furthermore, soldiers serving under one and the same banner, were given symbols or badges. In the same way, certain confederated cities that were joined together in a league of friendship, to the end that they might go safely to the bordering cities, and to those which took part with them, were given symbols or mutual signs — that is to say, tokens. These being shown and seen, gave each other gentle and courteous entertainment ⁴ by their league-fellows, companions, and singular friends.

The ancient writers therefore applied this word symbol to our sacraments, because they represent and show us the exceedingly great and deep mysteries of God. They are allegorical and enigmatic, hard and dark to understand. And lastly, by the institution of his sacraments, the Lord himself has bound himself to us; and by partaking them, we in turn bind ourselves to him and to all the saints, testifying and openly professing to fight stoutly and valiantly under the Lord's banner.

Moreover, these holy symbols and signs admonish and put us in mind of brotherly love and concord, so that we remember to love most entirely and with all our heart, as God's children and our brethren, those who are communicants or partakers with us at the same table, and are washed clean by the same baptism.

This much concerning sacraments: what they are, by what names they are called, and why they are so called. Let what we have briefly noted be sufficient.

SACRAMENTS. Setting aside all other things, it seems necessary, first of all, to declare and show who was the author of the sacraments, and for what causes they were instituted. All men in a manner confess that God alone is the author of sacraments, and not men — nor yet the church itself. For there is one among the schoolmen, who teaches the church this lesson: namely, that she should remember she is no lady or mistress over the sacrament, but a servant or minister; and that she has no more power or authority to institute any form of a sacrament than she has to abrogate any law of God.⁵ Aquinas also, part. iii. quaest. 46. articulo 2. says: "He institutes, or he is the author of a thing, who gives it force and virtue: but the virtue and power of the sacraments comes from God alone; therefore God alone has the power to institute or make sacraments."⁶ And indeed, God alone has the power to institute true service and worship: but sacraments belong to his service and worship; therefore God alone institutes sacraments. If anyone in the old Testament had offered a sacrifice which God had not commanded, or did not offer it in the manner that God willed it to be offered, it was not only not available to him, but also his offence in doing so was rewarded with most terrible and fearful punishment. Who does not know that the sons of Aaron, for offering strange fire, were horribly burnt and scorched with fire which fell down from heaven?

Such sacrifices therefore displease God, as profane or unholy; nor do those sacraments deserve to be called lawful, which do not have God himself for their author. To this is added that sacraments are testimonies, and seals as it were, of God's good-will and favour toward us. Who, I pray you, can better, more uprightly, or more assuredly bear witness of God's good-will toward us, than God himself? In no way does that deserve to be called or considered the seal of God, to which he neither set his hand, nor imprinted with his own mark. ¹ Indeed, it is a counterfeit seal, because it does not come from God; yet, in the meantime, it bears an outward show of the name of God. In behalf of this is that saying of St. Augustine, which is in every man's mouth: "The word is added to the element, and there is made a sacrament." ² By this we gather that in the institution of sacraments, the word of God obtains the principal place, and has the most ado; the word, I say, of God, not the word of men, nor yet of the church. From this it follows that the sign ought to have its proceeding from God himself, and not from any manner of men, however many, however cleric-like or learned, however harmless and holy of life. So that, now, there can be no other author of sacraments than God himself alone.

As we receive the word of salvation and grace, so it is also needful that we receive the signs of grace. Although the word of God is preached to us by men, yet we do not receive it as the word of man, but as the word of God, according to the saying of the apostle: "When you had received the word of God which you heard from us,³ you did not receive it as the word of men, but (as it is indeed) the word of God." ^{1The 2.3} It behoves us to have respect for its first author who said when he sent his disciples abroad: "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures, ^{Mar 16.15} teaching them to observe whatever I have commanded you; and baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." ^{Mat 28.20}

"He that hears you hears me; and he that despises you despises me." ^{Luk 10.16} And therefore, though the sacraments are ministered by the hands of men, they are not received by the godly and religious as though proceeding from men, but from the hand of God himself, the first and principal author of them. To this belongs the question which Christ our Lord asked in the gospel: "The baptism of John, was it from heaven or of men?" ^{Mat 21.25} Truly John, who baptized, was a man; but in baptizing, he baptized according to God's institution and ordinance. And therefore, the baptism of John was from heaven, though the water with which he baptized flowed out of the bottomless depth into the river Jordan, and John himself was resident on the earth. To this also notably agrees what Paul expressly says: "That which I delivered to you I received from the Lord." ^{1Cor 15.3} Therefore, although St. Paul was a man, yes, and a sinner too, yet what he delivered to the church, he did not deliver as from himself, or as any invention of man, but as Christ has delivered it; so that it is not his, nor man's, but ⁴ Christ's tradition, a divine and heavenly tradition. Besides this, our high priest and everlasting bishop works even today in his church, the one whose ministry they execute, that is, at whose commandment they baptize; and according to whose institution, those who are the stewards or dispensers of the mysteries of God, minister the holy sacraments of the Lord's Supper.¹ The institution of the sacraments,² therefore, must be acknowledged³ by us to be the very work of God. This far touching the author of sacraments.

Peter Lombard, in his Sentences, reckons up three causes why sacraments were instituted; that is to say, why spiritual and heavenly things were delivered and committed⁴ to us under visible signs, forms, and ceremonies. The first of these is so cold and weak, that I am loath to recall it to memory.

He places merit in this: that by God's government and direction, man seeks salvation in things that are baser and inferior to himself. He adds this afterward: although he seeks salvation not in them, but in God through them. This also he has uttered unadvisedly enough, and has not sufficiently considered. The other two causes, namely, that sacraments were invented and ordained under visible signs for our instruction and exercise, do not seem altogether absurd or disagreeable to reason.⁵

The truest and most proper reason why sacraments are instituted under visible signs, seems to be partly God's goodness, and partly man's weakness. For we hardly reach for the knowledge of heavenly things, if they are laid before our eyes without visible form,⁶ and as they are in their own nature, pure and excellent. But they are better and more easily understood if they are represented to us under the figure of earthly things — that is to say, under signs that are familiar to us. Therefore, our bountiful and gracious Lord covertly and darkly — no, rather evidently and notably — set the kingdom of God before us, to view it in parables or dark statements.⁷ Even so, by signs it pleased him to lay before our eyes, in a way, the very same thing, and to point it out to us, as if painted in a table; to renew it afresh, and to maintain the remembrance of it among us, by a lively representation. John Chrysostom admits this cause as a chief and proper cause. In his eighty-third homily on Matthew, he says:

"The Lord has delivered to us nothing that is insensible. The things indeed are sensible, yet they have altogether a spiritual understanding or meaning. So baptism is ministered under a sensible element, namely water; but what is wrought by it, that is to say, regeneration and the new birth, spiritually enters into the mind.

For if you were a bodiless creature, he would have delivered to you all these gifts bare, naked, and bodiless, according to your nature. But since you have a reasonable soul coupled and joined to your body, he has therefore delivered to you in sensible signs and substances, those things which are perceived with a spiritual understanding."⁸

I do not allege this as if I would take the testimony of man for my stay; but I do it because I see St. John Chrysostom's speech according to the manner observed and used in the scripture. For who does not know that the scripture is full of parables, similitudes, allegories, and figurative phrases, which the Holy Ghost uses, not for his own sake, but for ours? In the gospel, the talk which Christ had with Nicodemus touching heavenly regeneration is very well known. By using the hidden and covert terms of air, wind, and water, etc., he reasons, saying: "If I have told you of earthly things, and you do not believe, how will you believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?" ^{Joh 3.12} What he calls "earthly things," is his doctrine of heavenly regeneration or new birth, figured to us under the earthly signs of water and the spirit, or of air and the wind; and what he means by "heavenly things" is that self-same doctrine of heavenly regeneration, nakedly delivered to Nicodemus without any imagination, without similitude or sensible signs. Thus the Lord signifies that men more easily conceive and understand the doctrine of heavenly things, when it is shadowed under some dark and covert sign of earthly things,¹ than when it is nakedly and spiritually delivered — that by comparing things not too unlike, it may appear that the sacraments were for no other cause revealed or instituted,² than for the sake of demonstration: that heavenly things might become more familiar and plain to us.

In this, we have to mark the analogy, which is a certain aptness, proportion, or (as Cicero terms it) a convenience;³ or a fit agreement of things known by their signs. If they are slightly⁴ passed over without this analogy, the reason for a sacrament cannot be fully and perfectly understood. But this analogy, if diligently discussed and observed to the full, offers to the beholder, without any labour at all, the very αναγωγη, (anagooge) that is to say, the hidden and secret meaning of a sacrament. When we come to treat these things, we will do what we can to make them manifest by examples.

Whoever therefore thoroughly weighs the institution⁵ of sacraments, cannot help but extol with praises the exceeding great goodness of the Lord, who not only opens to us miserable men the mysteries of his kingdom, but he takes singular care for man's infirmity. Framing himself to our capacity, in a way he stutters and stammers with us. Regarding our dullness and the weakness of our wit, he clothes and covers heavenly mysteries with earthly symbols or signs. Thereby he most plainly and pithily opens them to us, laying them before our eyes, to be evidently beheld.

In this same institution of the sacraments, we have reason to extol and praise the wisdom of God, if we take it in hand⁶ to compare great and small things together. For this custom is received as a law throughout the whole world: that all the wisest men, when they had occasion to speak of high mysteries of wisdom, they did not do it by words alone; rather, by signs and words together, they commended them to their hearers. This was to the end that the two most noble senses in man, namely, hearing and seeing, might both at once be vehemently moved, and forcibly provoked, to consider the matter. The volumes of heathenish philosophers are full of examples. What do you say to the Jews, God's old and ancient people? Did not God himself show very many such examples among them?

Again, in making leagues or confirming promises in earnest and weighty matters, men use signs or tokens of truth, in order to win credit for their words and promises. Even so, acting in the manner of men,⁷ the Lord has added signs of his faithfulness and truth in his everlasting covenant and promises of life; the sacraments, I mean, with which he seals his promises and the very doctrine of his gospel. Nor is this rare or strange to him. Men swear even by the Lord himself, when they would make others certainly believe, and in no case to mistrust the truth of their promises. Therefore, it is read in the holy scriptures, that the Lord himself took an oath and swore by himself, ^{Jer 22.5} when he meant "most abundantly to show to the heirs of the promises," as the apostle says, "the stableness of his counsel." ^{Heb 6.17} Moreover, it was the accustomed manner among those of old, as they were making their league or covenant, to take a beast, and to divide him in pieces, and each of them to pass through and between the pieces so divided. They testified by that ceremony, that they would yield themselves to be so divided and cut in pieces, if they did not steadfastly hold to what they promised in their league or covenant. In the same manner, making or renewing a league with Abraham (which Moses describes at large in the 15th chapter of Genesis), the Lord commands Abraham to take a heifer, a she-goat, and a ram, each three years old, and to cut them in half, and to lay each piece opposite the other. When Abraham had done this, the Lord himself, in the likeness of a smoking furnace or firebrand, went between the pieces, so that thereby Abraham might know that the land of Canaan would certainly be given to him and to his seed to possess; and that all the things which He had promised in that league, would be brought to pass. Therefore, since the good and true Lord is always like himself, he now frames himself toward His church in the same manner as we said he did then. I ask you, what wonder or strange thing is it then, that he should leave to us also today, under visible things, signs and seals of his grace, and of the mysteries of the kingdom of God?

Up to here we have treated the chief causes of sacraments, for which they were instituted.

KIND AND NUMBER OF SACRAMENTS. Touching the kind and number of sacraments, which is next, there are diverse opinions among the writers, especially of later times. For among the old and ancients, this question drew quickly to an end, as an undoubted and well-known perfect principle. But whoever diligently searches the scriptures, will find that those of the old Testament had sacraments of one kind, and those of the new Testament had sacraments of another kind. The sacraments of the people under the old Testament were circumcision and the paschal lamb, to which were added sacrifices. I abundantly spoke about this in the third decade, sixth sermon.¹ In like manner, by the writings of the apostles, the sacraments of the people under the new Testament (that is to say, of Christians) are two in number: "baptism" and "the supper of the Lord." But Peter Lombard reckons seven: baptism, penance, the supper of the Lord, confirmation, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony.² The whole rabble of interpreters and rout of schoolmen follow him.

But all the ancient doctors of the church, for the most part, reckon two principal sacraments. Among those doctors, Tertullian, in his first and fourth book Contra Marcionem, and in his book De Corona Militis, very plainly mentions only two — that is to say, baptism, and the Eucharist or supper of the Lord.³ And Augustine also says, Lib. iii. De Doctr. Christiana, cap. ix.: "The Lord has not overburdened us with signs; but the Lord himself, and the doctrine of the apostles, have left us a few certain things instead of many. And those are to be most easily done, most reverently understood, and most purely observed: such are baptism and the celebration of the body and blood of the Lord." ⁴

And again he says to Januarius, Epist. cxviii.: "He has knit and tied together the fellowship of a new people, with very few sacraments in number; they are easily observed, and very excellent in signification: these are baptism, consecrated in the name of the Trinity; and partaking of Christ's body and blood; and whatever other thing is commended to us in the canonical scriptures — except those things with which the servitude of the old people was burdened according to their hearts and the time of the prophets.¹ These are found in the five books of Moses." ² By the way, mark that he does not say, "And whatever other things are commended to us in the canonical scriptures;" but, "whatever other thing," etc. This plainly proves that he is not speaking of sacraments, but of certain observations both used and received by the church — as the subsequent words of Augustine declare. Yet I confess without dissimulation, that the same Augustine elsewhere mentions the sacrament of orders. ³ Nevertheless, this seems to me to be also considered: that the self-same author applies the name sacraments to anointing, and to prophecy, and to prayer, and to certain other things of this sort,⁴ as well as to orders. And now and then, he reckons among them, the sacraments of the scripture.⁵

Thus we may easily see that, in his works, the word "sacrament" is now used one way, and sometimes another. He calls all these sacraments because, being holy, they came from the Holy Ghost; and also because they are holy institutions of God, observed by all who are holy. And yet these differ from those other two sacraments, which are holy actions consisting of words and ceremonies, and which gather together its partakers, into one fellowship. But Rabanus Maurus also, bishop of Mentz,⁶ a diligent reader of Augustine's works, Lib. De Instit. Cleric, cap. xxiv. says:

"Baptism and unction, and the body and blood, are sacraments; they are called sacraments for this reason: because, under a cover of corporal things, the power of God works our salvation more secretly, as signified by these sacraments. Hence, they are also called sacraments for their secret and holy virtues." ⁷

This Rabanus Maurus was famous about the year of the Lord eight hundred and thirty; so that even by this we may gather that the ancient apostolic church had no more than two sacraments. I make no mention here of Ambrose, even though in his books about sacraments, he does not number as many as the company of schoolmen do. This is because some of those works published in his name, are not accepted by all learned men as Ambrose's.⁸ So too, I little force the authority of the works of Dionysius, which I need not declare what price and estimation they have among learned and good men.⁹ But however the case stands, the holy scripture, which is the only infallible rule of life and of all things that are to be done in the church, commends only baptism and the Lord's Supper to us, as the solemn institutions and sacraments of Christ.

Those two are therefore sufficient for us; so that we need not be moved, whatever the subtle invention of man's busy brain may at times bring against or beside these two. Why? Because God never gave power to anyone to institute sacraments.

Meanwhile, we do not condemn the wholesome rites and healthful institutions of God, nor yet the religious observations of the church of Christ. We have declared elsewhere, what we think and teach touching penance and ecclesiastical order.¹ Of the remainder, which latter writers authorise as ² sacraments, we will speak in their convenient place. Also elsewhere, so far as we thought requisite, we have treated the likeness and difference between sacraments of the people of the old and new Testaments.³

Now, let us see what things sacraments consist in. By the testimony of the scripture and by all the godly men, they consist in two things: namely,

- in the sign and the thing signified;
- in the word and the rite;
- in the promise of the gospel and in the ceremony;
- in the outward thing and the inward;
- in the earthly thing, I say, and the heavenly;

and as Irenaeus witnesses in his book, the martyr of Christ,⁴

- in the visible thing and the invisible;
- in the sensible thing and the intelligible.

To this belongs what St. John Chrysostom says upon Matthew: "Christ delivers nothing to us that is sensible except under visible things; the outward things are sensible, yet they are all spiritual."⁵ But he calls those things aistheta, sensible, which are perceived by the outward senses, such as seeing, hearing, tasting, and touching; but those things he calls noeta, intelligible or mental, which are perceived by the mind, the understanding, consideration, and the discourse or reasoning of the mind — not of the flesh, but of faith.

By the testimony of the scriptures, this thing shall be made manifest.⁶ The Lord says to his disciples in the gospel: "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures; and he who believes and is baptized shall be saved." ^{Mar 16.15-16} You shall baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." ^{Mat 28.19} The same gospel says of John the Baptist: "John baptized in the wilderness, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." ^{Mar 1.4} So also St. Luke witnesses that St Peter said to the Israelites: "Repent, and be baptized everyone of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." ^{Act 2.38} In baptism, therefore, water or sprinkling water in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, and all that which is done by the church, is a sign — a rite, ceremony, and outward thing; it is earthly and sensible, lying open and made plain to the senses. But remission of sins, partaking of (everlasting) life, fellowship with Christ and his members, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost which are given to us by the grace of God through faith in Christ Jesus, is the thing signified — the inward and heavenly thing, and that intelligible thing which is not perceived except by a faithful mind.

In the same manner, the scripture says, bearing witness also of the supper of the Lord, which is the other sacrament of the church: "The Lord Jesus when he had taken bread, gave thanks, and broke it, and gave it to his disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body which is given for you.

Likewise he took the cup, and gave it to them, saying, Drink you all of this; for this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins. Do this in remembrance of me." ¹ Now, therefore, all that action which is done by the church ² following the example of Christ our high-priest (I mean, the breaking and distributing of bread, and yes, the banquet or receiving of bread and wine), is the sign, rite, ceremony, and the outward or earthly thing — that sensible thing which lies open before the senses. But the intelligible thing and thing signified, the inward and heavenly thing, is the very body of Christ given for us, and his blood shed for the remission of sins, and our redemption and fellowship which we have with Christ and all the saints which, indeed, he chiefly has with us.

By these things it will be easy to determine with certainty about the names or terms now given to the sacraments. For they are called external or outward signs, because they are corporal or bodily, entering outwardly into those senses by which they are perceived. Contrariwise, we call the things that are signified, inward things — not because the things included in the signs lie hidden, but because they are perceived by the inward faculties, or the motions of the mind, wrought ³ in men by the Spirit of God. So also, those signs are termed both earthly and visible, because they consist of things taken from the earth: namely, water, bread, and wine; and because they are manifestly seen in these likenesses. To be short, the things signified are called heavenly and invisible, because their fruit is heavenly, and because they are discerned with the eyes of the mind or of faith, not the eyes of the body. For otherwise, the same body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ which in the supper are represented to the faithful in the form of bread and wine, are not heavenly or invisible of their own proper nature; for the body of our Lord, touching his substance and nature, is consubstantial, or of the same substance as our bodies. Now, it is called heavenly for its deliverance from corruption and infirmity, or else because it is glorified, and not because his own nature is brought to nothing, or laid aside.⁴ The same body of his, of its own nature, is visible, not invisible, and resident in heaven; yet it is seen by the godly celebrating the supper, not with the eyes of the body, but with the eyes of the mind or soul. Therefore, in respect to us it is called invisible, which of itself is not invisible.

Now, in the sacraments the word is called, and it is indeed, a witnessing of God's will, and a remembrance and renewing of the benefits and promises of God; yes, and it is the institution and commandment of God, which shows the author of the sacrament, along with the manner and end of it. For the word in baptism is the very same word that we just now recited: "Go into the whole world," etc.

In the supper of the Lord, the word of God is, "Jesus took bread," etc. And the rite, custom, and manner of how to celebrate the supper,⁵ is to be sought from the example of the Lord going before it in holy action. This action comprehends both prayers, and those things which are recited from the word of Christ. For just as he broke bread and divided it, and [distributed] the cup in like manner, so we likewise follow in this holy action, with holy imitation and sacramental rite. As he gave thanks, so we also give thanks. By certain prayers in baptism, we request the assistance and grace of the Lord; we recite certain verses out of the gospel which we know are requisite in the administration of baptism; and we usually do the same in the celebration of the Lord's Supper also. But it is not my intention at present to speak largely and exactly about the rites of the sacraments. Notwithstanding, we hold those to be best, which are taken out of the holy scripture, and do not exceed its bounds. These will be spoken of in their place.

Some, instead of "the word" use "promise;" and instead of "rite," use "ceremony." But truly, I see no danger at all in the word "ceremony" if it is understood to be the outward worship and rite which the Lord himself commended to us by his example, and left to be used in the celebration. And indeed, sacramental signs are not simple or bare signs, but ceremonies or religious actions. So too, there seems to be no danger in the word "promise" if by promise we understand the preaching of the gospel, and the commemoration or remembrance of God's promises, which we often use in the preaching of the gospel and in the celebration of the sacraments. That is to say, God receives us into his fellowship for Christ's sake through faith, washes away our sins, and endues us with various graces; Christ was given for our sins; he shed his blood to take away the sins of all the faithful. For in celebrating baptism, we use these words of the Lord: "Suffer the little children to come to me; for to such belongs the kingdom of heaven," etc. Mar 10.14

In the celebration of the banquet of God's holy children, we use these holy words of our Lord: "And after supper Jesus took bread, and after he had given thanks he broke it, and gave it to them, saying, Take, eat: this is my body which is given for you. This is my blood, which is shed for you for the remission of sins: do this in the remembrance of me," etc. ¹ For those remembrances and recitations are the promises of the gospel, promising forgiveness of sins to believers, showing that the Lord's body is given for them, and his blood shed for them; this faith, truly, is the only and undoubted means to obtain life and salvation. Christ is the strength and substance of the sacraments, by whom alone they are effectual, and without whom they are of no power, virtue, or effect.

But if anyone understands "promise" to mean "covenant," by which the Lord singularly binds, or you might say, ties himself to the signs in which or with which he would be present bodily, essentially, and really — in this, he says more than he can show or prove by the scriptures. For in no place has Christ promised to be present corporally— that is, with his true body, in the signs, or with the signs. Otherwise, I am not ignorant of how God sometimes appeared to our fathers in a bodily figure, that is, in some visible form or shape. For example, when he showed himself to Jacob, who was named Israel, leaning on a ladder, and to Moses in the hole of a rock, as if in a mirror. But these do not properly pertain to this purpose where we treat the corporal presence of Christ, and the sacramental signs. But because many twist these words of the Lord, "This is my body, this is my blood," to prove a corporal presence of the Lord's body in the supper, I answer, that those words of the Lord are not to be roughly expounded according to the letter, as though bread and wine were the body and blood of Christ substantially and corporally; but only mystically and sacramentally. So that the body and blood of Christ abide in their substance and nature, and in their place — I mean, in some certain place of heaven. But the bread and wine are a sign or sacrament, a witness or a sealing, and a lively memory of his body given and his blood shed for us. But we will treat this more at large in a convenient place.

By these things which we have spoken of, it sufficiently appears how sacraments consist of two things: the sign and the thing signified; of the word of God, and the rite or holy ceremony.

There are some, notwithstanding, who think there is such a force grafted by God into the words, that if they are pronounced over the signs, they sanctify, change, and in a way, bring with them, or make present, the things signified; they plant or include them within the signs, or at least they join them with the signs. For these kinds of statements are heard about it: that the water of baptism regenerates by the virtue of the words; and that, by the efficacy of the words, the bread and the wine in the supper, are made the natural flesh and blood of the Lord. But the sacraments of Christ and his church consist of the word and the sign. It seems that we must diligently search out what must be understood by "the word."

I said just now, that "the word" in the sacraments was a witness-bearing of God's will, and the commandment of God, or the institution of God, which declares to us the author, manner, and end of a sacrament. By this word, I say, and commandment of God, by this will and institution of God, the sacraments are sanctified. It is not that the words are so pronounced by the ministers, that they are to be read before as if recited by the Lord himself, or delivered by his apostles; but it is because God would have it so, did so, and commanded his apostles to do so. For whatever God does, or commands us to do, is sanctified by the very commandment or deed of God. For all things which he has done are exceedingly good; therefore, these things which he commands us to do, cannot help but be holy, because he is holy and the only sanctifier. Thus, the sacraments are sanctified by the nature, will, deed, and commandment of God, and not by the pronouncement of any words.

To this, the faithful obedience of men is necessarily required, so that it may be applied to man and do him good. This should altogether make us put our trust and confidence in the mercy and power of God; in no way should we despise or cast behind us the institution of God, even though it seems base and contemptible in outward appearance. This will appear more plainly in the example of Naaman, the captain of the king of Syria his band. ^{2Kng 5.1-14} He heard from the prophet, undoubtedly at the Lord's commandment, that he should wash himself seven times in Jordan: for so it would come to pass that he would be cleansed from his leprosy. Here you hear the word, the will and commandment of God, I say. But you do not hear that any words were repeated either over the Jordan, or over Naaman; nor that any words were prescribed by the prophet that Naaman should repeat, by which there is any force of purifying or cleansing given to the water. Naaman, by faith, obeys the commandment of God, and he is cleansed from his leprosy — not by his own merit, nor by the benefit of the water of the Jordan, but by the power of God and his own faithful obedience. Lepers also in the gospel, and not a few of them, are cleansed by the power and will of Christ, through faith, and not by the pronouncing or speaking of words. The Lord indeed said, "I will, be clean." ^{Mat 8.3} But if anyone today were to recite the same words a hundred times over any leper, it would avail nothing. By this, it is manifest that no force is given to words, to work health by pronouncing them.

The apostles indeed said to the sick, feeble, and lame, "In the name of the Lord Jesus, arise and walk;" and they rose up and were healed;¹ yet they were not healed by the benefit of the words, but by the name — by the power, I mean — and virtue of Christ. For Peter, who said to the lame man in Jerusalem, "In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, arise and walk," ^{Act 3.6} said in the midst of the council of Jerusalem: "If this day we are examined about the deed done to the sick man, by what means he is made whole, let it be known to you all, in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth this man stands here whole." ^{Act 4.9-10}

And to the people he said, "And his name, through faith in his name, has made this man sound, whom you see and know; and the faith which is by him, has given to this man health." ^{Act 3.16} Beside these verses, we read in the Acts of the Apostles, that the sons of one Sceva, a priest, being exorcists or conjurers, called on the name of the Lord Jesus over those who had evil spirits; but these spirits were so far from giving way to their exorcisms and conjurings, that they ran at and overcame them, so that they scrambled ¹ to escape alive. ^{Act 19.14-16} It is most apparent there, that those exorcists used almost the same form in their enchantments, which the apostle used; for they tried to cast out the foul spirit in the name of the Lord Jesus; but they were not able so to do. Who cannot see and perceive, that the words pronounced do not prevail at all? Nor is it any obstacle or hindrance at all, that those exorcists were without faith; for this is something that is very well known and received by all men, that sacraments are no less effectual when they are ministered by wicked ministers, than when they are ministered by the best ministers.

But here, this saying of the apostle is objected against us: "Christ gave himself for the church to sanctify it, cleansing it in the fountain of water by the word," or in the word. ^{Eph 5.25-26} Behold, they say, men are cleansed by the water of baptism, which by the word has the force of sanctifying put into it. Therefore, it must be that words have force to sanctify. But I will confute them by an evident demonstration, that the apostle did not mean what they suppose.

The apostle prescribes to married Christians their duty. To the plainer and pithier setting forth of which, he uses the example of Christ and his church, commending the exceeding love which Christ bears toward his church. Being inflamed with this love, he gave himself for the church to this end: to make it a pure ² and glorious spouse for himself.

Here, by the way, he sets down the manner of purging; for he says the Lord Jesus himself has cleansed it. For it is Christ's office alone to purge and to cleanse. Now the manner of purging follows: "In the fountain of water by the word:" Because it is briefly spoken, it has some obscurity in it. He mentions two things which the Lord uses to cleanse those who are his, "the fountain of water," and "the word." "The fountain of water" is baptism, which is the outward action and witness-bearing of the inward purifying or cleansing, wrought by the grace and Spirit of God. As the apostle says, "According to his mercy he saved us by the fountain of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed upon us richly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour." ^{Tit 3.5} For he adds, by way of interpretation, "and renewing of the Holy Ghost," of which the fountain of water is a sign. Moreover, "the word" is the very preaching of the gospel, testifying that, by the grace and mercy of (God) the Father, his only Son was given to us; and being given for our sins, he makes those who believe in him, heirs of eternal life. So that now, these words of Paul to the Ephesians, fifth chapter, very well agree with this commandment of the Lord mentioned in St. Mark: "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures: he which shall believe and be baptized, shall be saved," etc. ^{Mar 16.15} For by these words, the Lord also shadows for us the manner and means of our salvation: that it is he alone who purges us by faith. Yet, meanwhile, he wills believers to be signed with baptism; and that it should be preached openly in the world, that it is he who pardons sins; yes, and who freely gives everlasting life. But how do all these things, I ask you, fit their purpose, who would prove by those words of Paul, that there is force and virtue in the words themselves to sanctify baptism? These words of the Lord spoken to his apostles, make our point even more manifest: "Now are you clean," he says, "through the word which I have spoken to you." ^{Joh 15.3} Shall we say here, that through the words which Christ recited, the disciples of Christ were made clean? Why then did he need to be crucified the next day, and to have died?

What, was it to the end that he might purchase that power for the words? In that case, all the glory would be given to the words. Do not faith and godliness tell us that "by the word of the Lord" means, that which is declared by the preaching of the Lord — that is, by the death and redemption of Christ, whereby those who believe it are cleansed? For in another place he says, "purifying their hearts by faith." Therefore they err, because they do not rightly judge about the word or speech. For the Lord speaks of the word preached and believed; and they understand it to mean the word pronounced, as though being pronounced, it had force from the Lord to sanctify. St. Augustine also supports us; in his 80th treatise upon John, he says:

"From where does such great virtue and power come to the water, that it should touch the body and wash the heart, unless it is through the working of the word — not because it is spoken or pronounced, but because it is believed? For in the word itself, the sound passing away is one thing, and the virtue which remains is another thing. 'This is the word of faith which we preach,' says the apostle; 'because if you confess with your mouth that Jesus is the Lord, and believe with your heart that God has raised him from the dead, you shall be saved. For with the heart man believes unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.' ^{Rom 10.9-10} Thus we read in the Acts of the Apostles, 'purifying (or cleansing) their hearts by faith.' ^{Act 15.9} And St. Peter says in his epistle, ^{1Pet 3.21} 'So also baptism saves us; not putting away the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience makes its request to God.' ¹ This is the word of faith which we preach, and undoubtedly by which baptism is also consecrated, that it may have power to cleanse. For Christ with us the vine, with his Father the husbandman, has loved his church, and given himself for it. Read the apostle, and mark what he adds, saying: 'that he might sanctify it, cleansing it by the fountain of water in the word.' It would be in vain, therefore, that cleansing should be attributed to a frail and fading element, unless this were added: 'in the word.'" ²

And so forth; for I have recited St. Augustine's words, not that I stay myself upon man's testimony, or that I would have any man urge it, or that I am content to be ruled by the witness of man; but because in these words he has gathered together some testimonies out of the scripture, bearing witness from the word. By this we may understand, that it is the word of faith preached, and not the word spoken or pronounced, which ought to be received. This word, I say, truly cleanses; that is to say, the grace of Christ alone purifies, to which both the word and faith are directed. And it is for that cause that he expressly said, "Not because it is spoken, but because it is believed." Shortly after, he says: "The word of faith which we preach." Furthermore he says: "By the word of faith, baptism is consecrated, that it might have power to cleanse." What else is this, than if he had said, the very substance of faith makes baptism effectual? For this follows: "It would be in vain, that cleansing should be attributed to the fading and corruptible element, unless this were added, 'in the word.'"

Now if a man considers the mysteries of the saints or holy men in olden times, he will not find in the celebration of circumcision, the feast of the Passover, or the sacrifices, any words were spoken by which these sacraments were formed and created as it were, and made effectual. To which this belongs: John the Baptist not only baptized the common people without respect to person, but he also baptized the Lord Jesus himself in the water of Jordan.

No words were pronounced in the meantime, by which he called and drew down the heavenly grace over or upon the water of baptism. Again, when Christ our high bishop instituted his supper in the gospel, he commanded nothing to be spoken or pronounced, by virtue of which the elements might either be changed, or the things signified (being drawn down from heaven) should be present with or joined to the signs. Rather, the evangelists have declared what the Lord has simply done, and that we should do what his will was, according to the manner and end he instituted his supper. We read in no place that the Lord said, As often as you speak or pronounce these my words, "This is my body, This is my blood," it shall come to pass by virtue of my words, that the substance of the sign will be made void; and at the same point of time in which the words are spoken, it will begin to be the true body and the true blood of the Lord, in the forms or likenesses of bread and wine; or that the forms or likenesses and the truth of the sign remaining, it will begin at once, with the bread and wine, to be the very body and blood of Christ. Therefore, in pronouncing or speaking the words of the Lord in the supper, there is no power or virtue either to call down the things signified, or to change the things present.¹ These imaginations rather seem to maintain superstition more than religion — as though the words, pronounced according to the form conceived, had the power to call down out of heaven, to bring from one place to another, to restore health, to draw to, to put from, or to transform or change anything. St. Augustine reckons among superstitious vanities, those things which are tied or fastened about the body as remedies against diseases, which medicine also takes no account of; whether it is in charming, or in certain signs called characters, or in hanging certain things about some part of the body. The place is seen in Cap. 20, Li. De Doct. Christ. 2. ²

Chrysostom, being very angry with those who hang the written gospel about their neck, has these words upon Matthew chap. 23:

"In what does the force or power of the gospel consist? In the form and figure of the letters, or in the understanding of the meaning and sense of them? If it is in the form of letters, then you do well to hang it about your neck: but if it is in understanding the meaning, then it is better that they were laid up in your heart." ³ This is what he says.

And there is the same reasoning about the figures, and about the pronunciation of the letters or words of the gospel; for just as the figure of the letters has no power to do anything, there is no force or virtue either in the pronunciation or the sound of words. Pliny, a heathenish writer, alleges many heathenish examples, in which he declares that words are effectual; yet, among other things which he brings up, he has this to say: "It is a question whether words or enchanting phrases have any force: but everyone who is wise is so far from believing it, that even man by man, they utterly deny it." The place may be seen in Lib. xxviii. cap. 2. ⁴ But most worthily, the true word of God itself is preferred above all these, by which Moses, Deu 18, forbids and condemns with great severity, all kinds of superstitions and enchantments.

I know what the adversaries will object here; namely, that it is a blessing or consecration, and not a superstition, that they use. Besides this, they bring many examples out of the scripture, set down in their canonical decrees, by which very foolishly and doubtless most unaptly, they set about proving that the natures of things are changed by blessing or consecration (as they say); from this they also gather that the bread is turned into flesh, by the words of blessing or consecrating.

Their examples are of this sort: the water flowed out of the rock after it was struck with Aaron's rod; the river Nile turned into blood; the water at the marriage in Cana of Galilee turned into wine; the bitter waters of Meribah changed into sweet water; and Moses' rod turned into a serpent. But, I beseech you, what make these to the Lord's Supper, with which they have no manner of similitude or likeness? So, this must be an unapt and doltish comparison ⁵ which they make: The river Nile was turned into blood, therefore the bread is turned into flesh: the water at the marriage in Cana was changed into wine, therefore the wine in the Lord's Supper is changed into the blood of Christ.

It's true that the water gushed out of the rock when it was struck, the river Nile was turned into blood, the water at the marriage was changed into wine, the bitter waters of Meribah became sweet, and Moses' rod was turned into a serpent. But truly, the water, the blood, the wine, the sweet water, and the serpent, were so turned and changed, that they were not in the form or likeness of those things which they were before; nor were they at once that which they were before, and also that which they were then made into. But the water of the Nile was truly blood, not water and blood together; nor was there invisible blood under the visible form of water. And so the case also stands in the other examples.

Therefore, they do not at all agree with the sacramental signs; but they are so far from being like them, that they are altogether unlike them. Moreover, who can tell by what pronouncement of words Moses made the water burst out of the hard rock, or turned the river Nile into blood, or changed the bitter waters into sweet? Who knows what form of words the Lord used when he changed water into wine? Therefore, they unfitly apply these examples to their blessing or consecration, as to changing the natures of things, since it cannot be shown what manner of blessings the saints or holy men used. Likewise we do not read that Moses and Joshua pronounced any words of blessing by which they divided the channel of the Erythrian sea, ¹ and the river Jordan.

Elisha is not read to have uttered any words of blessing when he made the axe swim, and took it out of the water by the handle. The power of God worked in all these things; but we must not imagine whatever we intend to proceed from that. For it is weakness, and not power, which is repugnant to justice, and which takes things in hand which are contrary to God's truth; but the mighty works of God are of such a sort, that any man may understand and manifestly see that they are such as they are said to be. The Lord said, "Let there be light; and there was light." It was that kind of light, I mean, which was called light — and according to the nature of light, it also gave light. That which was light indeed, was not called or made light, if it did not also give light. So too, the bread is called the body of Christ, though it does not have so much as one jot of the [physical] body of Christ in it.

Furthermore, this word "blessing" is not so used in any place in the scriptures, as they would have us believe. To bless, in the scriptures, is to thank, to praise, to salute, to bid farewell, to speak well of anyone, to wish well, to rejoice, to highly extol, to give thanks for a good turn, to increase, to enrich, to multiply, or to make fruitful. I could, if need be, bring examples to prove each of these. But a man nowhere reads that to bless is the same as changing the nature of things by the words of God, nor by good words and prayers pronounced in a set manner. They say, "We read in the gospel, that the Lord took bread and blessed it: yes, and Paul also calls the bread and cup by that name, i.e., 'The bread and cup of blessing,' undoubtedly the bread and cup of consecration; and by this consecration, the substance of the signs is miraculously changed." I answer that the words both of the gospel and of the apostle are wrongfully twisted to that sense, which never came into the mind of the Lord or his apostles. For to declare the meaning of that place in the gospel: To bless is not to make the sign of the cross with the gesture of the hand; nor to lay one's mouth to the bread and cup, and to whisper in a low voice the set syllables of the words of consecration. Rather, it is to sing praises to God, or to give thanks for His benefits bestowed on us.

I will confirm what I said, by the authority of the evangelists and apostles. For the apostles and evangelists use the word blessing or thanksgiving indifferently.

For where Mark has εὐλογῆσα (eulogesas), that is to say, "blessing," Matthew, Luke, and Paul have εὐχαριστήσας (eucharistesas), that is to say, "giving thanks:" Mark also uses this word a little after: "And when he had taken the cup," eucharistesas, that is, "when he had given thanks, he gave it to them." ¹ Therefore, to bless, as the apostles themselves interpret it, is to give thanks, since they put the one word for the other. The diligent reader may also see this in 1Cor 10.30; we will fully and wholly treat that passage in what follows. Our adversaries have therefore not yet proved from the scriptures, that to bless is the same as changing the things; or that by words, pronunciation, or reciting words, the things which are signified are brought into, or made present [with the sign].² Truly, the ancient writers mentioned a mystical blessing, but it was in a far different sense than these consecrators. We will speak of true consecration shortly; and in another place, we will also confute whatever things they have brought concerning the blessing or consecrating of baptism.

Now we will make an end of what we began. Words of themselves were instituted by God to this end: to signify, and by signifying, to bear witness and to admonish. Beside this, they do not have any hidden force to change the natures of things, nor to cause the things themselves to be corporally present; nor do we read that holy men ever used them in this way. Therefore, those who use them other than as they were instituted, sin and deceive men. For Aurel. Augustine acknowledges the very same thing in his Enchiridion ad Laurent. Capit. 22. He says: "And truly, words are instituted to this purpose: not that men should deceive one another by them, but by which one might make another know his meaning. Therefore, to use words for deceit, and not to that end to which they were ordained, is sin." ³

The same Aurelius Augustinus, making a summation of his whole book entitled De Magistro, asks this question: "But now, I would have you tell me what your opinion is about all this that I have spoken to you?" Later he answers this: "I have learned, being admonished by the words, that a man is taught nothing else by words, than to learn; and that it is a very small matter, that by speech or talk, we partly know what the speaker thinks. But whether the words which he spoke were true, that teaches he only, who admonished that he dwelt in the heart when the other spoke with the tongue." ⁴ This much he says in the last chapter of his book De Magistro. To this purpose pertain the words of Solomon the wise, in the book about the Preacher, ^{Ecc 12.11} saying: "The words of the wise are like pricks and nails that pierce by the authors of these gatherings,⁵ which are given by one shepherd." ⁶ Here we willingly acknowledge that there is a great force in eloquence and in the prayers of the just;⁷ as the Grecians signified by Hercules of Gallia; Cicero also has very plentifully declared it, in Lib. i. De Oratore. ⁸ But what they forge and imagine about Pitho, or Suada, or Suadela, the lady and mistress of eloquence,⁹ we truly attribute to the Holy Ghost, who gives grace to the speaker, and who also prepares and stirs up the minds of the hearers. By these things, I think it is manifest to all men that it is a new forgery of man, and not a doctrine from Oracle, to say that in the celebration of the sacraments, there is such force grafted into the words recited, that they turn and change the things, or make the things signified to be present, and either put them on or join them with the signs.

But we will show later, that the signs are not changed or mingled with the things signified, but that both of them still remain in their own nature and property. It will be sufficient if we attribute to the words, what the scripture attributes: namely, the office of signifying and admonishing, of moving and stirring up, which they have from God. For those who deck them with strange and falsified titles, defile and blemish the words of God.

We acknowledge indeed, that all the power of almighty God is attributed to the word of God. But who does not see that what is spoken and meant of the everlasting Son of God, is called "the Word of God" in the scripture? Who is such a dothead,¹ that he cannot rightly distinguish between the everlasting Word of God — who is the Son of God, the second person in the reverend Trinity — and the word that is repeated, spoken, or pronounced by man? The everlasting Word of God, in his own substance and nature, remains a creator and not a creature: it is not mingled, grafted, or incorporated into man's voice. The word which proceeds from man is a creature, not a creator, and it still remains a creature; for it is a sound which passes away. Nevertheless, what still remains is a virtue, if it is sincere and not adulterated, and it is received by faith; for so it preserves. Yet this is not by its own proper virtue or power, or because it is pronounced by man, but through His power or virtue who revealed the word, and who is true, and therefore preserves those things which he promises to preserve by his word. So that, now indeed, God himself preserves, who said that by his word he would preserve those who believe. ^{Wis 16.26} The word, therefore, which God has revealed to us by his servants the prophets, and by his chosen apostles, is not, nor is it called, the word of God, as if the sound of syllables, words, and voices, are of their own nature the word of God — that very same word, I mean, who of his own substance is the Son of God — but because the revelation of the word was made from God, in the Holy Ghost, through the word or wisdom of God.

This is why, although their origin is from God and not man, the words which the prophets and apostles uttered are man's words; nor can they do anything else but give signification. Even so, I would not disparage the due force of the external word of God, and those things imputed to the literal word, which are proper to God.² I acknowledge all those things which, with a sound understanding or judgment, are attributed to the word of God. But I have discoursed about this more at large elsewhere.³

But now, some will say: If, sacraments are not sanctified or consecrated by reciting the words of God, then from where do they have this, so that they are and are called sacraments, or holy signs? Is the consecration vain and of no force? Surely, that consecration which the papists have feigned is vain and of no force. But in the beginning of this chapter, I spoke about consecration or true sanctification; I will now set this forth a little plainer and more abundantly.

The holy scriptures, when they mention holy things, they very often use this Hebrew word קדש (qadash), ^{Gen 2.3} which the Greek interpreters commonly translate by αγιαζω (hagiazoo), the Latins by Sanctifico, Consecro, and Initio. The use of this word reaches very far: for it signifies to sanctify, to offer to God, to purify or cleanse, and to justify; also to sever or put apart, and to separate — to separate (I mean) from profane use, and to dedicate them to holy things; to call a thing by some name, to apply, and to appoint. Therefore we say, that to consecrate, in this place, is nothing else but to sanctify, to dedicate to God, and in a way, to separate, or to make something holy which was profane. But who does this? Or by what means or instrument does the one who sanctifies do it? Who, I beg you, consecrates, or makes holy? Is it God? Or is it man? Truly, it is God, and not man. For God, instituting anything, and testifying and declaring by his word what he has instituted, and to what end he has done it, of his own holy, just, and good will, and by his own only institution, I say, without any other means, He consecrates the thing which He himself has already instituted.

For as He is holy, just, and good, so that whatever He commands is holy, just, and good. And man — understanding by the word of God, that God has instituted anything for a holy, just, and good use — accepts, receives, and uses that institution for holy, good, and just ends. Therefore, by uttering certain words, man does not consecrate and make holy the institution. And because he believes that all the institutions of God are holy and good, he therefore also celebrates this institution of God, even as God has ordained, and gives God thanks, depending altogether upon God and the rule of his word.¹ The apostle says, speaking in another place about this manner of sanctification:

"Now the Spirit speaks evidently, that in the latter times there will rise deceivers, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God has created to be received with thanksgiving by those who believe and know the truth. For every creature of God is good, and nothing is to be refused, if it is received with thanksgiving: for it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer." ^{1Tim 4.1-5}

Look, he says, "meat is sanctified by the word of God and prayer." But the word of God in this passage (as Paul the apostle expounds it) is a testimony of the scripture and of the will of God, by which we are taught that all things which God has made are exceedingly good, and that they are clean, and not unclean; God has created them to be eaten and for our use. In the Acts, St. Peter hears, "Arise, Peter, slay, and eat;" for he saw in a vision before him, all living creatures of the earth and the air. "Peter answered, Not so, Lord; for I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean." Therefore, he heard again: "What God has cleansed, do not call common." ^{Act 10.13-15} But when, I ask you, did God make them clean? When he made and gave them for the use of man. Prayer is annexed to the word, not as a charm or enchantment, but as a faithful thanksgiving. For the apostle more than once or twice mentions thanksgiving, so that by the general word, that is to say, by prayer, nothing else might be understood by it than the special word, by which I mean, thanksgiving; for we might say that prayer is to invocation and thanksgiving, as the root is to the branches.²

Therefore, he says the meat is holy because God, who is good, has made and appointed it for the use of man; and also because it is received by man with faith and thanksgiving. For meat is not holy and good to many men, not through any fault in the meat (which is always the good creature of God), but the fault is in those who do not acknowledge by faith the benefits of God, or who abuse them, and glut themselves contrary to the word of the Lord.

So too stands the case with the matter of sanctification, which we must also apply to the sacraments. God, of his own good will, and for the commodity of men, ordained sacraments. He chose for himself, out of his good creatures, water, bread, and wine. And appointing them to some certain end, he laid a platform, and commanded us to use and celebrate them. Now therefore, by the commandment and choice of God, the water, bread, and wine, are consecrated, and he signs them with his word, and declares that he would have them counted sacraments, and shows the manner in which he would have them celebrated. So that the consecration of sacraments is made through the will, institution, choice, or commandment of God, and the seal of his word. Therefore, when water, bread, and wine, are used in a common way, or not as they are chosen and instituted by God, the word of God is slandered as it were,¹ and they are altogether common and profane. But being used holily, according to the choice or commandment of God, and the word or sign being added to them, they become sacraments, which they were not before. The same substance still remains in them, which they had before; but they are instituted for another end and use, for they are sealed with the word and commandment of God, and therefore they are hallowed. To this may also be added their holy use: setting forth by a true faith, the benefit of our redemption, and giving thanks ² by faithful prayers to our bountiful Redeemer.

To suit this purpose, we may fetch examples from civil government, in which some things, adjoined for certain new causes, having their substance still remaining, are now made into that which they were not before. For silver or gold, not yet being coined with the magistrate's mark, is nothing but silver or gold. But if by the commandment of the magistrate, a new form is added by an imprint, it is made into money, which it was not before, even though it is the very same substance which it was before. Wax, before it is sealed, is common and usual wax; but when by the king's will and commandment, what is engraved in the king's seal is imprinted in the wax, and it is applied to evidences and letters patents, ³ it is then so esteemed, that whoever defaces the sealed evidences ⁴ is arrested as guilty of treason. I trust you see plainly by this, that the true sanctification or consecration of sacraments consists in the will and institution of God, for a certain end and holy use of them, as declared to us in the word.

I have perhaps spoken more at large about this than some may think needful. But the godly reader will pardon my tediousness, since my desire is to open all things faithfully, diligently, and at large. Now that I have defended the lawful use of the word, and declared the virtue of it, and opened to you the true sanctification or consecration of sacraments, as occasion served, I will return to where I left. And because I taught that sacraments consist of two parts, the sign and the thing signified, it remains to show that those two parts retain their distinguished natures, not communicating their properties. By declaring this, both as to those things which go before and those which follow (yes, as to the whole substance of the sacrament), without doubt, a wonderful light will appear. But I will speak about communicating these names or terms in their convenient place.

Each part retains its distinguished nature, without communicating or mingling its properties. This may be seen by this: that many are partakers of the sign, and yet they are debarred from the thing signified. But if the natures of the parts were united or naturally knit together, it must be that those who partake of the sign, must also partake of the thing signified.

Examples from scripture, just as they are ready, so are they evident. For Simon Magus, in the Acts of the Apostles, received the sign and he was baptized: but he had not received so much as one iota of the thing signified. And Judas Iscariot, a cruel and faithless traitor of his master, likewise ate the bread of the Lord, but he did not eat the Lord;¹ otherwise he would have lived happy, just, and blessed forever: for the Lord himself says, "he who eats me, shall never die." Joh 6.54 But Judas died everlastingly; therefore, he did not eat that food of life.

To these evident testimonies of scripture I will now add certain testimonies of St. Augustine's pertaining to that purpose, who in his treatise on John 26 says:

"We receive visible food this day: but the sacrament is one thing, and the virtue of the sacrament is another. How many receive the things upon the altar, and when they have received it, die! Thus the apostle says, 'He eats and drinks his own damnation.' 1Cor 11.29 Was not the morsel poison, which the Lord gave to Judas? And yet he received it, and after he had received it, the enemy entered into him — not because what he received was evil, but because being evil himself, he received that good thing unworthily."

And immediately after he says:

"The sacrament of the thing, that is, of the knitting together of the body and blood of Christ, is received at the Lord's table, by some unto life, by others unto destruction: but the thing itself, of which it is a sacrament, is received by all men unto life, by none to destruction, whoever are partakers of it."

And again he says:

"He who does not dwell in Christ, nor Christ in him, without doubt he neither eats his flesh, nor drinks his blood spiritually, although carnally and visibly he chews with his teeth the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. But he rather eats and drinks the sacrament of so great a thing to his own damnation." ² And so forth.

He has similar words in his book De Civit. Dei,³ xxi. 25. cap. And in his book De Doctr. Christ, iii. cap. 9. he shows that "in the conjunction of natures, there needs to be a distinction, lest we stick too much upon the outward sign." ⁴

Now we come to the proofs of the scripture. The apostle witnesses in 1Cor chap. 10, that "all our fathers were baptized, and all ate of one spiritual food, and all drank of one manner of spiritual drink;" 1Cor 10.3-4 but the Lord had no delight in many of them. Though, if they had eaten that spiritual food and drunk that spiritual drink spiritually by faith, undoubtedly the Lord would have delighted in them. "For without faith," as He himself says, "it is impossible to please God." Heb 11.6 Therefore, God is well pleased with those who have faith. Thus our fathers truly were partakers of visible sacraments, but they were destitute of invisible grace. From this it follows that the sign and the thing signified retain their natures; they are not confounded or mingled, but distinguished and separated. Besides this, the words of the gospel have some affinity, or at least some likeness, with sacramental signs; otherwise, the words are preferred far above the signs. The apostle says that he "was sent to preach, and not to baptize." 1Cor 1.17 But many hear the word of the Lord with their outward ears, who for all that, because they are void of faith, are also without the inward fruit of the word.

Paul says yet again: "For the gospel was preached to us, as well as to them; but the word which they heard did not profit them, because it was not coupled with faith." ^{Heb 4.2} For so it comes to pass, that many receive the visible sacraments, and yet they are not partakers of the invisible grace, which is received by faith alone. From this it yet again follows that the sign is not confounded with the thing signified, but both of them retain their substance and nature, distinguished. What, and does the scripture not expressly and pithily differentiate between the outward ministry of man, and God the inward worker and giver of spiritual gifts? For John the Baptist says: "I baptize you with water, but he (Christ) will baptize you with the holy Ghost." ^{Mat 3.11} What Peter said agrees with this: "Baptism saves us, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience makes its request to God." ¹

To this now pertains that evident testimony of St. Augustine, iii. Quaest. lib. in Levit. Quaest. 83, written in these words:

"We must diligently consider that, as often as he says, 'I the Lord who sanctify him,' he speaks of the priest. Yet he also said to Moses, 'and you shall sanctify him.' How, therefore, do both Moses and God sanctify? It is because Moses does not sanctify for the Lord; but Moses sanctifies in the visible sacraments by his ministry, and the Lord by the invisible grace by his Holy Spirit, where the whole fruit of visible sacraments is also. For without this sanctification of invisible grace, what profit do we have by visible sacraments?" ²

Just as John the Baptist made a distinction between his own ministry in baptism, and the power of Christ, even so he also distinguishes between the ministry of preaching, and the drawing of the spiritual teacher:

"I am the voice of a crier in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord." ^{Joh 1.23} And again: "He that comes from on high is above all; he that is of the earth is earthly, and speaks of the earth; he that comes from heaven is above all; and what he has seen and heard, that he testifies," etc. ^{Joh 3.31-32} Agreeing with this, St. Paul says:

"Who is Paul, what is Apollos, but ministers by whom you believed, even as the Lord gave to every man? I have planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase. So that neither is he that plants anything, neither he that waters; but God that gives the increase." ^{1Cor 3.5-7}

Even so, the comparison of ministers with the signs do not altogether agree in every part (which I told you before), because ministers are fellow-labourers with Christ according to their office; but the signs (which are without life) are not so, unless we transfer to them that which is the ministers'. By still other proofs, I suppose it is made plain that the sign and thing signified retain their distinguished natures in the sacraments.

These things especially, disprove and convince those who are persuaded of that papistic transubstantiation of bread and wine into the substance of the body and blood of Christ. For these men utterly deny that the bread and wine, being consecrated in the mysteries, remain in their own substances. For they contend that the substances (of bread and wine) are annihilated and turned into the very body and blood of the Lord; so that after the consecration, the accidents ³ of bread and wine remain, and no part of the substance of them at all. For they say that the Lord, in express words, pronounced over the bread and wine, "This is my body, this is my blood;" and that the Lord can easily bring to pass by his own omnipotence, that what he said may be as he said. For proof of this, they allege these and not a few similar places: that the Lord, in truth, fashioned man out of the clay of the earth, and later made woman from the rib of man, and also turned Lot's wife into a pillar of salt; and therefore, by the self-same power, he can make his body from bread, and his blood from wine.

And these truly are their bulwarks. But in another place, we have plentifully disputed about the meaning of the Lord's words, "This is my body;" so that it is superfluous to make a long repetition of them here. I also told you that, from the omnipotence of God, we must not gather and determine whatever comes into our brain; and also that God's power does nothing against truth, nor against itself; and that no godly man ought to take in hand, under the pretence of the power of God, that which is repugnant to the plain scriptures and the articles of the catholic faith. ¹

Now it is evident and plain that after consecration there remains in the sacrament the substance of bread and wine; and we need no other witnesses in this than our own senses, which perceive, see, taste, and feel, no other thing than bread and wine. But while clay was turned into a man's body, the rib into a woman, and Lot's wife into a pillar of salt, they were not what they were before, as with the sacrament of the supper; nor did there appear to the senses any iota of the clay, of the rib, or of Lot's wife. These examples are therefore very foolishly and unaptly applied to the mystery of the Lord's Supper, with which they do not agree: we also touched on this before.²

The gospel, very diligently describing the most holy institution of the Lord's Supper and the manner of it, makes no mention of miraculous transubstantiation;³ but it calls the bread and wine — which the Lord took and distributed to his disciples, and which they also received — by the names bread and wine, after the words of consecration were spoken (as they term it), as well as before the consecration. Does not the Lord in the 26th chapter of Matthew, call the wine, being consecrated, not only wine, but the fruit of the vine, in a more vehement and emphatic kind of speech, lest any be ignorant that the wine was wine indeed, and remained so? In Mark we read this about the cup: "And he took the cup, and when he had given thanks, he gave it to them, and they all drank of it; and he said to them, This is my blood of the new Testament," etc. ^{Mar 14.23-24}

Look, they all drank of the cup (he says) before the words of consecration (as they term it) were spoken; therefore, they drank wine. Now, if they answer that this place of the evangelist is to be expounded by the figure hysteron proteron, that is, when anything is declared out of order preposterously,⁴ then they admit that there are tropes and figures in the celebration of the supper; notwithstanding this, they have contended it should be understood simply, without the help of tropes or figures. But the apostle Paul also, in 1Corinthians, chap. 10, calls the bread of the Lord, now being in very holy use and consecrated (if I may say so), by the name bread. And in the 10th chapter of 1Cor., he calls it bread a third time. ^{1Cor 10.,16-17} Furthermore, the Acts of the Apostles testify how the churches of the apostles call the whole mystical action the breaking of bread, not the breaking of his body or distribution of his blood. It is manifest, therefore, that the substance of bread and wine in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper remain in their own nature, and that transubstantiation is a sophistical imagination.

This also is a sophistical and a notable papistic forgery: ⁵ in that they say the bread and wine, consecrated in the supper, is called bread and wine by the apostles, because they were bread and wine before. That is done now, they say, which is read in Exodus to have been done in times past, where Aaron's rod is said to devour the enchanter's rods, which nevertheless were not rods then, but serpents; but they are named rods now, because they were rods before they were so changed — those which now are serpents, and not rods. But again; who does not see this example has no similitude or likeness with the bread and wine of the Lord? For the rod truly was called a rod; but meanwhile it was, and plainly seemed to be, not a rod, but a serpent. But the bread is called bread, and it does not appear to be anything else but bread. Here no form of flesh is seen, as there it was seen in the form of a serpent.

Beside this, the rod is said to be turned into a serpent, and is shown as a wonder or miracle; but nowhere do you read that the bread was turned into flesh by any miracle: but a sacrament is instituted, which indeed loses the name and nature of a sacrament, when the substance of the sign is annihilated and made void, and nothing remains but the thing signified; for what they triflingly say about accidents miraculously subsisting without their subject, and remaining instead of a sign, is to no purpose. If we were to go about boasting of our dreams as miracles, there would be nothing so absurd and foolish, that we would not colour it with our fancies and lies. What if this word transubstantiation manifestly proves that this whole trifling toy is not fetched from the simple and plain doctrine of the apostles, but from the subtle school of quarreling sophisters? The apostle Paul charges us to beware of both philosophy and strange words; ¹ though at present we not only treat new words, but also new matter and new doctrine, that are in all points contrary to the apostles'. For this doctrine of transubstantiation is clean contrary both to the doctrine of the apostles and evangelists — touching the true incarnation of our Lord, and the true nature and property of his human body — and also the true raising up again of our bodies. For they are constrained to forge many things that are altogether miraculous; such as the invisible body of Christ, and the subtle body of Christ piercing by his subtlety through the gate and the stone, I mean, the one which covered his sepulchre; or the Lord's very body being entirely and ² at one time in many places and filling all things; and other countless things of this stamp, absurd and wicked.

Now, also Joan. Scotus, a subtle doctor, in his work, Sentent. Distinct, ii. Lib. 4. quaest. 3, says that the article of transubstantiation is neither expressed in the creed of the apostles, nor in those creeds of the ancient fathers; but that it was brought in and invented by the church (so he says, meaning the Romish church,) under Innocentius the third, in the council of Lateran. From this we gather that the doctrine of transubstantiation is of recent times and newly started; we have elsewhere more largely compiled the history of it.³ But by what I have said, I think it plainly and effectually enough declared, that the signs are not mingled with the things signified, nor changed into them; but that each of them remain in their separate natures. Though the parts retain their own nature without mixture, those two agree in one sacrament; and being joined together and not divided, they make one perfect and lawful sacrament. For water alone, both privately and ordinarily sprinkled, is no sacrament, unless it is applied and used according to the institution of Christ. Purifying also, or the washing away of sins, and the engrafting or receiving into the league and fellowship of God and all saints, is no sacrament of itself, unless there is also a sprinkling of water in the name of the blessed Trinity. In like manner, it is no sacrament, if we eat bread in a common assembly, and drink wine from the same cup in the common manner; nor is it a sacrament if, through a faithful remembrance, you consider that the Lord's body was betrayed for you, and his blood shed for you, for which you also give thanks. But so far as they are all mysteries of God and our salvation, they are generally termed sacraments, ¹ that is, secret and spiritual mysteries of God and our salvation. For in a perfect and lawful sacrament, both the holy action (corporal or sensible), and the spiritual celebration of it (for which this sacramental action was invented and put into practice), must go together.

³ De Origine Erroris circa Coenam et Miss. Pap. cap. x.

But here, some raise many and diverse questions touching the sacramental union, whether it is personal, real, or rational.

Because I see nothing of this matter doubtfully delivered by the apostles, and that the thing which is plain of itself, is made dark, doubtful, difficult, and obscure by such sophistications, I will simply and plainly say this: that the sign and the thing signified are joined together in the sacraments by God's institution, and by faithful contemplation and use — to be short, in the signification and likeness of the things. But I utterly deny that those two things are united together in nature, so that the sign in the sacrament becomes what the thing signified is in its own substance and nature. I deny that the thing signified is joined corporally with the sign, or that if the sign still remains in its own substance and nature, yet nevertheless, in the meantime, the thing signified is corporally joined to it — so that thereby, whoever partakes of the sign, partakes of the thing itself, by the sign or with the sign. The reason why I so constantly deny this is sufficiently apparent, I think, by those examples which I have declared up to here, and which will be declared afterward.

Furthermore, I say that the sign and the thing signified are coupled together by God's institution, because the one who instituted the sacraments of baptism and the supper, did not institute it to this end: that with water we might wash away the filth of the body, as the custom is to do by daily baths; nor that we should have our fill of the bread and wine. But it is that under visible signs, He might commend to us the mysteries of our redemption and his grace, and to be short, of our salvation — by representing them to renew them, and by sealing them to confirm them. I am saying that they are coupled together in a faithful contemplation, because those who religiously partake of the sacraments, do not fasten their eyes on sensible things only, but also on things that are insensible, signified, and heavenly. So that the faithful have in themselves both these things coupled together, which otherwise are not knit together with a bond, in the sign or with the sign. For they corporally and sensibly receive the signs, but they spiritually possess, comprehend, renew, and exercise the things that are signified. I say they are coupled together in the signification and likeness of the things, because the sign is a token of the thing signified. And unless signs have a likeness with those things for which they are signs, they would not then be signs.

They have, therefore, a most apt and very near affinity between themselves. For as water washes away the filth of the body, and as bread and wine satisfy and make merry the heart of man, even so, the people of God are purified by the grace of God; even so, the body and blood of the Lord, which was given for us, apprehended by faith, both satisfies and makes merry the whole man, so that he may yield himself wholly to thanksgiving, and obedient toward God. I would speak here more largely about the analogy, or about the sign and the thing signified, but I see that I may do it later in a more convenient place. I think I will not need any more places out of the scripture to open these things more evidently, since they follow of their own accord from that which we have confirmed up to here by testimonies from scriptures, and which we will confirm more at large later.

Moreover, in respect to the likeness of the sign and the thing signified, the name of the one is given to the other, as I will prove by most evident testimonies of scripture. In Genesis 17, the Lord says thus to Abraham:

"You shall keep my covenant, therefore, both you and your seed after you in their generations. This is my covenant, which you shall keep between me and you: every man-child among you shall be circumcised. You shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin, and it shall be a token of the covenant between me and you." Gen 17.10-11

The mouth of the Lord has spoken this. Who would question the word of God? The word of God calls circumcision a covenant; therefore the name of the thing signified is given to the sign. For indeed, circumcision is not the covenant itself; for the covenant is the bargain and agreement between God and men, which has certain conditions and articles. This is why, by interpretation, the same circumcision is then called "a token of the covenant." And who would find fault with this interpretation of God? The signs therefore, yes, God being the interpreter, take the names of the things signified.

"So you may read in the twelfth chapter of Exodus: "You shall eat the lamb in haste, for it is the Lord's Passover." Exo 12.11 Again: "And the blood shall be to you a sign in the houses wherein you are," etc. Exo 12.13 And again: "This day shall be a remembrance for you," etc. Exo 12.14

What can be spoken more plainly, than that the lamb is called the Passover? But what is the proper meaning of the Passover? Let us give ear to the Lord, here again expounding himself, and saying: "I will pass through the land of Egypt this same night, and will strike all the first-born of Egypt, from man to beast; and when I see the blood (of the lamb), I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you." Exo 12.12-13 Behold, the Passover, God himself interpreting it, is that passing over by which the angel of God, passing over the houses of the Israelites which were marked with the blood of the lamb, spared the first-born, and slew the first-born of the Egyptians. If you are ignorant of what and what kind of lamb it was, listen again to the Lord instructing you, and saying: "In the tenth day of this month, every man take for himself a lamb according to the household; and let your lamb be without blemish, a male of a year old, which you shall take out from among the sheep and from among the goats." Exo 12.3 And here the lamb is plainly called the Passover. And who does not see, that the lamb is not the Passover? Yet, because it is a sign or remembrance of the Passover, as the mouth of the Lord says, surely it takes the name of the Passover, or passing by.

Again, you read in the nineteenth of Numbers: "Thus spoke the Lord to Moses: Speak to the children of Israel, that they bring you a red cow without blemish, and you shall give her to Eleazar the priest, that he may bring her outside the camp, and cause her to be slain before his face, and burnt whole; ...and a man that is clean shall gather up the ashes of the cow, and lay them outside the camp in a clean place; and it will be kept for the multitude of the children of Israel ¹ for a water of separation (or sprinkling); for it is sin." Num 19.2,3,9 Mark again the way the scripture speaks. A heifer or cow is sin, that is, a sacrifice for sin; as Christ is said to be made sin for us, 2Cor 5.21 that for (or by) sin ² he might condemn sin; Rom 8.3 which means that by the oblation of his body alone, he might cleanse and purge us from sin.

To this also belongs what the apostle says, speaking about sacrifices to the Hebrews: "But in these sacrifices mention is made of sins every year; for it is not possible that the blood of bulls and goats could take away sins." ^{Heb 10.4} Therefore, whenever sacrifices — such as heifers, goats, bulls, and lambs — are called sanctifications, cleansings, or sins, the signs take the names of the things signified. For these were certain types and figures of the priest who was to come, and of Christ, upon whom all our sins are laid; for he truly is "the Lamb of God, who takes away the sins of the world." ^{Joh 1.29}

Now we have come to the sacraments of the new Testament, whose signs also bear the names of the things signified. For Peter says in Acts 2: "Let every one of you be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins." ^{Act 2.38} And Paul too hears, in the Acts of the Apostles: "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away your sins by calling on the name of the Lord." ^{Act 22.16} Therefore, truly, baptism is called a cleansing, or washing away of sins. And Peter also elsewhere says: "Baptism saves you, not by putting away the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience makes its request to God." ¹ And Paul also says: "You are washed, you are sanctified, you are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God." ^{1Cor 6.11} Therefore, the due and right comparison of these places between themselves, manifestly proves that the name of the thing signified, is given to the sign of baptism, which is water.

In the same way, it is to be seen in the institution of the Lord's Supper, or Eucharist. The bread is called the body of Christ, and the wine is called the blood of Christ. But the right faith believes that the true body of Christ ascended out of this world, lives and is now in heaven, and that the Lord will not return into this world again until he comes in the clouds of heaven to judge the quick and the dead. Thus every man understands that the names of the things themselves (namely, the body and blood of Christ), are given to the sign (namely, the bread and the wine) — through communicating the names.

Many other phrases used in the scripture and in our daily talk are not unlike the phrases used in the sacrament. We read that Christ is, and is called, a lion, a lamb, a shepherd, a vine, a door, a way, a ladder, the day, the light, the sun, the water, the bread, a spring, and a rock. If anyone today were to rigidly urge or contend that Christ is a lamb indeed, a door in substance, a natural vine, etc., who, I beg you, could abide him reasoning in such a way? We would hiss and drive such a one out from among us as a mad man, and a perverter of God's oracles. We read indeed, "And that rock was Christ." ^{1Cor 10.4} Meantime, consider what would follow. For if that rock really and indeed had been Christ, none of those who drank from that rock would have been reprobates; for all who are partakers of Christ are acceptable to God. "But the Lord had no delight in many of those who drank of the rock; for they were slain in the wilderness." ^{1Cor 10.4-5} Therefore, those who drank from the rock, which was Christ, were not made partakers of Christ. Therefore, the rock was not Christ really and indeed. Also, seeing the standards of kings, princes, and cities, we call the signs by the names of the kings, princes, and cities: for we say, This is the king of France, This is the prince of Germany, This is Figure,² This is Berne. So too, if we see the marriage-ring, or the image of any prince, we call it the faith and troth of wedlock, or man and wife; yes, and we say it by the image, This is the prince. For matrons, showing their wedding-ring, say, This is my husband: when we show any man the picture or image of the duke of Saxony, we say, This is the duke of Saxony. If anyone went on obstinately affirming that the sign indeed is the thing signified, just because it bears its name, would not all men cry out that such a person was without wit or reason, and that he should by all means be abhorred as an obstinate brawler?

Therefore, those who are skilful in these things, understand that it is and has been catholic, received by all men, and also sound, which we showed just now at large; namely, that the signs borrow the names of the things, and do not turn into the things which they signify.

And therefore, the ancient fathers started no strife or contentions about the sacraments, as there are among us today. For as they beautified the signs with the names of the things they signified, so they acknowledged the kind of speech it was; nor did they rigidly urge the words, as though the signs were really and corporally the same as what they signified. Therefore, this canon or rule is so often repeated and beaten upon by Aurelius Augustine, that "the signs take or borrow the names of things signified." ¹ By the same canon or rule he makes certain dark places plain; we will now set down some testimonies about this thing. In his Epist. 23. ad Bonifacium, de Parvulorum Baptismate, Augustine says:

"If sacraments did not have some likeness with those things of which they are sacraments, no doubt they would not be sacraments; for the most part, they take the names of the things themselves from this likeness. As the apostle also says, speaking of baptism: 'We are buried with Christ by baptism into his death.' He does not say, we signify the burial; but he flatly says, 'we are buried.' Therefore he called the sacrament of so great a thing, by nothing else than the name of the self-same thing." ²

"When the unclean person is gone, all who remain are clean. Such a thing will occur when the world, being overcome by Christ, passes away, and no unclean person remains among the people of God; when the tares are separated from the wheat, the just will shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father. The Lord foresaw that this would come to pass, and witnessed that it was signified when Judas fell away: the tares being separated, and the holy apostles remaining as wheat. For he says, 'Now the Son of man is glorified.' It is as if he had said, 'Behold what will happen when I am glorified, when there shall be no wicked person, and no good man shall perish.'

For he does not say, 'Now the glorying of the Son of man is signified;' but he says, 'Now the Son of man is glorified.' Likewise, it is not said, 'The rock signified Christ.' but 'The rock was Christ.' Nor is it said, 'The good seed signifies the children of the kingdom,' but he says, 'The good seed are the children of the kingdom; and the tares are the children of the wicked.' The scripture is therefore prone to call the things which signify, as the things that are signified. Even so, the Lord spoke, saying, 'Now the Son of man is glorified,' after that wicked Judas was separated; and his holy apostles remaining with him, his glorification was signified when the wicked, being divided out, he remains eternally with the saints." ³

The same Aurelius Augustine, in his epistle to Evodius 102, says:

"The sound of the voice, and the bodily shape of a dove, and cloven tongues like fire, came upon every one of them; likewise, those things in mount Sinai, were done in a most fearful manner; and that pillar of cloud by day, and that pillar of fire by night — these things were ordained and set for some operation which they signified. In this, we must especially take heed that none be persuaded or believe that the nature and substance of the Father, or of the Son, or of the Holy Ghost, is changeable, or may be turned. Nor let any man be disturbed that sometimes the thing which signifies, takes the name of that thing which is signified. The Holy Ghost is said to descend and remain upon Christ in the bodily shape of a dove. So also the rock is said to be Christ — but only because it signifies Christ." ¹

By these examples alleged out of the scripture, it is plain that the signs borrow the names of the things, and not their natures and substances. Whereupon it is undoubtedly true that those people err as far as heaven is wide, who are persuaded that the sacramental phrases are not to be expounded as figurative and borrowed, but are proper and literal. By that means, the water, bread, and wine, would not be only signs and tokens of regeneration, and of the body of Christ given and of his blood shed for us, but they would then be regeneration itself, and the substantial body and blood of our Lord Jesus. Being of this opinion, they are offensive to the common manner of both speaking and interpreting which has been used in all ages; they are also repugnant to true faith — yes, and to common sense. Whereby it comes to pass that, by confounding the sign with the thing signified, they introduce a servile weakness, and (if I may use St. Augustine's words) "a carnal bondage." For, Li. iii. de Doct. Chr. chap. 9, treating the sacraments of Christians, he says:

"The Lord himself, and the apostles in their doctrine, have left us few things instead of many; and those are most easy to do, most reverend in understanding, and most pure in observing. Such are baptism and the celebration of the body and blood of the Lord. When every man receives these sacraments, being instructed, he acknowledges what they refer to, so that we will not worship them with carnal servitude or bondage, but rather with spiritual freedom or liberty. To follow the letter, and to take the signs instead of the things which are signified by them, is a point of servile weakness — to so unprofitably expound the signs, is a point of evil-wandering error." ²

And Augustine speaks yet more plainly, chap. 5:

"First of all, you must beware, lest you take a figurative statement according to the letter. For what the apostle says, agrees with this: 'The letter kills, but the spirit gives life.' ^{2Cor 3:6} For when that which is spoken figuratively, is taken as though it were spoken properly, it is carnally understood. Nor is there anything that may more agreeably be termed 'the death of the soul,' than when that in which we excel beasts — which is understanding or knowledge — is made subject to the flesh, by following the letter. For he that follows the letter understands words that are translated or borrowed, as being proper or natural; nor does he refer that which is signified by a proper word, to another signification. For example, if he hears mention made of the sabbath, he understands it in no other way than as one day of the seven which come and go by continual course. And when he hears mention made of sacrifice, what comes out of his head is only that this means what was usually done about offering beasts and fruits of the earth. To be short, this is the miserable bondage of the soul: to take the signs for the things themselves, and not to be able to lift up the eyes of the mind above the bodily creature, in order to obtain everlasting light." ³

By these words of Augustine, we gather that those who reverence the sacraments by spiritual liberty, do not stick to the letter, nor do they worship and reverence the visible things and elements

³ August, ibid. cap. 5. Opp. Tom. iii. fol. 11. col. 2.

(such as water, bread, and wine) instead of the things signified; rather, being admonished and stirred up by the signs, they are lifted up in their minds, to behold the things that are signified.

This same Augustine, in the same book, chapter 15, teaching when and in what manner a trope or figure is to be received or acknowledged, says:

"In figurative speech, this manner of rule shall be kept: that you view what is read, with diligent consideration, until the interpretation comes to the rule of charity. For if it is not repugnant to charity, then do not think it is figurative speech." ¹

And yet more plainly he adds in the 16th chapter following:

"If it is imperative speech, either forbidding a heinous offence or wicked deed, or else commanding any profitable or good deed, it is not figurative speech. But if it commands any wicked deed, or forbids any deed of charity, then it is figurative. 'Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, you have no life in you.' He seems to command some horrible offence or wicked deed; therefore, it is figurative speech: it commands us to communicate with the passion of Christ, and to comfortably and profitably lay up in our remembrance, that his flesh was crucified and wounded for us. The scripture says, 'If your enemy hungers, feed him.' Here no man doubts that he commands well-doing; but what follows, 'for in so doing you shall heap coals of fire upon his head,' a man would think that a wicked and evil deed was commanded: therefore do not doubt it is figuratively spoken." ²

And so forth. All these things convince them of their error, who interpret sacramental speech as literal, and reject all figures and tropes, especially in the institution of the supper.

Nevertheless, I am not ignorant what they set against this last testimony of St. Augustine: that the words of our Saviour, in the sixth chapter of John, say nothing about the interpretation of the administration of the sacrament; and therefore the passage from St. Augustine does not suit our purpose at all. But it is manifest that in the same book, St. Augustine disputes about signs and sacramental phrases. It is also manifest by many other places out of St. Augustine, that he often alleged these words of our Saviour, out of the sixth chapter of John, to expound the celebration of the supper. But why do they not pertain to the celebration of the supper? Does he speak of one body in the supper, and of another body in the sixth chapter of John? Should we believe that the Lord had and has two bodies? Our Lord Jesus has but one body which, just as it does not profit to be eaten corporally according to John 6.53, even so that body, being corporally eaten, does not avail anything according to Matthew 16.11-12. But we have handled this matter elsewhere.³

And of just as little force, is this unsavoury objection of theirs that the consequence is false when we argue thus: Circumcision is the covenant, the lamb is the Passover, sacrifices are sins, and sanctifications or cleansings are sacramental phrases — mystical and figurative. Therefore, "This is my body," is also mystical and figurative speech.

For since in sacraments there is like reasoning, why may we not frame arguments from the one to the other? And it is accepted by all those who acknowledge the truth rightly, that sacraments have like reasoning. This will be proved afterward to the full. But if it is not lawful to reason from the sacraments of the old Testament, and in a certain comparison, to interpret ours by them, and to make theirs plain by ours, then truly, the apostle did not do well when, by a "false consequent" from such a comparison, he argued from their sacraments to ours in 1Corinthians 10, and Colossians 2. But now we return to our purpose.

To at length make an end of this place: they are sacramental and figurative phrases, when we read and hear that the bread is the body of Christ, and the wine the blood of Christ; and that those who eat and drink the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord, eat and drink the body and blood of Christ; also, that those who are baptized in the name of Christ, are purged from their sins and regenerated into a new life; and that baptism is the washing away ¹ of our sins. The scripture speaks in this manner, and the old doctors of the church kept this form of speech. None who is wise dispraises them for doing so. Nor can one discommend any man who speaks in this manner, for he also abides in the same sincerity in which it is manifest that those holy men of God walked. For just as they used those phrases willingly and simply, so they did not rigidly and rigorously strain the letter and phrases. They interpreted them in such a way that none was so unskilful, that he might not understand that the signs were not the thing itself which they signified, but that the signs took the names of the things. Therefore, they used words significatively, sacramentally, mystically, and figuratively.

Now though some would not have the sacramental phrases be expounded — as though, not being expounded, they had more authority, majesty, and worthiness. This draws after it a sore danger, and it gives a most grievous offence, and it is repugnant to the rule of the apostles, to sound reason, and to the custom of those of old. For when these kinds of phrases are presented and uttered to the simple sort, not being expounded — namely, "That bread is the body of Christ; When you drink the wine of the Lord, you drink the very blood of the Lord; Baptism saves us," etc., — what else is presented, I ask you, than a snare of carnal bondage, and a most dangerous offence of idolatry?

This matter does not need many words, since experience abundantly shows what has been done in this point, and what is done today.²

The rule of the apostles commands that the divine oracles be expounded in the church, and to lay out all the mysteries of the scripture, so that they may be soundly understood, as we see in 1Corinthians 14. And reason itself teaches us that the mind of man is little or not at all moved, if the things themselves are not understood. What fruit therefore shall the simple sort receive by the sacraments, to whom the meaning of the sacraments has not been opened? Therefore, the ancient fathers did better, not only in expounding all the mysteries of the kingdom of God, and especially the sacraments, but also in teaching that they ought to be expounded. Although this is made plain enough by those things which go before, I will yet add two examples out of St. Augustine touching this matter. In chap. 6. De Catechisandis Rudibus, he says:

"Let the new Christian man be taught concerning the sacraments, that they are visible signs of heavenly things, and that invisible things are to be honoured in them; nor is that sign, after it is blessed and sanctified, to be so taken as it is daily used. It must also be told what that phrase signifies which he hears; and what thing is given in the sign, for which it is a representation. Moreover, on this occasion he must be taught that if he hears anything even in the scriptures that sounds carnal, even though he does not understand it; yet he is to believe that some spiritual thing is signified by it, which belongs to holy manners and the life to come," etc. ³

5-6. THE SIXTH SERMON: OF SIGNS & SACRAMENTS.

The same Augustine, Lib. iv. De Doctr. Chri. cap. 8. utterly forbids the doctors and teachers of the church to think that they should therefore speak obscurely about the mysteries of the scripture, because they see that these things are delivered somewhat intricately and darkly in the scripture; rather, he requires light and plainness in them. If any man desires to hear his words, they are these:

"If we fetch examples of the manner of speaking, out of the writings of our canonical authors and doctors (which are easily understood), yet we should not think to also follow them in those phrases in which they have used a profitable and wholesome obscurity. These were to exercise and quicken the readers' minds as it were, to take away loathsomeness, and to stir up the studies of willing learners; and also to make the minds of the wicked zealous, so that they may either be turned to godliness, or else excluded from the mysteries. For they so spoke, that those who came after them, and could understand and rightly expound them, might reveal a second grace, unlike the former, still ensuing in the church of God. Therefore, those who expound them should not speak as though by the same authority, they would offer themselves to be expounded. But in all their kinds of speech, let them labour chiefly and first of all, to be understood, speaking as plainly as they can, so that only one who is very dull and slow-witted does not understand; or at least, do not let the fault of the hardness and subtlety of the things which we set about to open and declare, be in our own speech, whereby what we speak takes somewhat longer to understand."¹

Let what I have said up to here about sacramental phrases be sufficient. The Lord be praised. Amen.

5-7. THE SEVENTH SERMON: OF SACRAMENTS, GRACE, & FAITH.

WE MUST REASON REVERENTLY ABOUT SACRAMENTS; THEY DO NOT GIVE GRACE BY THEMSELVES, NOR DO THEY HAVE GRACE INCLUDED IN THEM. AGAIN, WHAT THE VIRTUE AND LAWFUL END AND USE OF SACRAMENTS IS. THEY DO NOT PROFIT WITHOUT FAITH; THEY ARE NOT SUPERFLUOUS TO THE FAITHFUL; AND THEY DO NOT DEPEND UPON THE WORTHINESS OR UNWORTHINESS OF THE MINISTER.

Yesterday, dearly beloved, I told you what a sacrament was; who was the author of them, and for what cause sacraments were instituted; of what things they consist, that is to say, of the sign and the thing signified. I also told you what a sign is and what is the thing signified, and by what names they are termed; how they are consecrated; that the sign is not mingled with the thing signified, but that both of them remain in their own nature and property of nature; that the sign is not taken away or miraculously turned, nor is the thing signified so joined with the sign, that whoever partakes of the one, partakes of the other also. To be short, I declared how and in what manner the sign and the thing signified are coupled together to make a full, perfect, and lawful sacrament; I also treated sacramental phrases.

Therefore, it now remains that I also consequently speak of the nature, virtue, and efficacy of sacraments, and of those things which are joined and have affinity with them. For so the order which I used in my division requires.

Touching the virtue and nature of sacraments, that is to say, what they work in man, writers have disputed diversely and plentifully. It seems to me that reverence must be used in this disputation, and that heed must be taken that I do not incline either to the right hand or to the left; that is, that I do not attribute too much to them, to the derogating of the doctrine of the evangelists and apostles; nor that I diminish or take away from them, to my own damnation, that which the scripture, the word of God, attributes to them. But we will plentifully give great praise and glory to the ordinances of God if we say about them, that which the Spirit of God has set down in the holy scriptures. To be willing to attribute more to them, is not only an error in man, but a great fault which brings death and horrible destruction. This is declared to us in the holy scripture by examples that are most worthy of remembrance. The ark of the covenant, given by Moses to the people of Israel, was a witness of God's presence among the people, and of the league and friendship between God and man. For in these words God made a league with the people: "I will make my dwelling-place among them, and walk among them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people." Eze 37.27 Concerning this ordinance and agreement, the ark itself was called, "The Lord God of hosts, sitting between the cherubim;" as we see in 2Sam 6.2, and in 1Chr 13.6. It was also called, "The ark of the covenant of the Lord." Num 10.33 For when the prophets of God attributed these things to the sacrament of God, they thought and spoke plentifully and reverently enough about the sacrament of God. But when the ignorant and malicious priests, and the people corrupted by them, attributed far greater things to the ark or the sacrament of God, I ask you, what then came to pass? Give ear first to what they attributed to the ark:

"The elders of Israel said, Why has the Lord cast us down this day before the Philistines? Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh to us, so that when it comes among us, it may save us out of the hands of our enemies." 1Sam 4.3 You have heard what they attributed to the ark. Now give ear to what they did. "So the people sent to Shiloh, and brought from there the ark of the covenant of the Lord of hosts, which sits between the cherubim. And it came to pass that when the ark of the covenant of the Lord came into the host, all Israel shouted out a mighty shout, so that the earth rang back. And when the Philistines heard the noise of the shout, they said, What does the sound of this mighty shout mean? And they understood that the ark of the Lord had come into the camp. And the Philistines cried, Woe be to us! God has come into the camp. Who will deliver us out of the hands of those mighty gods that struck the Egyptians?" ^{1Sam 4.4-8} But listen now to what happened; and how God declared that the ark was not God, as it was called and accounted by the unskilful in holy things; and how he punished the sins of the people, because they attributed too much to the sacrament. It then follows: "And the Philistines fought; and Israel was struck down, and fled every man into his tent; and there was an exceeding great slaughter; for there were overthrown of Israel thirty thousand footmen; beside that, also, the ark of God was taken, and the two sons of Eli were slain." ^{1Sam 4.10-11} All these things may be read in 1Sam 4.

Again, when the sacrament of God was irreverently handled by the swinish Philistines, they were struck with a loathsome and deadly plague. They boasted that their gods and the religion of the Philistines had overcome the God and the religion of the Israelites; but the gods of the Philistines fell down and were broken in pieces, and their heathenish religion confounded. What, and did not the Israelites perish with a more grievous plague than before, when they lightly handled, and contrary to the law of God in Numbers 4, looked into the sacrament brought back by the Philistines into Beth Shemesh? "For the Lord struck fifty thousand and seventy men." 1Sam 6.19. When Moses negligently defers the circumcising of his children, he fell into great danger. ^{Exo 4.24-25} The Shechemites were destroyed for receiving circumcision rashly. ^{Gen 34}

And Simeon and Levi, for profaning the sacrament, are cursed by their father, Genesis 49.5-6. What the apostle says about those who celebrate the supper unworthily, agrees with this: "For this cause many are weak and sick among you, and many sleep." To this also belongs the example of Uzzah, a man not altogether evil, who touched this same sacrament, which was not lawful for him to do. Therefore the Lord struck him with a sudden death; and not privately in the tabernacle, but in the sight of all the people. ^{2Sam 6.6} David, speaking of this deed of God, says to the Levites in the congregation and church of the Israelites: "The Lord has chosen the Levites to bear the ark of the Lord" (and not that cattle will draw it in a new cart); "therefore, see that you are holy, that you may bring the ark of the Lord God of Israel into the place which I have prepared for it. because you did not this at the first, our Lord God has made a rent among us; for we did not seek him as to the fashion it ought to be done." ^{1Chr 15.1-2; 12-13} And it follows immediately: "The priests and Levites sanctified themselves to fetch the ark of the Lord God of Israel. And the children and Levites bore the ark of God on their shoulders with staves, as Moses commanded, according to the word of the Lord." ^{1Chr 15.14-15} All these things may be seen in 1Chronicles, chap. 15. From this we gather that the Lord will have none of our good meanings or intentions, and pompous celebrations of the sacraments. But he only requires that we so judge and speak about the sacraments, as he judges and speaks by his word; and that we so use and celebrate them, as he himself has instituted and celebrated them. Therefore, the one who attributes to them what God himself grants to them in the holy scriptures, sufficiently sets forth the dignity of the sacraments.

Let us therefore, first of all, search out what dignity the sacraments have had for the most part in our time, so that we may thereby better understand what is to be attributed to them, and what is not to be attributed to them. The common sort of priests and monks have taught that the sacraments of the new law are not only signs of grace, but are also causes of grace — that is, they have power to give grace.

For they say that they are like instruments, pipes, and certain conduits of Christ's passion, by which the grace of Christ is conveyed and poured into us. But the signs of the old Testament, they say, given to the fathers, were signs only, and not also causes of grace — they had force to signify, but not to give grace.

They seem truly to have sucked that error from St. Augustine's words, wrongly understood. For he writes this upon the 73rd Psalm: "The sacraments of the new law are more wholesome and happy than those of the old law, because they promise, these give." ¹ But St. Augustine meant to say nothing other than what he says in another place, this way: "The sacraments of the old law foreshowed that Christ would come, but ours show that he has come." ² For against Faustus, Lib. xix. cap. 14, he also calls the sacraments of the old law "promises of things to be performed; but our sacraments are tokens of things that are already performed." ³ This is why he says upon the 73rd Psalm: "The sacraments of the old law are given to signify the very thing; but ours witness that it is given, and signify that it is present." ⁴ I confess that he says more than once, that our sacraments are more adequate and effectual;⁵ but he said it for no other reason than this: the Messiah being already revealed and given to us in the new Testament, our sacraments ⁶ are more perfect, more enlightening, and more beautiful. For Christ has brought all signs to an end; therefore ours have a fuller significance, and in a way, are livelier. But if Augustine had been altogether of that opinion which these men favour and follow, would not godliness itself persuade us to forsake the authority of men, and cling to the word of truth?

Let us therefore see what may be gathered out of the word of truth, that is, out of the canonical scriptures, touching the likeness and difference between the sacraments of the old and new Testaments. This we hold for a certainty out of the scriptures: that there is but one everlasting and unchangeable God and Lord of either Church; that there is but one faith in God through Christ, of either church; that there is but one way laid down in either church, to attain the promises of salvation. In short, there is but one church of the only living God, gathered together out of both people, Jews and Gentiles. I think no large confirmation of these things is needed out of the scripture, because in the eighth decade, third sermon, I handled them in full. Now that I have fortified and confirmed these things before by the writings of the apostles, I conclude this, not of my own brain, but by the authority of God: Those who always have one everlasting and unchangeable God, one way of salvation set forth for all in Christ from the beginning — one faith, one church, one baptism, and the same spiritual food and drink; Eph 4.4-6 cannot help but have the self-same sacraments, as to their substance.

The Jews and Christians have one God, one faith, one way of salvation, which is by Christ— in short, one church. Therefore, they also have the self-same sacraments, except that ours are given under other signs; and through the revelation of the Sun of righteousness (I mean Christ), they are made more lightsome and manifest. I further say that the scripture witnesses that the sacraments of the old Testament and ours are of the same force, insomuch that Paul calls those who are baptized circumcised, and those who are circumcised baptized. And he also teaches that our fathers ate that spiritual food which we eat, and drank of that spiritual drink — that is, the rock. But then he adds: "And that rock was Christ." The words of the apostle are well known, and are read in 1Cor 10.4. The same apostle, in the second chapter to the Colossians, says: "In Christ you are complete (or made perfect); in whom also you are circumcised with a circumcision made without hands, by putting off the body of the flesh, subject to sin, by the circumcision of Christ; buried with him in baptism," etc. Col 2.11-12

What, I pray you, can be said more plainly? "Circumcision made without hands," is the circumcision of Christians, which is baptism. But in the former place to the Corinthians, we must mark (as I put you in mind elsewhere ¹) that to be baptized into Moses is not the same as being baptized into Christ. For to be baptized into Moses is the same as if he had said, to be baptized by Moses, or through the ministry of Moses. For it is manifest that Moses brought the people who were committed to his charge, to God only.

You will read the same in many places in Aurel. Augustine. No matter how our adversaries may foist on Augustine this difference between the sacraments of the old law and ours, it is of their own introducing. For in Lib. ii. Cont. Literas Petil. cap. 27, he says: "The sacraments of the Jews were different from ours in the outward tokens, but in the things which were signified, they were equal and all one." ² Also Tract, in Joan. 26. upon this place, "[Christ] is the bread which came down from heaven, Manna signified this bread; the altar of God signified this bread. Those were sacraments. They are diverse in signs, but equal in the thing signified."

You may read similar words in Lib. xix. Contra Faustum Manicheum, cap. 13, 16, 17. ³ And again, Tract, in Joan. 45:

"Before the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, when he came humbly in the flesh, there were just and righteous men, who so believed in him that was then to come, as we believe in him that now has come. The times were changed, but not the faith;" ⁴ and so forth.

And shortly after:

"All is one faith, in diverse signs — it is as diverse in signs, as it is in words, because words change their sounds by the times; and truly words are nothing but signs. For they are words in what they signify; but if we remove the signification from the word, it is an empty sound. Therefore, all words are significations. Did not those who ministered those signs in the old law, then believe those things which we now believe were prophesied before and by them? No doubt they did believe them; but they believed they would come, and we believe they have come." ⁵

Also upon the 77th Psalm:

"They had the same food and drink in their sacraments, which we have in ours; they were the same in signification, but not in likeness. For the self-same Christ was figured to them in the rock, but manifested to us in the flesh. But God was not well pleased with all of them. All truly ate one spiritual food, and drank one spiritual drink, which signified some spiritual thing. But God had no delight in all of them. And though the sacraments were common to all, yet grace was not common to all, which is the pith of the sacraments. Even as faith is now revealed today, which then was hidden, the fountain of regeneration is common to all who are baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost — but the inward grace, of which these are the sacraments, and by which the members of Christ with their head are born anew, is not common to all." ¹

This far from Augustine. He teaches that the signs or sacraments are not unequal or unlike, for those who have the same faith and religion; but whatever difference there is, rests in the diversity of the times; otherwise they do not differ.

Now that I have made an end of the similarity and difference between the sacraments of the old and new Testaments, and receiving an opinion that the sacraments of the new law confer or give grace of themselves, let us also consider what manner of thing this is.

First; touching the word "grace," I will give you these few things to note. Grace is the favour and good-will of God, with which God the Father embraces us for Christ's sake, purifies, justifies, and endues us with his good gifts, and saves us. For the writings of the apostles plainly call it grace by which we are saved and justified, or made righteous,² by faith in Jesus Christ. It is written about this grace, "I do not make the grace of God of no effect; for if righteousness comes by the law, then Christ died in vain." ^{Gal 2.21} It is written about this grace, "Christ has become unprofitable to us: for as many as are justified by the law, have fallen from grace." ^{Gal 5.4} Of this grace it is written: "If it comes by grace, then is it not of works; for otherwise grace is no longer grace." ^{Rom 11.6} What, is not the Son of God himself called "the grace and gift of God?" John 4 and Titus 2nd chapter.

Now to confer grace:³ what is it other than to give, or frankly and freely bestow something on a man, which he did not have before? Therefore, if the sacraments give grace to those who receive them, then truly they give those things which they signify, to those who did not have them — I mean, Christ with all his gifts.

That is to say, they make them pleasant and acceptable to God; they justify and save; yes, and they do that of themselves — insomuch as they are said to have received virtue to sanctify from the passion of Christ, and not just to signify, help, commend, or further. Yes, and they also attribute this receiving of grace to our work, by which we receive the sacrament. But I will now declare how contrary this doctrine is to the truth of his holy prophets and apostles.

It was an old error among the Jews, that sacraments justified. It comes from this: that the holy prophets of God, reasoning and rebuking the people of God committed to their charge for still savouring false opinions, cried that their labour which they bestowed upon their ceremonies and sacrifices was in vain; and that God is delighted with faithful obedience, with faith, I say, charity, innocence, and also with true godliness. Among them, Jeremiah says:

"Thus says the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, Heap up your burnt-offerings with your sacrifices, and eat the flesh: for when I brought your fathers out of Egypt, I spoke no word to them about burnt-offerings and sacrifices; but this I commanded them, saying, Hearken and obey my voice, and I will be your God, and you shall be my people; so that you walk in all the ways which I have commanded you, that you may prosper."

A similar passage is found in Isaiah, first chapter. The Lord has not despised, nor have his holy prophets contemned, all sacrifices in general, since He himself instituted them by Moses; but they sought to suppress and beat down that false opinion and vain confidence which the people had in sacrifices. It is a vain confidence and a false opinion to believe and think that sacrifices of themselves, and for our works' sake, make us acceptable to God; for faith makes us acceptable to God by the Messiah. And the Lord did not institute sacraments or sacrifices so that, being offered, they might give grace, or justify us; but to be witnesses of the grace of God; and that his people might be kept by them, and drawn ¹ in due order, from idols and heathenish worshippings, and led to Christ the high priest and only sacrifice (or oblation) for the whole world.

³ grace, not in Lat.

For these were certain schoolings or exercises, as Paul proves by saying: "The law was our schoolmaster until Christ, that we should be justified through faith; but after faith has come, we are no longer under a school-master." Gal 3.24-25 Therefore the sacrifices of the old law ² did not give grace to those who sacrificed, nor did they work their justification; but they were tokens and testimonies that God sanctifies and justifies by and through the sacrifice appointed before all worlds ³ — the Messiah, I mean; bringing us to faith in Him, as a schoolmaster guiding us.

And truly, when the apostles preached the pure and sound doctrine of the gospel — that the faithful are saved by the only grace of God in Christ — this ancient error of their elders had taken such deep root in the minds of the Jews, that even those who had received Christ, stood in contention nevertheless, that Christ was not able to fully sanctify and justify without the help of the Jewish sacrifices. The apostles, disputing against them with great gravity and the invincible power of the Spirit, plainly proved that a Christian, without any observations of the ceremonial law, nor with the help of any works, by the mere and free grace and mercy of God in Christ alone,⁴ is sanctified, purified, justified, and saved. This undoubtedly is the helm and stern (as commonly said) of the evangelists' and apostles' doctrine. Doubtless, whoever denies it, has no part in the inheritance of Christ and his gospel. Nor is it obscure or doubtful, which I just presented in these few words; for who is ignorant of that memorable dissension between the chief apostles of Christ, Paul and Barnabas, kindled against those who taught that, "unless the Christians were circumcised in the manner of Moses, they could in no way be saved?" Act 15.1 Against them, Peter makes this conclusion: "That our hearts are purified by faith; and we who believe ⁵ will be saved by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." Act 15.9,11

It is true that the adversaries would bring back what the apostles abrogated and took away. But in the meantime, it is also undoubtedly true that the apostles strongly battered and beat down flat to the ground as it were, their adversaries' bulwark in defence of sacraments that purify. They used no other forcible engine than this: "That we who believe shall be saved by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ." And even though they add in almost every place, "Not by the law, not by ceremonies or other ritual observations" do we think they would admit that sacraments have such power and virtue, seeing that they are comprehended under rites and ceremonies, and are so accounted? ⁶ Christian faith attributes the grace of God, remission of sins, sanctification, and justification, fully and wholly to the free mercy of God, and to the merit of Christ's passion. Indeed, Christian faith attributes these spiritual benefits to [God's grace] in such a way,⁷ that beside it, nothing at all is allowed to take part with it. Therefore, even though Lombard says that

"sacraments have received power to confer or give grace by the merit of the passion of Christ;" ¹ it is of his own forging. For Christ does not give his glory to anyone, either saint or mortal man, much less to a creature without life; even so, he who believes that he is fully justified by the death and resurrection of the Lord, seeks no further grace and righteousness in any other thing than in Christ alone, upon whom he stays — whom also by faith, he feels in his heart or mind, already exercises His force by the Holy Ghost. For to this pertain these things in the gospel: "Go in peace, your faith has saved you:" ^{Luk 7.50} and also: "He that drinks of this water shall thirst again; but whoever drinks of that water which I shall give him, shall never thirst," etc. ^{Joh 4.13-14} To this pertains the saying of Paul also: "Therefore being justified by faith, we are at peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ: by whom also we had an entrance by faith unto this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God." ^{Rom 5.1-2}

I am not ignorant of the crafty sleights of some, who imagine there is a certain general faith, and also a special faith. They call general faith, that by which we believe that we are truly justified by the death and resurrection of Christ. But they call special faith, that by which we believe that by the sacraments, and by our own works, the gifts of God are applied particularly to every one of us, one by one. But to what purpose was it, being in a land where they might be fed with manna, to look back to the pottage-pots and (unsavoury) leeks of Egypt? ^{Num 11.5} What, I ask you, do Christians have to do with the distinctions of subtle sophisters? Or how will they prove this distinction of theirs to us? Truly, there is but one faith; and it is no different in the use of the sacraments, than it is without the use of them. Without the use of them, we believe that we are sanctified by the death and resurrection of Christ. In baptism and the Lord's Supper, we practise no other faith than that by which we believe we are purged from our sins by the grace and mercy of Christ — and that by his body given for us, and his blood shed for us, we are redeemed from death, and become heirs of eternal life. It is not the sacraments, but faith through the Holy Ghost, that applies these things to us. All the writings of the apostles witness to this; but such feigned glosses obscure and darken them. To be short; there is one God and Saviour of all, one salvation, one redemption and purging, one faith by which we receive salvation offered to us by God in Christ through the Holy Ghost. This is declared or preached to us in the word by the minister, and is represented and sealed by the sacraments.

And now, who does not know that Paul the apostle, in all his writings only labours to prove that those who believe are justified by faith in the Lord Jesus, and not by any works? Again, who is ignorant that the receiving and celebration of sacraments are also counted among our works? I will add this: that sacraments do not give what they do not have themselves: and they do not have grace, righteousness, and heavenly gifts — therefore, they do not give them.

But from this springs up another disputation for us to handle: Whether the grace of God and a certain heavenly power is put or included in the sacraments, and is as it were, contained in them, so that it might be conveyed from them into the receivers?

The whole rabble of priests and monks, in word as well as in deed, have betrayed themselves, in thinking that heavenly grace is included in the bare signs; yes, and that God himself is comprehended in them. From no other fountain did their careful disputations spring concerning what the mouse eats, when it eats the sacrament of the body of Christ.¹ Pope Innocent, Libro quarto, De Sacramento altaris, Capite undecimo, says:

"Miraculously the substance of bread returns again; not that bread which was turned into flesh; but it comes to pass that instead of it, other bread is miraculously created, which bread is eaten," etc.²

Behold, here is a certain witty and miraculous kind of divinity. On purpose, I pass over many others of this kind.

Add to this, that by crossings and certain secret words, gestures, and breathings, they consecrate the water of baptism; all of which they beautify with the name blessing. And among other things, they sing this:

"God, by the secret mixture of his light, make fruitful this water prepared to regenerate men with; that, being sanctified and born again of the immaculate womb of the heavenly fountain, it may come forth a new creature. Let this holy and innocent creature be free from all the assaults of the adversary. Let him not entrap it in his snare. Let it become a living fountain, a regenerating water, a purifying river; that all who are dipped in this wholesome laver, the Holy Ghost working in them, may attain to the excellence of perfect purification. Therefore, you creature of water, I bless (or conjure) you, by the living God, by the true God, by the holy God, by the God who in the beginning separated you by his word from the dry land," etc.³

Again breathing three times on the water, he quickly utters these words: "You, Lord, bless with your word these waters which make request to you, that beside their natural cleanness which in washing they may give to our bodies, they may also be effectual to purify our souls." Then the priest takes a burning wax candle, and puts it three times in the water consecrated to baptism, saying: "Let the power of the Holy Ghost come down into this plentiful fountain." He adds: "And let it make the whole substance of this water fruitful with the fruit of regeneration."⁴ And so forth.

All these things they understand and expound to be spoken literally and without tropes or figures; which evidently enough declares what these men attribute to holy or consecrated water, and how they think that the holy things themselves are contained in the signs., Bonaventura has wonderfully busied himself about this matter. In his writing, In 4. Maaistri Distinct. Quest. 3. among other things at length he says:

"We must not say by any means that grace is contained substantially in the sacraments, as water in a vessel, or as a medicine in a box; indeed, to understand it so, is erroneous. But they are said to contain grace, in that they signify grace; and because, unless there is a lack on the part of the receiver, grace is always given in them: so that you must understand that grace is in the soul, and not in the visible signs. For this cause, they are called also vessels of grace.

They may be also called vessels in another way; because, as that which is in a vessel is not part of it, nor comes from it, and yet nevertheless is drawn out of it; so grace comes neither of nor by the sacraments, but springs from the eternal fountain, and is drawn out from there by the soul in the sacraments. And as a man, when he would have liquor, goes straight to the vessel; so he that seeks after the liquor of grace, and does not have it, must have recourse to the sacraments."

This far from Bonaventura, who rightly referred grace to God, the fountain of all good things. I wish he had also more purely and simply set down the rest. He also said ² truly, that the soul of man was the seat or receptacle of grace and of the gifts of God, and not things that are without sense. For the holy scripture teaches everywhere, that the mind of man, not any element, or whatever is forged by man's device, is the mansion-place of the grace of God; and that it is not to be sought for, or worshipped as included in any insensible thing. "If the heaven of heavens," says Solomon, "is not able to contain you, how then should this house do it, that I have built?" ^{1Kng 8.27} The most constant martyr of Christ, Stephen, alluding to this, says: "He that is highest of all does not dwell in temples made with hands, as the prophet says: Heaven is my seat, and earth is my footstool. What house will you build for me? says the Lord; or which is the place of my rest? has not my hand made all these things?" ^{Act 7.48-50} That great apostle of Christ, Paul, following this says: "God who made the world and all that are in it, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, does not dwell in temples made with hands; nor is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, seeing that He himself gives to all life, and breath, and all things," etc. ^{Act 17.24-25}

Christ himself in the gospel speaks more expressly about this: "The hour comes when you will worship the Father neither in this mountain, nor at Jerusalem. But the hour comes, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth." ^{Joh 4.21,23} The faithful therefore lift up the eyes of their mind from earthly and visible things, to heavenly things. Whereupon our godly forefathers, when they celebrated the Lord's Supper, heard that saying repeated or sung to them, which is most agreeable to such holy mysteries, "Lift up your hearts:" all the people answered together, "We lift them up unto the Lord." Does not the very gross absurdity of the thing, plainly prove that grace is not contained in the signs? For if you understand grace to be the favour and good-will of God; the pardon and forgiveness of sin; the cleansing and justifying of the believers; and finally, the gifts and graces of the Spirit; then what, I ask you, can be imagined that is more absurd and senseless than this: that such excellent things should be kept enclosed in water, bread, and wine? The signs, truly, have no need of grace, nor any pardon and forgiveness of sins. To what purpose, then, should grace be contained within sacraments? What profit, I ask you, would redound to men? Or who does not know that all the institutions of God were ordained for the commodity of man? Or should we rather say that grace is therefore kept included within the sacraments, so that from there it might be conveyed to us by channels? But the scripture does not speak in that way. For grace, as it has now been often repeated, is the favour and good-will of God, by which he himself — not by sensible matters, but of his own accord and through his power and might — is brought to us. These things are spiritual; and therefore they are brought to pass by the gift and mediation of the Holy Ghost. God is joined to us by his Spirit; and we are coupled to him by faith, through the gift of the Holy Ghost. This is everywhere to be seen in the writings of the evangelists and apostles.

Moreover, the words of the canon of the council of Nicaea are not to be understood in such a gross and rude manner: "Our baptism is not to be considered with bodily eyes, but with the eyes of the mind. You see water; weigh the heavenly force which lies hidden in the water," etc. ³ For it is a sacramental statement, which truly everybody at that time understood — just as also today, it is not a new or hard kind of thing to say that in the seal there is faith and truth; in a marriage-ring there is the faith and love of wedlock; or in a sceptre and crown, is the king's authority. For no man is so foolish to think that, by using this kind of phrase, he affirms that the things themselves are contained and enclosed in the signs. Every man knows this kind and manner of speech.

To this also pertains that John the Baptist baptized in the river Jordan; and that the apostles themselves also baptized with water. They neither consecrated nor prepared it with any enchantments, breathings, or crossings, such that it might receive the grace of God into it, and make those who are baptized, partakers of it. The Ethiopian, in the Acts of the Apostles, saw a fountain. It was not mingled with oil, nor consecrated with any holy charms, nor moreover prepared with any breathings or putting in wax-candles or pictures of crosses. Nevertheless, he said to Philip the apostle: "See, here is water; what keeps me from being baptized?" ^{Act 8.36} Philip required of him only faith in the Lord Jesus; and upon his confession, he immediately baptized him. No consecration of the fountain was first provided for, by which somehow he might call down the grace of the Holy Ghost and the power of regeneration into the water; and might immediately apply it to the purifying of the Ethiopian.

And if we proceed to include the grace of God within the elements, and include the things themselves within the signs which represent them, who does not see how great the danger is, especially among the simple sort? For we would give them an occasion for idolatry, and to cling to the visible signs. They would also require and ask from these things, what should be asked only from God, the author of all goodness, with minds lifted up into heaven.

For though it is objected that by a certain heavenly covenant, it is appointed by God that sacraments should have grace in themselves, and should from themselves, as by pipes, convey abroad the water of grace to those who are thirsty — this is alleged without warrant from the scripture, and it is repugnant to true religion. We think this is sufficiently apparent by those things which have been handled and disputed up to here; yet we also add the following.

First of all, the holy and elect people of God are not, then, partakers of the grace of God and heavenly gifts when they receive the sacraments; for they enjoy these things before they are partakers of the signs. For it is plainly declared to us that Abraham our father was justified before he was circumcised. And who does not gather from this, that justification was not exhibited and given to him by the sacrament of circumcision; rather, the righteousness which he possessed by faith before, was sealed and confirmed to him by the sacrament? Moreover, who will not gather from this that we, who are the sons of Abraham, are justified in no other manner than it appears our father was justified; and that our sacraments work no further in us than they did in him — especially since the nature of the sacraments of the people of the old Testament, and the nature of ours, is the same? I will speak of this a little later, more at large, when I expound the passage from the apostle in the fourth chapter to the Romans.

The eunuch, of whom I just spoke from the Acts, as he journeyed and saw water, said to Philip: "See, here is water; what keeps me from being baptized? Philip said to him; If you believe with all your heart, you may. And he answered and said, I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." It then immediately follows: "And they both went down into the water, and he baptized him." ^{Act 8.36-38} The eunuch (says the evangelist) believed with all his heart, that is to say, he believed truly and without deceit.

Now let us see what the scripture says concerning such a faith. St. John, the apostle and evangelist, says: "Whoever believes that Jesus is Christ, is born of God." ^{1Joh 5.1} He again says: "Whoever confesses that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwells in him, and he in God." ^{1Joh 4.15} Also Paul, that elect vessel and doctor of the Gentiles, says: "If you acknowledge with your mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you shall be saved." ^{Rom 10.9} And again, St. John says in his epistle: "He that believes on the Son of God has the witness in himself. And this is the record, how that God has given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that has the Son has life, and he that has not the Son has not life." ^{1Joh 5.10-12} Briefly, from all these things we gather this: the eunuch believed before he received baptism; therefore, before he received baptism, he was born of God in whom he dwelled, and God dwelled in him. He was just and acceptable in the sight of God; moreover, he also had life in himself; and therefore the baptism which followed did not give to the eunuch, what he had before; but it became a testimony to him of the truth, and a seal of the righteousness which came by faith;¹ and it assured him of the continuance and increase of God's gifts.

In the same manner we read of Cornelius the centurion in the same Acts of the Apostles: that by believing the preaching of the apostle Peter, he also received the Holy Ghost in a visible shape, as the apostles did at Jerusalem in the day of Pentecost; and when Peter knew it, he said: "Can any man forbid water, so that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Therefore, just as Cornelius with his household received the Holy Ghost before they were baptized, it is manifest that he did not obtain the Holy Ghost as if first given by baptism, or with baptism. Again, we read in the Acts of the Apostles: "Those who gladly received the word of Peter, were baptized." ^{Act 2.41} Therefore, before they were baptized by Peter, they had obtained the grace of God through faith.

Why, I ask you, do we baptize our infants? Is it because they believe with their heart and confess with their mouth? I think not. Do we not baptize them because God has commanded them to be brought to him? Because he has promised that he will be our God, and the God of our seed after us? To be short, because we believe that God, out of his mere grace and mercy, in the blood of Jesus Christ, has cleansed and adopted them, and appointed them to be heirs of eternal life? Therefore, baptizing infants for these causes, we abundantly testify that nothing is first given to them in baptism; but that what they had before is sealed and confirmed by it. ²

Let us also join to these things a testimony of the Supper of the Lord. The apostle, teaching how the godly should prepare themselves to come to the Lord's table, says: "Let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of this bread and drink of this cup." ^{1Cor 11.28} But to examine or prove signifies to search, as much as we can, the heart, or mind, and to sift one's conscience through diligent inquisition. And God is said to prove our hearts. ^{Psa 139.23} And the same apostle wills us "to prove what is the good and acceptable will of God." ^{Rom 12.2} But this proof cannot be without knowledge and judgment; and the knowledge and judgment of Christians is faith. Therefore, whoever proves himself before he comes to the supper, has faith; and if he has faith, then he does not lack those things that are coupled with faith. And therefore, those heavenly benefits are not first received in the supper, but thanks are given for those already received.³ I have hereby shown and proved, I suppose, that sacraments do not confer grace.

I know well enough that those who are persuaded that sacraments give grace, and contain within them the things signified, object that we evacuate the sacraments and make them of no effect; that we teach that the faithful receive in them, or by them, nothing but bare water, and bare bread and wine; and by that means, they say, God is accused by us of falsehood and lying.

² Bullinger is clear that baptism does not save; nor is every child born of a believer elect by birth (or by blood). That would contradict Rom 4.11-13, and his own argument. Therefore, whatever the infant has – whether it is election and resurrection unto life, or resurrection unto judgment (Joh 5.29) – is sealed and confirmed by baptism, and acknowledged by it. Baptism is often said to bring the infant under the covenant of grace. But this grace is the blessing of being born into a Christian home and church, to be raised in the fear and admonition of the Lord; it is not saving grace. See also p. v.323.

³ pro acceptis, Lat.: for them as received.

We briefly answer this: If they set void or empty things against full things, so that those signs are void or empty which do not include the things signified in them, then truly, I would rather confess they are void than full.

But if by void or empty, they mean profane or unholy things — that is to say, those things which do not differ from profane signs — and if by bare, they mean things of no force; then we openly profess that we have sacraments which are holy, and not profane; effectual, and not without force; garnished from above, not naked; and therefore they are full, not void or empty. For they are holy things and not profane, because they are instituted by God, and for godly men, not for profane persons. They are effectual, and not without force. For in the church, with the godly and faithful, they work the same effect and end to which they are ordained by God (more about this later). Those things which have the word of God itself, with which they are most beautifully adorned, are also worthily said to be beautified and adorned by God, and are not bare things. And therefore, they are also full and not empty sacraments, because they have those things which make a perfect sacrament.

We will repeat here the parables, or similitudes (which we also alleged above, mostly treating consecration), with the intent to give clearer light to this treatise. While wax is not applied to letters patents ¹ or other public instruments for confirmation and witness' sake, it is common, void, and bare wax; that is to say, it is nothing but wax. But once it is sealed and fastened to those public instruments, it is then neither void nor bare wax; for it is called the testimony of the truth. The coat of arms of a prince or any commonwealth, is a bare sign if painted in a window or on a wall. But if it is fastened to writings, or set to letters, there is a great difference between this and the other; for now it declares and witnesses the will of the prince or of the commonwealth. It is then so esteemed among men, that whoever defaces it, or sets it to any other charter, contrary to the will of the prince and commonweal, is accounted guilty of counterfeiting and high treason. A stone is bare and void when it is not set as a marker or boundary of fields. That is to say, it is a common stone, for which it is not an offence to tread it underfoot, or to remove it from its place. But being set to part the boundaries of a field, it is no longer a bare and void stone, but a witness of lawful division and just possession. To then move this stone out of its place, is accounted a heinous offence. Hos 5.10

And therefore, water, bread, and wine, without the institution and use of the sacrament, are nothing but water, bread, and wine. But being used in the celebration of the sacrament, they differ very far from what they were before; they are sacraments signed of Christ by his word, ordained for the salvation of the faithful.

Therefore, those who partake of the sacraments "do not receive nothing," as these men say, unless the institution of God is to be esteemed as nothing. He instituted sacraments to be testimonies of his grace, and seals of the truth of his promises. I will shortly declare this more at large. Therefore, just as God is true and cannot lie, so the seals of his promises are most true. He has promised that he will be ours, and that in Christ he will communicate himself to us, with all his gifts. Therefore, of a certainty, he shows himself to be such, and communicates himself to us. Although, he does not first do it when we receive the sacraments, as if he poured himself into us by them, like conduit pipes, or was included in them, as in vessels. For at the very beginning of the world, God promised his grace to us; and as soon as we first believed, he began to show himself as such to us, and shows himself more and more through the whole course of life. We receive him and comprehend him spiritually and by faith. Therefore, when we partake of the sacraments, he proceeds to communicate himself to us in a special manner; that is to say, as proper to sacraments. And so, in the celebration of the sacraments, we who before were made partakers of Christ, continue and strengthen that communion or fellowship spiritually and by faith, outwardly sealing it to ourselves by the signs.¹

Now, who would then say that those who think this way about the sacraments, and partake of them by this faith, have nothing but empty shows, and receive nothing in them — though we neither include grace in the signs, nor derive it from them? If a man has any other opinion of God and his ordinances, that would not be falsehood in God, nor should God be accused of untruth. This is like someone charging a just man with a lie, because he did not perform what his accuser looked for, when meantime the accused man did not promise the thing looked for. Rather, through his corrupt and false opinion, the accuser only dreamed that it was promised to him. And thus far, by occasion, I have shown what agreement and difference there is between the sacraments of the old and new Testaments, and that our sacraments neither confer nor contain grace.

Now we return to what we began; I mean, to the principal ground of this disputation. As we have taught what sacraments do not work, so we may now set down at length what they work indeed. That is to say, we may now expound what is the power, end, and lawful use of the sacraments, for which they are ordained by God. We handled the reasons why they were instituted, in the beginning of the sixth sermon.² But now I will add other things which pertain to this purpose, and treat each thing by itself, more fully and at large.

The chief end of sacraments is this: that they are testimonies to confirm the truth, by which the Lord in his church even visibly testifies, that the things now uttered by preaching the gospel, and by the promises assured to the faithful from the beginning of the world, are in every point so brought to pass, and are so certainly true, as to be declared and promised in the word of truth. Even so, baptism is the heavenly and public witness in the church of Christ, by which the Lord testifies, that it is he who receives men freely into favour, and who cleanses them from all blemishes, and to be short, who makes us partakers and heirs of all his goodness. For in the same way, circumcision in times past was a public and heavenly testimony that it is God who purges and adopts us. For Moses says, "The Lord your God will circumcise your heart, and the heart of your seed, that you may love the Lord your God with all your heart," etc. ^{Deu 30.6}

In the same way, the Lord himself, instituting the holy supper in his church, openly bears witness by the present signs, that his body was certainly given for us, and his blood truly shed for the remission of our sins; and also that he is that living food which feeds us to eternal life. Therefore we read in Chrysostom's 83rd Homily upon Matthew, these words:

"As in the old law, so here in the same way, he has left with us a memory of the mysteries, stopping and bridling the mouths of heretics by it. For when they ask, By what does it appear that Christ was offered? and many other mysteries, we allege these things, and thereby shut their mouths. For if Jesus is not dead, whose representation or sign is this sacrifice?"³

³ Chrysost. Hom. in Mat. lxxxn. (al. lxxxiii.) Tom. vii. p. 783. Par. 1727.

You perceive, I suppose, how this writer brings against heretics the sacrament of the supper as the testimony of truth — that is to say, of the Lord's true death. ¹Cor 11.26 Therefore, as the gospel is called a witness, and the preachers of the gospel are called witnesses, so too we call sacraments witnesses of the same truth which, even though they are silent, yet they are nevertheless visible. On this account, St. Augustine calls them "visible words." ¹ For the preaching of the gospel, consisting of words heard with the ears, is a speaking witness; but sacraments, which consist of signs, seen with the eyes, are speechless witnesses — remnants and remembrances of the preaching of the gospel.

Indeed, sacraments were instituted by God to that end: that they might visibly confirm ² for us the ready good will of God toward us, and also the preaching of the gospel, and all the promises of life and salvation; and that they should be, as it were, seals set and fixed to the gospel and promises made by God, which might testify and confirm that faith in Christ is true righteousness.

What I have said, I will confirm by the writings of the apostles. But I taught a little earlier that the sacraments of the old Testament and of the new have but one ground, only a few things excepted; so that now by very good right, comparing both together, we may estimate and utter what the force ³ and use of our sacraments is. Paul therefore says to the Romans, fourth chapter:

"We say that faith was imputed to Abraham for righteousness. How was it then imputed? When he was circumcised, or when he was uncircumcised? Not when he was circumcised, but when he was uncircumcised: after he received the sign of circumcision, as the seal of the righteousness of the faith which he had when he was uncircumcised, that he should be the father of all those who believe, not being circumcised, that righteousness might be imputed to them also; and be the father of circumcision, not only to those who are of the circumcised, but also to those who walk in the steps of the faith of our father Abraham, which he had when he was uncircumcised."

Rom 4.9-12

All these are Paul's words. Among them, first of all, some words are fit ⁴ to be expounded; then we must seek the sense and meaning of the apostle's words: and last of all, we must apply them to our purpose, touching the sacrament.

The apostle uses two words here: the sign and the seal. Signum, the word for sign, is more general and stretches very far; but a seal is a word that properly belongs to sacraments, which are seals and confirmations. For not all signs seal; the duty of some is accomplished by mere signification; but properly, σφραγιζειν (sphragizein) is to seal in order to assure and confirm our faith or credit. Thus σφραγίς (sphragis) is a seal which is set to keep and confirm our faith and promise, without any danger of deceit. Here, as very often elsewhere, the Lord imitates the manner of men. For by setting our seals to our writings, covenants, and faithful promises, we men tend to confirm what we said before by word. It appears plainly by these testimonies of the scriptures, that this has always been the cause for instituting and using seals.

When the children of Israel under Ezra made a covenant with the Lord, they later set down their covenant in writing, and sealed the writing as a testimony of the truth, as in Nehemiah, 9th chapter. ^{Neh 9.38} And in Haggai, 2nd chapter, you may read: "I will take you O my servant, Zerubbabel, you son of Shealtiel," says the Lord, "and make you like a sign or sealing ring; for I have chosen you;" ^{Hag 2.23} as if to say, All men will certainly learn that the continuance of the posterity of the Messiah consists and remains in the son of Shealtiel. Jeremiah thus writes in chapter 22: "As surely as I live, says the Lord, if Coniah, the son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, were the signet or seal on my right hand, yet will I pluck you there." ^{Jer 22.24} This is as much as saying, Though you were the one in whom I would keep my promises, yet you will be led captive into Babylon. This agrees with what Matthew wrote of the Jews: "So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, and sealed the stone" (without doubt, against deceitful practices); "they also appointed a watch." ^{Mat 27.66} It therefore appears by these testimonies, what purpose seals serve.

These things being thus declared, let us now diligently search out the counsel and meaning of the apostle's words. Paul shows, that justification happens to men by the power and virtue of no works, of no ceremonies or sacraments, but by the sole merit of Christ, through faith. To prove this, he brings the example of Abraham, about whom the scripture has pronounced: "Abraham believed God, and it was imputed to him for righteousness." There he gathers that Abraham was justified by faith; yes, that it was imputed to him for righteousness. He most strongly reasons, both by the word or force of imputation, and by the whole statement of Moses, showing that righteousness is imputed by faith, through grace. To this he also joins a testimony out of David, touching righteousness by imputation. I handled that place in the first sermon of the fourth decade.¹ Then he returns again to the example of Abraham, and applies to his purpose, that place alleged out of Genesis, weighing the circumstances of the manner and time of his justification.

He says, "How was it then imputed? When he was circumcised, or when he was uncircumcised? Not when he was circumcised, but when he was uncircumcised." These things, truly, are plainer than to require any exposition. But because the Jew might object; "Why then, the institution and use of circumcision had no force, but was void, unprofitable, and vain; for if Abraham were justified before he was circumcised, how could circumcision profit him further? And if it brought nothing further, then surely it was superfluous and unprofitable: Paul, preventing that objection, answers: "And he received," he says, "the sign of circumcision, as the seal of the righteousness of faith," etc. Circumcision, Paul says, was neither void nor unprofitable. For even though it did not justify, nor cleanse, nor apply the gifts of God, yet it does not therefore follow that there is no further use for it: for it has another end. For he received the sign of circumcision as a certain seal of the righteousness of faith. That is to say, God instituted circumcision, so that it would be a seal to ratify and confirm — yes, and also to visibly testify — that faith is righteousness, and that men are justified through faith. I say that, in the same way that faith is imputed to them for righteousness, it was imputed to Abraham. For it follows: "That he might be the father of all who believe, though they are not circumcised, that righteousness might be imputed to them also;" and so forth.

Although these things are clearer than daylight, I will endeavour to open it still further by a parable. For suppose that a king, out of his favour and mere liberality, introduced some servant into his court, making him a partaker of all his goods. And moreover, he also extended this benefit to the children and posterity of the servant whom he adopted; and he immediately commanded that this covenant, privilege, and favour which was granted by living words, should also be put in writing. This he might confirm by setting his seal to it, to the end that it might be a sure testimony for his posterity, against all challengers, that this same favour and adoption pertains to them also, and that the prince should continue his good and favourable kindness to the posterity of the one whom he had adopted, if they also continue faithful to their prince.

Even in the same way, Almighty God, the King of kings, and most bountiful of all princes, freely and not by any merit of ours going before it, chooses Abraham, upon whom he bestows innumerable benefits, and to whom he offers a covenant, and participation in all goodness. And this is not to him only, but also to all his posterity, saying: "I, the Almighty ¹ God, will be your God, and the God of your seed after you; I will bless you and your seed; and in your seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed." ^{Gen 22.18} He also sanctified this privilege, confirming it with an oath. Later he commands that it be delivered to their children, hand to hand as it were, instead of in writing. And afterward, he wills his servants the prophets to set it down in writing. Last of all, he himself, by instituting circumcision, as it were setting his seal to the letters patents, or charter, would have it confirmed and ratified to those who would come after, to the end that they might certainly know that it also pertained to them.

Notwithstanding, it seems this must not be ignored by us, such that sacraments have a greater and more effectual force than any sealed charters can have. For privileges, which princes give, are written on parchment, and their seals are set to the written parchment; but God imprints his seal into the very bodies of those who are his. For he caused circumcision to be on the private member of man, by which his issue is raised, increased, and continued — that as a mark imprinted in their very bodies, it might more than seal and witness that the blessing and partaking of all good things pertains to the circumcised, if they abide faithful to the Lord God who entered into league with men. And therefore, very significantly, circumcision is called by Paul, not "the seal of righteousness," but "the seal of the righteousness of faith;" ^{Rom 4.11} —that is, a ratifying and assurance that faith is righteousness, that it is faith by which we are justified, that righteousness is due to those who believe, that God assuredly will bless the faithful and impute righteousness to them by faith, as he also imputed it to Abraham. ²

Now, since sacraments have similar reasoning, we may apply these things to our sacraments. Christ therefore, the anointed of the Lord, after he had redeemed the world from the power of Satan, by his guiltless and undeserved death, and now being ready to ascend into heaven to the Father, called his disciples about him, and said: "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures; he that believes and is baptized," etc. ^{Mar 16.15-16} The preaching of the gospel lays open and abroad, the great, precious, healthful, living, bountiful, royal, and divine privilege, that from being the children of the devil, we are made the children of God, the heirs (I say) of God, and joint-heirs with Christ, who by shedding his blood has purchased for us this inestimable salvation. None is excluded from this grace of God, except the one who excludes himself through disobedience, by his own corruption and fault. For touching the children and infants of believers, the Lord pronounces this in the gospel: "Suffer the young children to come to me, and do not forbid them; for of such is the kingdom of God." ^{Mat 19.14} And again:

"Truly I say to you, Unless you turn, and become as little children, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Whoever receives such a little child in my name, receives me. Take heed that you do not despise one of these little ones; for I say to you, that in heaven their angels always behold the face of my Father who is in heaven." ^{Mat 18.3,5,10}

Nor is it likely, now that Christ has come, that God is more unmerciful than he was before he came into the world. But then he said: "I will be your God, and the God of your seed after you." That is now of more force, therefore, since the Lord has come to seek and save that which was lost; ^{Luk 19.10} to be short, to pour out most liberally his grace and good gifts upon all flesh.

Therefore, that royal, ample, and divine privilege, comes first by the very preaching of our Lord Christ, and then by the doctrine of his apostles, revealed to the world. And afterward, the Lord so commanding, that same privilege was set down in writing by the apostles and evangelists. Now, the Lord himself added this sacrament as a sign and seal to his preaching and to the scripture, ordaining baptism in place of circumcision, because that was a bloody thing, and concluded as a sign of the blessed seed which was to come — for he was then revealed, and that [former sign] should thus be abrogated.

And baptism itself, succeeding circumcision, is also a seal of the righteousness of faith, an evidence and sealed charter,¹ that God assuredly cleanses us and makes us heirs of eternal life; and that the whole grace of the gospel pertains to those who are baptized, if they stand steadfast in true faith.

But you may say, the infants of Christians, who are to be baptized, do not believe. I grant it. No more did the infants of the Jews believe, who nevertheless were circumcised, and were in league with God, and made partakers of all good gifts. So that true godliness bids us attribute the same to our infants. When the offspring of the Jews grew in age and wickedly transgressed, they fell from the covenant of God. So likewise the infants of Christians, when they come to age and commit wickedness, fall from the grace of the gospel: yet they are received again by faithful repentance into the same grace from which they fell.²

But to our purpose. Baptism, the seal of the righteousness of faith, is not set to parchment, or to the writing of the gospel, but it is applied to the very bodies of the children of God, and is marked and imprinted in them as it were. For we are wholly dipped with our bodies, or wholly sprinkled with the water of baptism. This truly is a visible sealing, confirming that the true God is our God, who sanctifies and purifies; and that purification, and every good gift of God, is due to us as the heirs of God. And setting forth this matter, is that evident place of Paul, which in the Epistle to the Galatians, reads thus: "For you are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For all you who are baptized, have put on Christ;" and so forth. Gal 3.26-27

The supper of the Lord has like reasoning, which is also a seal of the righteousness of faith. For the Son of God died; and by his death he redeemed the believers; also, his body and blood are our food and drink unto eternal life. Truly, this singular and excellent privilege, given to the faithful, is declared and set down in writing by the apostles. But it is consecrated and sealed by the Lord himself, by the sacrament of his body and blood. By this, he seals in us an assurance that we are justified by faith in the death of Christ, and that all the good gifts of Christ are communicated to us, and that we are fed and strengthened by Christ.

Moreover, so that this sealing might be livelier, he does not set the seal to written parchment, but it is brought and given to be eaten by our bodies so that we might have a witness within ourselves, that Christ with all his gifts is wholly ours, if we persevere in faith. For the Lord himself says in the gospel: "He that eats me shall live by means of me." Joh 6.57 And he eats, who believes. For in the same place, the Lord says: "I am the bread of life; he that comes to me shall not hunger, and he that believes in me shall never thirst." Joh 6.35

² Bullinger is not saying that every time we sin, we fall from grace and lose our salvation. Rather, children of believers who have been baptized into grace, may demonstrate by habitual sinning, that they do not yet have saving grace. But they may then profess Christ, as an adult, and receive saving grace for the first time, sealing them in Christ. See note on p. v.313 (infant baptism), also iii.98-99 (assurance in adversity); and iv.318-319 (of the Holy Ghost). – WHG

From this we gather the sum of the whole matter: that the sacraments seal up the promises of God and the gospel. And therefore, this occurs so often as mention is made in the church of evidences or letters patents, or charters, and seals of the preaching of the gospel and the promises of God; and the whole mystery of our salvation is renewed and continued — that is, so often as those actions, instituted by God (i.e., sacraments), are celebrated in the church.

To this I think belongs what the faithful minister of Christ, Zwingli, says upon the sacraments, delivered in these words: "Sacraments bear witness of a thing that has been done. For all laws, customs, and ordinances, show their authors and beginnings. Therefore baptism, since it sets forth in signification the death and resurrection of Christ, it must be that those things were done indeed." ¹ These words are to be found In Expositione Fidei ad Regem Christianum. The same Zwingli, ad Principes Germaniae contra Eggium, says:

"That noble man, journeying into a far country, distributing bread and wine, far more lively and particularly gave himself to us when he said, 'This is my body,' than if he had said, 'This is a token or sign of my body;' even though he took away his natural body and carried it into heaven.

Nevertheless, in what pertains to faith and grace, he gives himself wholly by these words, as if he had said: Now I go to die for you, and after a while I will wholly depart from here; but I would not have you doubt my love and care toward you. However much I am, I am altogether yours. In witness of this, I commend to you a sign of my betraying and testament, with the intent that you might maintain the memory of me and of my benefits. So that, when you see this bread and this cup ministered to you in the supper of my remembrance, you may be mindful of me — that is, that I delivered myself up for you, as if you were to see me with your eyes face to face, as you now see me eating with you, and as you will later see me being led from you, to die for you." ²

Up to here I have recited Zwingli's words, and shortly I will repeat other words of his again. It is not that I stay myself upon them, or upon any testimonies of man, but that it may be made manifest that this man did not (as some have falsely thought) contemn the sacraments.

Meanwhile, we acknowledge these testimonies of the holy scripture: "And it is God who establishes us with you in Christ, and has anointed us: who has also sealed us, and has given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts;" 2Cor 1.21-22. And also: "After you believed, you were sealed with the holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, unto the redemption of the purchased possession, to the praise of his glory;" Eph 1.13-14. And again: "Do not grieve the holy Spirit of God, by whom you are sealed unto the day of redemption;" Eph 4.30

We acknowledge the truth of God to be sufficiently sound, true, and certain of itself; nor can we have a better confirmation from elsewhere, than out of God's word. But if our mind is not confirmed on every side, it wavers. God therefore frames himself according to our weakness, and upholds us by his sacraments, as much as possible. Yet such that we refer all the benefit of our confirmation to the Spirit himself and to his operation, rather than to the elements. Therefore, just as we attribute confirmation to doctrine and to teachers, even so we attribute sealing to the sacraments. We read in the Acts of the Apostles, chapters 14 and 18.: "The apostles returned and strengthened the disciples' souls again, and exhorted them to continue in the faith." Act 14.22 Again, in 1Thes 3.2: "We have sent Timothy (says Paul), our brother and minister of God, to confirm or establish you, and to comfort you concerning your faith." Nevertheless, unless the inward force of the Spirit draws and quickens the hearts of the hearers, the outward persuasion of the teacher, however forcible and vehement, will avail nothing. But if the Holy Spirit shows his might, and works with the word of the preacher, the souls of the hearers are most mightily strengthened. And so it stands with the mystery of the sacrament. For if the inward anointing and sealing of the Holy Ghost is lacking, the outward action will be considered but a toy to the unbelievers, nor will it work at all the sealing of the sacraments. But when faith, the gift of the Holy Ghost, goes before, the sealing of the sacraments is very strong and sure. Some also have said it very well: If our minds are destitute of the Holy Ghost, the sacraments no more profit us, than it does a blind man to look at the bright beams of the sun. But if our eyes are opened through the illumination of the Spirit, they are wonderfully delighted with the heavenly sight of the sacraments.¹ Zwingli, in Libello ad Principes Germaniae, says: "It does not offend us, if all the things which the Holy Ghost works are referred to the external sacrament, so long as we understand that they are spoken figuratively, as the fathers spoke."²

And although sacraments do not seal the promises to the unbelievers, because they mistrust them, nevertheless the sacraments were instituted by God that they might seal. The wicked and ungodly person does not receive the doctrine of the gospel; yet no man therefore gathers that this doctrine was not instituted by God to teach. There are some who will not give credit to a sealed charter; yet it does not therefore follow, that the sealed charter does not serve to assure or confirm one's faith. Therefore, since the doctrine of the gospel works nothing in someone who is obstinate and rebellious; and since the sacraments do not move someone who is profane and unholy, nor profit the wicked by any means — that does not come to pass through Him that instituted them, nor through the word and sacraments,³ but through the fault of the unbeliever. In the meantime, they are themselves instituted to profit and to seal, and to have their holy use and end in the holy. And this much I have said of the principal virtue of sacraments: that they are testimonies of God's truth and of his good will toward us, and are seals of all the promises of the gospel — sealing and assuring us that faith is righteousness, and that all the good gifts of Christ pertain to those who believe.

There is another end and use of sacramental signs: they signify, and in signifying, they represent. It would be superfluous to prove this by many testimonies, since it is most manifest to all men, at least by what we said before. Now, to signify is to show, to declare and point out anything, by signs and tokens. But to represent does not signify (as some dream) to bring, give, or make what was taken away at some point, corporally present again. It only resembles it in likeness, and by a certain imitation; it calls it back to mind again, and sets it before our eyes as it were. For we say that a son represents or resembles his father, when in some way he favours his father in expression and likeness of manners; so that someone who sees him may truly think that he sees the father present, as it were.

And in this manner, sacraments stir up and help our faith, while we see outwardly before our eyes, that which stirs up the mind, works in us,⁴ and warns us of our duty. Indeed, that very thing which we shortly before comprehended in our mind, is now, in a way, visibly offered to our senses in a similitude, parable, type, or figure — to be viewed and weighed in our mind, so that they might mutually help one another. The similitude, therefore, or the analogy of the sign to the thing signified, is by the way to be considered here.

⁴ excitat, Lat. — excites in us.

I told you before,¹ that analogy is an aptness, proportion, and a certain convenience of the sign to the thing signified; so that what is signified may be seen as in a mirror. The matter will be made manifest by examples.

The bountiful and gracious Lord, of his mere mercy, receives mankind into partaking of all his good gifts and graces, and he adopts the faithful, so that now they are not only joined in league with God, but are also the children of God. This thing is most evidently laid before the eyes of all men by representation, by the holy action of baptism in its stead (the sign or the very sign itself). For the minister of God stands at the holy font, to whom the infant is offered to be baptized; whom he receives and baptizes into the name, or in the name, of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, for we may find both "into the name" and "in the name". So that to be baptized "into the name of the Lord," is to be sealed into his virtue and power (for the name of the Lord signifies power), into the favour, mercy, and protection of God — yes, to be engrafted and fastened as it were, to be dedicated, and to be incorporated into God. To be baptized "in the name of the Lord," is to be baptized by the commandment or authority of God, I mean, by the commission or appointment of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. It is to be received into the company of the children of God, and to be accounted of God's household, so that those who are baptized are, and are to be called, Christians, and named with the name of God, Num 6.27 being called the children of God the Father, etc. Joh 1.12 His words therefore somewhat resemble what we read elsewhere, that "the name of God was called upon or over some one." ²

In a way, this is like saying that someone is called by the name of God — that is, to be called "the servant and son of God." Therefore, those who before, by grace, are invisibly received by God into the society of God, those self-same believers are now, by baptism, visibly admitted into the self-same household of God, by the minister of God. And therefore, at that time they also receive a name, that they may always remember that in baptism they gave up their names to Christ, and in like manner, they also received a name. In this manner, by a most apt analogy, the very sign resembles the thing signified. To be short, baptism is done by water; and water in men's affairs has a double use: for it cleanses filth and, as it were, renews man; it also quenches thirst, and cools someone in a heat. So too, it represents the grace of God when He cleanses his faithful ones from their sins, and regenerates and refreshes us with his Spirit. Beside this, the minister of Christ sprinkles, or rather pours on water — or being dipped, he takes them out of the water — by which it is signified that God very bountifully bestows his gifts upon his faithful ones. It also signifies that we are buried with Christ into his death, and are raised again with him into newness of life. Pharaoh was drowned in the gulf of the Red sea, but the people of God passed through it safe. For our old Adam must be drowned and extinguished; but our new Adam must be quickened day by day, and rise up again (out of the water). Therefore, the mortification and vivification of Christians is excellently represented by baptism.

Now, in the Lord's Supper bread and wine represent the very body and blood of Christ. The reason is this: just as bread nourishes and strengthens a man, and gives him the ability to labour, so the body of Christ, eaten by faith, feeds and satisfies the soul of man, and furnishes the whole man to all the duties of godliness. Just as wine is drink to the thirsty, and makes merry the hearts of men; so the blood of our Lord Jesus, drunk by faith, quenches the thirst of the burning conscience, and fills the hearts of the faithful with unspeakable joy. Therefore, in the action of the supper, the bread of the Lord is broken, and the wine is poured out.

For the body of our Saviour was broken, that is, he was by all means afflicted, and his blood gushed and flowed plentifully out of his gaping wounds. And we ourselves truly break with our own hands the bread of the Lord; for we ourselves are at fault that he was torn and tormented. Our sins wounded him, and we ourselves crucified him; that is to say, he was crucified for us, so that by his death he might deliver us from death. Furthermore, we take the bread into our hands, and we likewise take the cup into our hands, because he said, "Take, eat; take and divide it among you." We do not lay them aside or hide them, nor do we give them out to others: but once we have received them, we eat and drink them, swallowing them down into our bodies. Then afterward, we communicate and offer them to others. For those who lawfully celebrate the Lord's Supper, not only believe that Christ suffered, or that he suffers, for others and not for them; but they believe that Christ suffered for themselves. They believe that Christ does, and as it were, has already communicated all his gifts most liberally to them. Therefore, just as the sustenance of bread and wine, passing into the bowels, is changed into the substance of man's body; even so Christ, being eaten by the godly, by faith, is united to them by his Spirit — so that they are one with Christ, and he is one with them. Food that is plentifully prepared, daintily dressed, but only seen upon the table, does not assuage hunger. So too, if you hear Christ reverently preached to you, and you do not believe that Christ is yours, with all his good gifts, then neither the word, though reverently preached, nor the board, though abundantly stored, will profit you at all. And it does much for the reconciling, renewing, and maintaining of friendship, that we are all partakers of one bread, that we offer bread to our brethren, and that we drink of the cup which we receive at our brethren's hand. For upon no other cause, the ancient fathers seem to call the supper synaxis, a communion. But we will say something about that elsewhere.

This much have I brought for example's sake, touching the analogy of the sign and the thing signified. I would say more, but I trust to those who are diligent, that this is sufficient; for I have given occasion to think upon, and to find out more and greater things.

By this short treatise touching the analogy, I think it is plain that ¹ sacraments stir up and help the faith of the godly. For while our mind comprehends and considers the benefits of God, Christ's blessing, our redemption, and His other good gifts; and while it enjoys them with great pleasure of the spirit; and while it is glad and rejoices in them — sacraments are also outwardly given. This visibly represents those things to our eyes, and makes them enter into all our senses as it were, which the mind inwardly comprehends, considers, and meditates upon. ² This is because the whole action which consists of the words and the rite or ceremony, is counted with the sign. Our eyes see the signs and all things which are done in the whole action of the signs, all of which speak as it were: our ears hear the words and institutions of Christ. And by touching and tasting, we also feel and perceive how sweet and good the Lord is. So that now, the whole man as it were, both body and soul, is caught up into heaven; he feels and perceives that his faith is stirred up and helped — in short, that the fruit of faith in Christ is surpassing sweet and comfortable. All these things take place in those who believe. In those who do not believe, the signs remain as they are, without life. Therefore, these things are brought to pass by the virtue or power of faith, and by the Spirit working in the lawful use of the sacraments. Without faith and the Holy Ghost, they are not felt or perceived.

There is a like efficacy or force in the preaching of the word of God also. For when this word by parables, by examples, and by description, is presented to the hearers, if the Spirit and faith shine in their mind, they not only seem to hear things expounded by these, but to see them with their eyes. In consideration of this, I think, Paul said: "O foolish Galatians, who has bewitched you, that you should not believe the truth; to whom Jesus Christ was described before your eyes, and among you crucified?" Gal 3.1 For it is certain that Christ was nowhere either described or crucified among the Galatians. Paul therefore speaks of his plainness in preaching the word, by which things are indeed shown, and yet with such force and efficacy, that in a way, they were laid before their eyes. There is the same reasoning in sacraments; for that cause, those of old called them "visible words."

In his book, Ad Principes Germanice contra Eggium, Zwingli treats these things in this manner:

"When he feels his faith likely to fall, does a faithful man not desire to be upheld and restored to his place? And where in the whole world would he hope to find that more conveniently, than in the very actions of the sacraments, so much as belongs to all sensible things? For let it be, that all created things allure and provoke us to contemplate or behold God's majesty; yet all that allurement or provoking is silent: but in the sacraments, there is a lively provoking and speaking allurement. For the Lord speaks, and the elements also speak; and they speak and persuade that to our senses, which the word and Spirit speaks to our mind. However, all these visible things are nothing to this, unless the sanctification of the Spirit goes before." ¹

He handles these things more at large, first in his annotations on the 27th chapter of Jeremiah; and afterward, In Expositione Fidei ad regent Christianum.²

Furthermore, we read that St. Augustine, disputing against the Manicheans, Lib. xix. contra Faustum, cap. 11, said: "Men cannot be gathered together into any name of religion, either true or false, unless they are knit together in some fellowship of visible signs or sacraments," etc. ³

We acknowledge that this opinion of St. Augustine, fetched from the scriptures touching the sacraments, teaches that we are gathered and knit together by them into the unity of the body of Christ, and are separated from all other religions, fellowships, and assemblies. And moreover, we are bound by them, as by an oath, to the true worship of one God, and to one sincere religion. We openly profess that we agree and give our consent to this, with all those who are partakers of the sacraments. Chiefly to be marked, is that the gathering or knitting together into the unity of the body of Christ, has a double respect. For we are joined with Christ — he is in us, and we live in him — and we are coupled with all the members of Christ — namely, with Christ's faithful servants, by which I mean the catholic church itself. Furthermore, we are knit together with Christ in spirit and faith. But we are joined to the church, or to the members of Christ, by the unity of faith and of the Spirit, and by the bond of charity. All of these, truly are the inward gifts of the Spirit, which are freely bestowed on us by the Lord alone, and not by any creatures, nor by any elements.⁴ Sacraments, therefore, visibly graft us into the fellowship of Christ and his saints, who were invisibly grafted by his grace before we were partakers of the sacraments. But by receiving the sacraments, we now open and make manifest whose body we would be and are members of. The Lord, with his signs, or by his minister also,⁵ visibly marks us as his own household, and as his own people. We will more fully open and make manifest these things by the scriptures.

Those who were the people of God in times past, by the force of the covenant, by the grace, mercy, and promise of God, were visibly gathered together into one church, and knit together into one body, by circumcision. For the apostle St. Paul says to the Ephesians: "Therefore remember that you, who in times past were gentiles in the flesh, are called uncircumcision by those who are called circumcision in the flesh made with hands; that at that time, I say, you were without Christ, and were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise," etc.

Eph 2.11-12

By this it is easily understood how the Jews were distinguished by circumcision from other religions and fellowships, and for this cause, "circumcision" is used in another place for those who are circumcised, and why the name "uncircumcised" was reproachful. For those who were uncircumcised were considered ungodly and unclean persons, who had no fellowship, or part, or inheritance, with God and his saints. Something is said in my former sermons about baptism being ordained in place of circumcision. And also the apostle sets it out most plainly:

"As the body is one, and has many members, and all the members of the body, which is one, though they are many, are yet but one body; even so is Christ. For by one Spirit we are all baptized into one body, whether we are Jews or Gentiles, whether we are bond or free; and we have all been made to drink into one Spirit." ^{1Cor 12.12-13}

We are therefore knit together by the sacrament of baptism into the unity of the body of Christ; so that to have broken this bond, and to yield ourselves into another fellowship of religion and brotherhood, may worthily be called sacrilege and treason. The apostle seemed to refer to this when he asked the Corinthians: "Are you not baptized into the name of Christ?" ¹ declaring thereby that those who are baptized into the name of Christ have openly sworn and bound their faith before the church of Christ, so that now they neither can nor should rejoice in any other name than in the name of Christ, into whose household they are received by baptism. So we are separated from all other religions by baptism, and we are consecrated only to the Christian religion.

There is a similar place, in all points touching the supper of the Lord, in 1Cor 10. For when the apostle would declare to the Corinthians, that it is far from all godliness, unseemly, yes, and sacrilegious, that Christians should eat things offered to idols in the idols' temples, and be partakers of the gentiles' sacrifices, reasoning from the manner and nature of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. He says:

"Flee from idolatry; I speak as to those who have understanding; judge what I say. The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ? For we who are many are one bread, and one body, because we are all partakers of one bread.

Behold Israel according to the flesh; are not those who eat of the sacrifices, partakers of the altar? What am I saying then? That the idol is anything? or that what is sacrificed to idols is anything? No, but rather I say this: that those things which the gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God; and I would not have you fellowship with the devils. You cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of the devils. You cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils," etc. ^{1Cor 10.14-21}

Paul says all this. Since it notably serves our purpose and is very plain, I will but briefly run over it.

First, he lays down the state and scope of the matter, to which he immediately directs his whole discourse. "Flee idolatry," he says. And by the word "idolatry," he means whatever pertains to idolatry, especially eating meat offered to idols. But if you do not know what idolothytum means (the word he uses there),¹ understand that it is a Greek word which Paul uses in this case; and it signifies a thing sacrificed to an idol, or a thing publicly consecrated to an idol, in a sacrifice. It was the way of the Corinthians to sacrifice at the altars of their gods in idol-houses, that is to say, in their idol-temples, and to call Christians to attend their sacrifices. When they came, they sat and ate what was offered to idols, eating indifferently with the idolaters, thinking that they might do it without any fault at all. This is because, by the bright shining of the gospel, it appeared that neither the idol, nor that god whom the idol represented — and therefore, also the things that were offered to idols — were nothing but vain names and things of no price or estimation. But disputing against these from the eighth to the eleventh chapters, Paul teaches that it is far from Christianity to partake of the gentiles' sacrifices. He says, I will speak to you as to those who have discretion, so that after I have outlined for you the way in which to walk, by the sharpness of your wit you may understand what is true and what is false, and in short, which way you must incline. Then he scatters certain grounds of arguments, which discussing afterward, they might polish and perfect by their diligence.

Those, he says, who are partakers of the supper of the Lord (in which the bread of the Lord is broken, and the cup of the Lord is drunk) are of the same communion, fellowship, or body with the Lord. For κοινωνία, (koinonia) which Paul uses here, and which interpreters have translated communion or partaking (though fellowship is better than partaking; as in the Dutch translation "Gemeind" is better than "Gemeindchafft" ²), is not taken actively (if I may say so) for distributing, giving, or extending Christ's body by the minister; but it is taken passively, for the fellowship and society, for the body, I say, of the church — as when the church is called a communion, that is, an assembly, a gathering together and society of saints or godly Christians.³ Furthermore, the church is called κοινωνία (koinonia), or a communion of the body and blood of Christ, because it is redeemed by the body and blood of Christ, and being a partaker of Christ, it lives by him. For he lives in the godly Christians, communicating to them all his good gifts of life. And he declares that partakers of the supper of the Lord are the body and communion of Christ, for the following reason: "Because we, who are many, are one bread and one body." He later adds to this another more evident reason, for interpretation's sake, saying: "For we are all partakers of one bread." In that we are partakers of one bread, he says, we openly testify that we are partakers of the same body with Christ and all his saints. In these words, he notably respects the analogy. "As one bread or one loaf is made by uniting together many grains;" Cyprian says; "and as one wine is pressed out of many clusters of grapes; so out of many members, grows and is made the body of the Church, which is the body of Christ." ⁴

Now in the words of Paul, these things offer themselves to us to be marked. First, what he named a communion before, he now calls a multitude, or many, by a word expressing his mind better.

A communion, therefore, is nothing but a multitude or congregation. For he said, "The bread is the partaking of the body of Christ;" but now he says, "We being many are one bread, one body." "We being many," he says; that is, all we who are a multitude and a congregation or church, redeemed by the body of Christ given, and by his blood shed for us. Then he says, "We being many are one body:" he does not say, are made one body. For we are not first grafted into the body of Christ (as we have already repeated often) by partaking of the sacraments; but we who were before engrafted by grace invisibly, are now also visibly consecrated. Again, by like reasoning about sacraments, or by an example of the scripture taken from the sacraments of the people of the old Testament, he shows that the partakers of the sacraments are one body, both with him to whom they offer, and with those with whom they offer, or with whom they eat things offered to idols. "Behold the Israelites who offer sacrifices after the flesh. Are not those who eat of the sacrifices, κοινωνοὶ (koinonoi); that is, are they not communicants, fellows, or partakers of the things of the temple or of the altar?" ¹Cor 10.18 For he comprehends under the word for the things of the temple or of the altar (θυσιαστηριον thusiasterion is his word), whatever belongs to the worship and religion of the God of the Jews. So that, the sense or meaning may be this: Are they not all one body, one communion, one people, both with the God of Israel and with his people, who eat of the sacrifices offered to the God of Israel by the Israelite people? It is as if he had said: There is none who is ignorant of it, or can deny it, since it is confessed and manifest among all men. By these things, he leaves it to the Corinthians, of their own accord, to gather this much. Therefore, those who are partakers of the sacraments of the Gentiles, are one body and one fellowship with the gods of the Gentiles, and the Gentiles who sacrifice. Now by the figure occupatio (which means when answering, we prevent an objection that may be made) ¹ he places these words between: "What am I saying then? That the idol is anything? Or, that what is offered in sacrifice to idols is any thing?" ²

To which he then adds: "But this I sense, that the things which the Gentiles offer in sacrifice, they offer to devils, and not to God." Thus he might lawfully have inferred this: Therefore, if you continue to be partakers of things offered to idols, you will truly be one body and one fellowship both with the devil himself and all his members. But because this might have been taken by many to have been spoken bitterly, he adds another saying somewhat milder and gentler. He says: "And I would not have you be κοινωνοὶ," that is, "communicants, or partakers, and have fellowship with devils." After these words, by comparing the contrary parts, he sums up the whole matter to which he directed all his reasons, and says: "You cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils: you cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils." And so forth. The sacraments, therefore, separate us from all other worshippings and religions, and they bind and consecrate, yes, and also make us of the same body with the one true God and with sincere Christian religion as it were; because being partakers of them, we openly profess that we are the members of Jesus Christ — which no man in his right mind would take and make the members of fornication and of idols.

What Zwingli, that learned man, has In Expositione fidei Christianae ad Regem Christianum, is not impertinent to this purpose.

"Sacraments are instead of an oath. For sacramentum is also used by the Latins for an oath. For those who use one and the self-same sacraments, are one particular nation, and a holy sworn congregation. They are knit together into one body and into one people. Whoever betrays them shall perish. Therefore, the people of Christ are knit into one body by eating his body sacramentally. Now, he who is faithless, and yet dares to be so bold as to make himself one of this society or fellowship, betrays the body of Christ in the head as well as in the members," etc.

³ Zuingl. Christ. Fid. Expos. Opp. Tom. ii. fol. 556.

By this it is easy to understand, that sacraments put us in mind of our duty: especially if we mark in the writings of the apostles, how they frame their exhortations considering the manner of sacraments. Here again, the analogy being considered, it has very much light and force in it. Trees are pruned, and all that is dry, barren, and superfluous in them is cut away. And so too by circumcision, those who were circumcised were put in mind to cut away with the knife of the Spirit, whatever grew up from the flesh that was against the law of God. Moses referred to this when he said, "Circumcise, therefore, the foreskin of your heart, and no longer be stiff-necked." Deu 10.16 Following him, Jeremiah says in the 4th chapter: "Be circumcised in the Lord,¹ and cut away the foreskin of your hearts," etc. Jer 4.4 Those things which the apostle taught touching the celebration of the Passover, are plainer than need to be repeated here; and I have already treated them at large in the sixth sermon of my third decade. The very same apostle, in his epistle to the Romans, says: "Do you not know, that all we, who have been baptized into Jesus Christ, have been baptized into his death? We are buried then with him by baptism into his death; so that likewise, just as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we should walk in newness of life," etc. Rom 6.3-4 So we are put in mind by the mystery of baptism, to renounce and forsake Satan and the world, to mortify and subdue the flesh, and to bury the old Adam, so that the new man may rise up again in us, through Christ. Furthermore, the supper of the Lord admonishes us about brotherly love and charity, and of the unity that we have with all the members of Christ.

It also warns us of purity and sincerity in faith, so that, because we have openly professed that we are united to Christ and to all his members, we would have a special care and regard that we are not found faithless and untrue to our Lord Christ and his church; that we should not defile ourselves with foreign and strange sacrifices. We are also admonished about thankfulness, to magnify the grace of God who has redeemed us, according to that saying: "As often as you eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, you present his death until he comes." 1Cor 11.26

Thus far have I treated the force, the end, and the effect of sacraments; to which I have, I think, attributed no more or less than I should; that is, as much as may be proved out of the scripture to be due to sacraments. They are the institutions of Christ; therefore they do not care for counterfeit and strange praises. They have sufficient praise, if they have those praises which he that instituted them — namely God, and Christ Jesus, the high priest of the catholic church — granted to attribute to them.

Now, because mention is often made about faith in this whole book, I will further show that without faith, sacraments profit nothing; and again, that they are not superfluous or vain to those who receive them by faith. For this seems as yet to belong to the full exposition and consideration of sacraments. It is easily proved that sacraments without faith, do not profit. For it is said that sacraments are seals of the preaching of the gospel, and things pertaining to it. For if the preaching of the gospel is heard without faith, it not only profits nothing to life, but it rather turns to judgment for the one who hears it. The Lord himself bears witness to this, saying: "If any man hears my words, and does not believe, I do not judge him; for I did not come to judge the world, but to save the world. The word that I have spoken will judge him in the last day." Joh 12.47-48 This saying of the apostle agrees with that of the Lord: "For the gospel was preached to us, as well as to the fathers: but the word which they heard did not profit them, because it was not coupled with faith by those who heard." Heb 4.2 Who, now, is such a dothead that he cannot gather that sacraments without faith, are unprofitable? Especially since the same apostle says, "Whoever eats this bread and drinks this cup unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." 1Cor 11.27

But all our worthiness before God consists in faith; the same apostle yet again witnesses from the prophet, "The just shall live by faith;" ^{Rom 1.17} and "By faith the elders (or fathers) obtained a good report." ^{Heb 11.2} To this also belongs what is read in the gospel: "Those who were bid were not worthy." ^{Mat 22.8} From which it follows that worthiness consists in faithful obedience. To this may also be referred (I think) those examples which were mentioned more than once already: "All our fathers were baptized, and all ate of one spiritual food; but God had no delight in many of them." ^{1Cor 10.1-3} And Paul again says: "Without faith it is impossible to please God." ^{Heb 11.6} Therefore, without faith sacraments profit nothing. The examples of Simon Magus and Judas the traitor are very well known — one of whom was baptized, and the other admitted to the supper. Yet neither had any fruit of the sacraments, because they lacked true faith.

To these pithy and divine testimonies of God we will now add some places from St. Augustine. Out of his nineteenth book against Faustus, twelfth chapter:

"Peter says, 'Baptism saves us;' and lest they think that the visible sacrament was sufficient, by which they had the form of godliness, and should deny its power through their evil manners, by living lewdly and desperately, he then adds: 'Not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience makes its request to God.'" ¹

Again, Lib. ii. Contra Literas Petiliani, cap. 7, he says:

"They should not therefore be thought to be in the body of Christ (which is the church or congregation) because they are corporally partakers of his sacraments. For in such, they are also holy; but to those who use and receive them unworthily, they will be enforceable to their greater judgment.

For they are not in that society of Christ's church which, as members of Christ, grow into the fulness of God, by being knit together and touching one another. For that church is built on a rock. As the Lord says, 'Upon this rock will I build my church.' But they build on the sand; as the Lord also says, 'He that hears my words and does not do them not, I will liken him to a foolish man.'" ²

And again in Augustine's treatise on John 13:

"The syllables of Christ's name and his sacraments profit nothing, where the faith of Christ is resisted. For faith in Christ and his sacraments, is to believe in him who justifies the ungodly, to believe in the Mediator, without whose intercession we are not reconciled to God." ³

An objection is made: If sacraments do not profit at all without our faith, then they depend on our worthiness or unworthiness; so that they are not perfect.⁴ I answer, that among the wicked and unbelievers, sacraments of themselves are sufficiently ratified and confirmed by the institution of God; nor does their perfectness depend on the condition and state of the partakers — they are neither better among the good, nor worse among the bad. For what the Lord has instituted remains perfect and sound, and he retains his institution always good, however men may vary and be faithless. For the apostle says: "Shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? God forbid! Yes, let God be true, and every man a liar." ^{Rom 3.3-4}

But I have also touched this matter somewhat before. Yet, because it is one thing to offer, and another thing to receive, truly of his goodness, God offers his bountiful gifts to men to this end: to profit and to save them, and to make them whole, as the physician does by ministering medicine to his patient. But because a foolish and mad man does not acknowledge the benefit, like a sick patient who refuses to have medicine ministered, the benefit which is offered no more profits the one, than medicine not received does any good to the other. It is not through the fault of the one who offers the benefit, nor of the one who ministers the medicine, but through the folly of the one who refuses and will have none of it.

In this manner St. Augustine also disputes about this matter. For Lib. iii. De Baptismo cont. Donat. cap. 14, he says:

"When the perfectness and holiness of the sacrament is in handling, it does not matter what he believes, and what manner of faith he has, who receives the sacrament. Truly, it avails very much in the way of salvation; but for the question of the sacrament itself, it makes no matter." ¹

Also Contra Literas Petiliani, Lib. ii. cap. 47, he says:

"Remember that the lewd life and corrupt manners of evil men do not hinder the sacraments of God at all, so as to make them not holy, or less holy; but to the ungodly, they are a testimony of their damnation, and not a furtherance of their salvation." ²

Also, Tract. in Joan. 26, he says: "If you receive the sacrament carnally, it does not cease to be spiritual; but to you it is not so." ³

The objection that baptism does not profit infants is just as easily confuted if we still say that sacraments without faith do not profit; for infants have no faith. Thus they babble. We answer, first, that the baptism of infants is grounded upon the free mercy and grace of God, who says: "I will be your God, and the God of your seed;" ^{Gen 17.7} and again: "Allow the children to come to me; for of such is the kingdom of God," etc. ^{Mat 19.14} Infants are therefore numbered and counted among the faithful by the Lord himself; so that baptism is due to them, as much as it is due to the faithful. For by the imputation of God, infants are faithful. To this pertains this saying of our Saviour: "He that offends one of these little ones who believe in me," etc. ^{Mat 18.6} For he manifestly calls "little ones" believing; doubtless for imputation's sake, and not for confession, which is not yet in little ones by any means. To this may also be added that the father of the infant therefore desires to have his child signed with the mark of the people of God (namely, baptism) because the father believes the promises of God — that is, that his infant is of the household of God; therefore, there is faith in the baptism of infants. But even if the father does not believe, that is no hindrance to the infant; for in the faith of the church he is brought to be baptized. The church, truly, believes that infants ought to be brought to the Lord; the church believes that they are of the household and people of God: therefore she commands them to be partakers of the mysteries. So that again, in the baptism of infants a man may find faith. St. Augustine adds this to it, saying, Lib. i. De Peccatorum Meritis et Remissione, cap. 19: "Therefore infants are rightly called faithful, because in a way they confess their faith by the words of those who bear them." ⁴ He reasons more touching this matter in his twenty-third epistle to Boniface,⁵ where he that desires may find more.

⁵ Id. Opp. Tom. ii. fol. 17, etc.

But all these things, they say, do not prove that infants have faith of their own; for the faith of their parents, of their bearers, or the faith of the church, is another's faith, and not theirs. Let it be so. Yet most certain is that saying that the Lord counts infants among his own, that is, among the faithful; so that now they are not baptized only in another's faith, but in their own faith, that is to say, that faith which it pleases the Lord to impute to them.

Furthermore, that is not another's, which is common to the self-same body. And infants are in the very same body of the church, whereby that which is the church's is their own, and not another's. Nor can any man easily tell what motions of the Holy Spirit infants have beside, etc. For insomuch as they are of God, they have the Spirit of God; "and whoever does not have it, they are not of God," Rom 8.9.

Just as they decline too much to the left, who are persuaded that sacraments (yes, without faith) profit the receivers, so they go too far to the right, who think that the sacraments are superfluous for those who have faith. Faith, they say, fully acquits us; so that after we have faith, sacraments can increase nothing in us. Therefore it must be that they are unprofitable. In times past, such we read were the heretics called Messaliani,¹ who were called both Euchitae,² and εὐθουσιασταὶ (enthusiastai or "enthusiasts") — that is, divine men in truth, and inspired of God — for they contend that the faithful, after they receive the Holy Ghost, have no need of sacraments. These men are very injurious even to God himself, who did not institute his sacraments for the faithful without good cause, nor unprofitably. And "Truly, Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned to him for righteousness, and he was counted the friend of God," just and holy, and doubtless, not being void of the Holy Ghost. Yet he also "received circumcision, the seal of the righteousness of faith which was before he was circumcised." Rom 4.11 It is said to the same Abraham: "Every man-child, whose foreskin is not circumcised, shall be cut off from my people, because he has broken my covenant." Gen 17.14 Truly, the angel of the Lord is ready to kill Moses, because he delayed circumcision in his children longer than was lawful, either by his own negligence, or through the fault of his Midianite wife. What, will anyone be found more righteous and holy than the Son of God who, having received the fulness of the Spirit, pours plentifully of it into his members? Being himself the head, yet he came to John the Baptist, and requests to be baptized by him in the Jordan.

And when John refused and said, "I need to be baptized by you, and you come to me?" he hears: "Allow it to be so now; for thus it becomes us to fulfil all righteousness." Mat 3.14-15 Certainly righteousness gives to every man that which is his own. Faith, therefore, which is the righteousness of Christians, gives glory to God; and it believes that, being wonderfully wise, God wishes well to men — and therefore that He has instituted nothing unprofitably, but all things are for the salvation of his faithful ones. A faithful man therefore uses all the institutions of God without any reasoning or questioning. Nor is there any here, I think, who would say that this deed of Christ does not pertain to him, by which undoubtedly he laid before us an example to follow. Yes, that which he himself did, he willed others to do also, when he sent out his disciples, and said: "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures; baptizing them in the name of the Father," etc. "He who believes and is baptized shall be saved." ^{Mar 16.15-16} Here, truly, he joins together both faith and baptism, which doubtless he would not have done if sacraments were superfluous where faith is found.

By this it manifestly appears that they are wrong, as far as heaven is wide, who think that sacraments are indifferent, that is to say, something left to our own will and choice, either to use or not to use. We already heard a flat commandment concerning baptism; so too, instituting and celebrating the supper, the Lord says: "Do this in remembrance of me." ^{Luk 22.19} Therefore, he who despises these commandments of God, I do not see how he can have the faith by which to be invisibly sanctified. To this now belongs what the faithful prince of Ethiopia confesses, that he believed with all his heart in the Lord Jesus; nevertheless, as soon as he saw water, he said: "Behold, here is water; what keeps me from being baptized?" ^{Act 8.36} He does not say, I believe with all my heart, and I feel that I am justified and cleansed; why then should I be washed with water, having no filth remaining? Therefore, wherever there is true faith, sacraments are not contemned or refused, but more desired. For also Cornelius the centurion, after he had received the Holy Ghost, does not challenge Peter, who said: "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" ^{Act 10.47}

Peter was a faithful preacher of the gospel, a skilful teacher of the truth; therefore he deceives no man. And he teaches us by his own deed, that faith then specially provokes us to partake of the sacraments, when it is true in the faithful. Paul, his fellow-minister, agrees with him, saying: "Let everyone prove himself, and then let him eat of this bread, and drink of this cup;" ^{1Cor 11.28} but that proving is made by faith. Therefore it is not faith, but unthankfulness,¹ that contemptuously rejects the sacraments.

Truly, I am not ignorant that very many have been sanctified without the use of visible sacraments, and are also sanctified today without them. But none of them despised or contemned them. They were not partakers of the sacraments, being driven to it by necessity; as there are some today who are held captives under the tyranny of antichrist and the Turk, and for the time, believe with their whole heart in the Lord Jesus. Therefore, the examples of these or others like them are no defence for those who may receive the sacraments, if they regard the ordinances of God, and set as much by them as they should, out of duty. I will note here, for the singular benefit of the readers, St. Augustine's disputation, because it notably fits our purpose. In Quaest. lib. in Levit. iii. cap. 84 he says:

"It is demanded, not without cause, whether invisible sanctification has any profit without those visible sacraments with which a man is visibly sanctified? Without doubt, this is absurd. For it may be said more tolerably, that this sanctification is not without them, than to say that it has no profit if it is without them, since all their profit consists in sanctification. But we must also weigh this: how it is rightly said that sanctification cannot be without the sacraments. For visible baptism did not profit Simon Magus, to whom invisible sanctification was lacking. But because this invisible sanctification profited those who had it, in like manner, those who were baptized also received the visible sacraments. And yet it is not shown that Moses himself was sanctified with visible sacrifices or oil. Yet, notwithstanding, he visibly sanctified the priests. But who would dare to deny that he was invisibly sanctified, his grace being so great, surpassing, and excellent? This may also be said of John the Baptist. For he was first a baptizer, before he was seen to be baptized.

We can by no means deny that he was sanctified; and yet we do not find that it was visibly wrought in him before he came to the ministry of baptizing.¹ This may also be verified of the thief crucified with Christ, to whom the Lord said, as he hung with him on the cross, "Today you shall be with me in Paradise." ^{Luk 23.43} For he could not have partaken of so great a felicity, unless he had been invisibly sanctified. From this we gather that invisible sanctification has been present with some, and profited them, without the visible sacraments; we also gather that visible sanctification, wrought by visible sacraments, may be present without this invisible sanctification, yet it may not profit us. Nevertheless, the visible sacrament is not therefore to be contemned; for the contemner of it can by no means be invisibly sanctified. Thus Cornelius and those who were with him, when they appeared to be invisibly sanctified by the Holy Ghost poured into them, notwithstanding, were baptized. Nor is a visible sanctification, which had invisible sanctification going before it, considered superfluous." ² This far from Augustine.

With this disputation, another question also has some affinity or likeness — which is, Whether sacraments depend upon the worthiness of the ministers, and whether they are hindered in their force by the unworthiness of the ministers? Cyprian, in more than one place, contends that, "They cannot baptize who lack the Holy Ghost." ³ This error springs from this: that he attributes too much to the ministry of baptism. He thinks that men are purified or cleansed by baptism: so that he thereby gathers that an unclean person cannot purify or cleanse, and therefore cannot baptize; and that baptism by an unclean person is not baptism. From this he derives anabaptism, or rebaptizing. But if that holy man had rightly and religiously distinguished between power and ministry, between the sign and the thing signified, between the outward and inward sanctification; he would undoubtedly have understood that we are invisibly sanctified by the mere grace of God, and that this inward sanctification is outwardly represented and sealed by the ministry. There he might have understood that sealed evidences may be published by an evil minister as well as by a good one. God's sacraments are ⁴ to be referred to God, the author of them, who is faithful and true in all his ordinances, however false and faithless men may be. Although Judas was a thief, he preached and baptized; his doctrine and baptism was the doctrine and baptism of Christ, as well as Peter's and Andrew's, James' and John's. And no man ever doubted the perfectness and pureness both of the doctrine and baptism done by the ministry of Judas — as though those whom he taught and baptized were never taught or baptized. For he did not baptize in his own name, but in the name of Christ; he did not preach his own doctrine, but the doctrine of Christ. In the meantime, he is called by the Lord himself, not just a devilish man, but a very devil.

To conclude, the Lord out of his goodness, for his truth's sake and not for Judas' sake, worked in the faithful. Another's ungraciousness and maliciousness could not hinder this working of Christ, just as today, it does not hinder a whit. Truly, we must do what we can to have holy and unblameable ministers, so far as we are able to procure and bring it to pass by our care and diligence. Indeed, let us deprive and disgrace those whom we find behaving themselves unworthy of their function. But in the meantime, let us not doubt at all the pureness of the sacraments that were ministered to us while such men were in office, that is to say, in the same manner and form as the Lord instituted. Truly, just as the faithful do not fasten their minds on the elements, so they do not fasten their minds on the ministers. In all things, they look only to God, the author of all goodness, and to the end of those things which the Lord ordained.

St. Augustine handled this matter very diligently, excellently applying very effectual arguments to these things. I will record his words from Lib. iii. Contra Donatist. de Baptismo 3, cap. 10:

"The water is not unholy," he says, "or defiled, over which the name of the Lord is called upon, even though it is called upon by unholy and unclean persons; because neither the creature itself, nor the name, is unclean. And the baptism of Christ, consecrated with the words of the gospel, is holy, both by those who are unclean and in those who are unclean, even though they are defiled and unclean; because his holiness cannot be polluted, and a divine power is present in his sacraments, either to the salvation of those who use them well, or to the condemnation of those who use them ill. Does the light of the sun or of a candle, when it shines through a filthy sink, gather any uncleanness from there; and can the baptism of Christ be polluted with any man's wickedness? For if we apply our minds to the visible things under which sacraments are delivered, who does not know that they are corruptible? But if we ascend to what is figured by them, who does not see that they are incorruptible, even though the men by whom they are ministered, are either rewarded or punished according to their deservings?" ¹ And so forth.

I could allege many examples of this kind, if I thought them necessary. For I think that it is largely and plainly enough declared by them, that the perfectness and pureness of the sacraments are not to be esteemed by the worthiness or unworthiness of the ministers, but by the truth of God who instituted them. To Him be glory, power and dominion, for ever and ever. Amen.

5-8. THE EIGHTH SERMON: OF HOLY BAPTISM.

OF HOLY BAPTISM; WHAT IT IS; BY WHOM, AND WHEN IT WAS INSTITUTED, AND THAT THERE IS BUT ONE BAPTISM OF WATER. OF THE BAPTISM OF FIRE. OF THE RITE OR CEREMONY OF BAPTISM; HOW, OF WHOM, AND TO WHOM IT MUST BE MINISTERED. OF BAPTISM BY MIDWIVES; AND OF INFANTS DYING WITHOUT BAPTISM. OF THE BAPTISM OF INFANTS. AGAINST ANABAPTISM OR RE-BAPTIZING; AND OF THE POWER OR EFFICACY OF BAPTISM.

Now I have to treat particularly holy baptism, and the holy supper of the Lord; which may be done much more briefly, as we have already spoken largely about sacraments in general. May Christ our Lord open your minds, and guide my tongue to the glory and praise of his blessed name forever!

Baptism is a word fetched from the Greeks, who use both these words baptismus and baptisma, (both of which signify baptism), as the Latins also do; and baptism is a dipping, which is the word Tertullian willingly uses.¹ For βαπτω (bapto) signifies to dip or dip in; and βαπτίζω, (baptizo) to plunge or put far in. Whereupon, baptize is also used for plunge in, wash away, or cleanse; and baptizings in the scriptures are put for washings and purifyings, as it appears in St. Mark, the seventh chapter, and in Paul to the Hebrews, the ninth chapter. To be baptized with the same baptism, is proverbially spoken of someone who partakes of the same danger or misfortune; ² and to be baptized with blood, is to be imbued with blood.

They define baptism, for the most part, to be a token or recognition of our cleansing, indeed, of our initiation, whereby we are received into the church among the number of God's children. But describing the nature of baptism more at large, we say that it is a holy action instituted by God, and consisting of the word of God and the holy rite or ceremony by which the people of God are dipped in the water in the name of the Lord — in short, by which the Lord himself represents and seal to us our purifying or cleansing, gathers us into one body, and puts the baptized in mind of their duty. ³

In this description of baptism, these things seem chiefly to be considered: who instituted baptism; what things it consists of; whether it is simple (one thing), or drawn into many parts; what rite or ceremony of baptizing is delivered to the church; what the end and force of baptism is.

It was no man that instituted the sacrament of baptism, but God himself; yet it took the name by man; ⁴ that is, it was ministered by John, who was called the Baptist from it. That we might understand this, the evangelists confirmed in many places that John's calling was from heaven.

We may gather thereby, that his ministry was from heaven. ⁵ He says in express words: "He who sent me to baptize with water, said to me, Upon whomever you see the Holy Ghost," etc. ^{Joh 1.33} Also our Lord in the gospel, arguing that the baptism of John was not from men but from God, demands of the Pharisees: "The baptism of John, where was it, from heaven, or of men?" ^{Mat 21.25} Therefore the godly, even today, receive baptism from the hands of God himself as it were, though they are baptized through the ministry of men. For the Lord, establishing his institutions by his Spirit, works salvation in the elect. Thus it must follow that the virtue or efficacy of baptism is not hindered by an evil minister: This has been already been spoken of elsewhere,¹ and will be again later.

Truly, baptism was instituted and began at the time of John the Baptist, when he began to preach openly that the time was fulfilled, and that Christ was exhibited and given to the world. But the thing signified being present, the signs of things to come or of things which would be revealed, should no longer remain, but be changed into other signs. And circumcision was a sign of the blessed seed which was to come; I mean, of the Messiah himself, who by shedding his blood would bestow his blessing upon the whole world. Therefore, once he had come and would soon shed his blood, it was needful that circumcision be changed into baptism. This will be spoken of afterward.

Now, baptism consists of the sign and of the thing signified; of the word or promise of God and of the holy rite or ceremony. The sign is the outward action, that is, the sprinkling of water in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, with calling upon the name of God. The promise or word of God is, "baptizing them:" "He that believes and is baptized will be saved." And so forth. We spoke abundantly enough about this in the sixth sermon.

Many in olden times have distinguished between the baptism of John, and the baptism of Christ and his apostles. ² For some of them deny that forgiveness of sins was comprehended in the baptism of John. But if we diligently view and weigh the doctrine of the holy scripture, we will find that the baptism of John, and of Christ and his apostles, is one and the same. Certainly, the doctrine of John, and of Christ and his apostles, is everywhere one and the same; for with one mouth they all preach the gospel, and by it, repentance and the remission of sins in the name of Christ. Let him who would, confer those things which John the Evangelist writes about the doctrine of John the Baptist in the first and third chapter, and what Luke writes about the doctrine of Christ and his apostles in the four and twentieth chapters of his gospel, and in the Acts of the Apostles, and he will say that all of their doctrine is one and the same. And baptism is set to their doctrine, as a seal is set to evidence. Who therefore believes that there are different seals for their doctrine, or different baptisms? ³ St. John baptized with water: the Lord commended to his disciples no other element than water; nor did they baptize otherwise than with water.

They themselves baptized into Christ, into repentance and remission of sins. But St. Mark writes of John the Baptist, "John baptized in the wilderness, preaching the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins." And St. Paul, speaking of the doctrine and baptism of John, says: "John baptized with the baptism of repentance, saying to the people, that they should believe on him who should come after, that is, on Jesus Christ." By these testimonies, who cannot gather that the baptism of John and of Christ are altogether the same? — unless perhaps this seems to any man to make a difference: that John baptized in him who was to come and would be revealed, but the apostles baptized into him who was already revealed.

But I do not see how such a little space of time can bring any difference, especially since John spoke so much, from the beginning of his preaching, about him who would be revealed. For he both pointed him out quickly with his finger, and he bore witness that he was present and revealed, and that he would come no more or be revealed. To this is added that Christ was baptized with none other than with the baptism of John. For if John's baptism were another baptism beside the baptism of the church of Christ, then it would follow that Christ was not baptized with our baptism, nor are we baptized in the baptism of Christ. But Christ sanctified with his body the baptism of John, and he granted to be baptized with us into the same fellowship; so that we are also baptized today, not with the baptism of John, but of Christ, who instituted baptism by John; and he himself consecrated it. Therefore in Matthew, the 28th chap., and in Mark, the 16th chap., Christ does not abrogate the baptism which John began; he does not institute a new one; but he commands us to continue and to minister the same one to those who believe: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

Now, though John himself says, "I baptize with water, but he will baptize you with the Holy Ghost:" ^{Mat 3.11} he marks no difference between his own baptism of water and Christ's baptism. But he attributes somewhat more to Christ, in which no man or minister had a part with him (for they erred who in times past baptized with fire); but he alone gives the baptism of fire, that is, the singular gifts of the Holy Ghost — but primarily, the use of tongues in the form of fire. For so this matter is expounded in the Acts, first by the Lord Christ himself and then by experience in the church. For the Lord says: "Do not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which you have heard from me. For John truly baptized with water; but you shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost after these few days." ^{Act 1.4-5} And consequently, on the day of Pentecost, they were baptized with the baptism of Christ; not with water again, but they were all filled with the Holy Ghost; cloven tongues, fiery as it were, sitting upon each one of their heads; and they began to speak with other tongues.

In the Acts, citizens of Samaria are baptized by Philip with the baptism of Christ in water, lawfully and fully. But afterward the very same people are baptized with the particular baptism of Christ, when by the laying on of hands by Peter and John, they receive the Holy Ghost. Not that they were altogether void of the gift of the Holy Ghost previously (for how could they believe without the Holy Ghost?); but because they were baptized with the visible baptism of fire beside, and they received the gift of tongues and other excellent graces. As it is also said of Cornelius who truly, being first baptized with fire, I mean, with the peculiar baptism of Christ, spoke with tongues, and afterward he was baptized with water. Contrariwise, those twelve disciples at Ephesus were first fully baptized with the baptism of John, and with the baptism of the water of the Christian church or congregation; and afterward, Paul the apostle laying his hands on them, they are not baptized with water again, but with fire. Luke bearing witness, says: "The Holy Ghost came upon them, and they spoke with tongues and prophesied." ^{Act 19.6}

But this baptism of fire, and the visible ministration of the gifts, ceased together with miracles; nor is it usual or common in the church today. But the baptism of water remains, which is one and the same, whether it is ministered by the hands of John or by the apostles, or by diverse hands of the ministers of the church; for diverse hands do not make diverse baptisms. Therefore, we rightly believe that there is but one simple baptism of the faithful in all ages. For Paul says in express words: "There is one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God and Father of all." ^{Eph 4.5-6}

To this also tends this saying of the same apostle: "I thank God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; lest any should say that I had baptized in my own name." ^{1Cor 1.14} Upon this apostolic truth, the reverend fathers of the council of Constantinople made this confession in their creed: "I believe one baptism for the remission of sins." ¹ For there is but one church, one body, one head, and one king, prince, and high priest of the catholic church.

Now I have come to expound the rite or ceremony of baptism. It was simple and the same from the beginning, and not chargeable or burdensome to the church through immoderate ceremonies. John baptized in Aenon beside Salim, because much water was there; and he baptized in the name of Christ. The apostles did likewise. Whereby it remains for an undoubted truth, that the very best form of baptizing is that which is done by water, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; for so the Lord commanded in the 28th chap. of Matthew. Do you ask how it comes to pass, that Luke in the Acts ¹ mentions that Peter and Paul baptized in the name of the Lord, and does not say that they baptized in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost? I answer that the mystery of the Trinity is comprehended under the name of the Lord. For when the Lord said, "I and the Father are one," he that is baptized into the Lord is also baptized into the Father, and so in like manner into the Holy Ghost which is not divided from them; for truly, they have one and the same Spirit. For truly, Luke says that they were baptized by the apostles in the name of the Lord, whom the apostles baptized according to the Lord's institution. Some say Christ is the accomplishment or fulfilling, and he is the proper object of baptism. Therefore it is no marvel that the apostles baptized into the name of the Lord, who nevertheless were commanded to baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; for all the mysteries of baptism are laid forth for us in the only Son of God.

Truly we say both: "To baptize into the name of the Lord," and "To baptize in the name of the Lord." The use of speaking in the first manner is read in the 28th chap. of Matthew, and in Acts, 19th chap.; for both have εἰς τὸ ὄνομα, In nomen, "into the name." And also Tertullian interprets it, contra Praxeam, saying: "He commanded that we should be baptized into the Father and the Son," etc. ² Luke uses the latter manner in the Acts, 10 and 11, saying, ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι (en tir onomati) and ἐπι τῷ ὀνόματι (epi ty onomati) that is, "In the name."

Moreover, I told you in the sermon before last,³ what it means to baptize into the name, or in the name, of the Lord — that it is, to be enrolled into God's household, that the one who is baptized may now receive the name of God and be called the son of God, yes, and as it were, be registered into the roll of the children of God, citizens of the kingdom of heaven. Whereupon we have also names given to us in baptism, that as often as we hear ourselves named, we may remember our baptism and its mysteries. Nor is it a new thing or foreign to the scriptures, that names are given to us in baptism; for so it was also used in circumcision, which may be seen in Luke, 2nd chapter.

Furthermore, the question is asked, Whether we ought to baptize with these bare words, "I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost;" or whether it is lawful to add or join something else? I think we ought to answer that it is the servant's duty to add nothing to his Lord's institution, but to diligently keep what he has delivered; yes, and to advisedly mark what the Lord himself and his apostles did in baptism, and to holily imitate it, so that in the church of God, as Paul has commanded, all things may be done decently and in good order. ^{1Cor 14.40} But according to that most holy form of baptism set down and delivered, we see two things that are to be observed in holy baptism and in its use. First, the apostles and those who were with the apostles, each taught very significantly about the promises of God and faith in Christ; which is apparent in the Acts of the Apostles. It is therefore lawful, in the action or administration of baptism, to recite the promises of God, to repeat the belief, and require faith, either of those who are to be baptized, being of mature age, or else of those who bring the infants to be baptized. Moreover, when the Lord was baptized by John the Baptist in Jordan, he prayed; which Luke reports of him in his history of the gospel. It is therefore lawful in the use of baptism to pray, and to solemnly call upon the name of the Lord. At first the prayers were moderate and short, not of a great length and tedious; but in the process of time no measure was kept, not only in tedious blessings, but also in diverse ceremonies which those who came after added to it. It does not seem altogether unprofitable to repeat some things about this out of the old doctors.

Tertullian, in his book De Corona Militis, says:

"When we go to the font, there and also a little before in the church, the bishop laying his hand on us, we confess that we forsake the devil, his pomps, and all his angels. Then we are dipped in the water three times, not answering anything more than the Lord has set down in the gospel. When we are taken out of the font, we taste of milk and honey mingled together; and from that time, we abstain from daily washing for the span of a whole week."¹

We hear in this an utter denying or renouncing, a third dipping, a tasting of milk and honey, and after baptism an abstinence from bathing by a week's space. In his first book against Marcion, he also mentions oil.² Truly, milk is fit for children. Those who are of mature age, being baptized, are likened to them. Beside this, in the old Testament there is often mention made of the land of promise flowing with milk and honey. Those things were first offered to be tasted by those who are baptized, to help them understand that Christ Jesus being their captain, and having passed over the Jordan, they might by an infallible hope have an inheritance in the land of promise.

St. Jerome witnesses that wine was mingled with milk, and says, Com. Lib. 15. ad Isaiam: "The Lord provokes us not only to buy wine, but also milk; ^{Isa 55.1} which signifies the innocence of infants. This type and custom is kept in the western churches even to this day, to give wine and milk to those who are born anew in Christ."³

At this day, neither of them is given to infants, no, not even by those who would seem to be zealous maintainers of the old ceremonies. Meanwhile, they believe that omitting these ceremonies is without sin, and needs no satisfaction.

Now, we may also gather out of the sixth book of Augustine De Bap. Contra Donat. cap. 24. that they used diverse prayers, whatever they thought good about baptism.⁴ The same Augustine Contra Pelag. et Celest. Lib. ii. cap. 40. says: "In baptizing children, they first conjure and blow away all contrary power. Also the infants, by the words of those who bear them, answer that they renounce these."⁵ He also mentions this ceremony in Libro Primo de Nup. et Concup, ad Valer. cap. 20. and *Libro ii. cap. 18.*⁶ It is said in the ecclesiastical decrees, that the holy church throughout the world used that ceremony.⁷ Again, Augustine says, In Epistola ad Bonifa. 43., that the godfathers answer for the faith of the children, and confess their faith. "We ask those who offer the infants, 'Does he believe in God?' (being of that age, he does not know whether there is a God or not). They answer, 'He believes;' and so they answer every question which is asked." ¹

v.361

The same Augustine, in his book de Trinitate. 15. cap. 26, also mentions oil, with which those who were baptized were anointed. ²

Rabanus Maurus, bishop of Mentz, a long time after Augustine,³ reckons up many more ceremonies of baptism. For in Libro de Institutione Cleri. i. cap. 27, he says:

"They are marked in the forehead and heart with the cross in baptism, that the devil, seeing that mark, may know that this sheep is not of his fold. Also, consecrated salt is put into the child's mouth, that being seasoned with the salt of wisdom, he may be free from the stink of wickedness, and no longer rot with the worms of sin. His ears and nostrils are touched with spittle, saying the word, Ephaiha, used by our Saviour, being added to it, so that by the virtue of Christ the high priest, his ears may be opened to receive the knowledge of God, and to hear the will and commandments of God. Then the child is blessed, and his breast anointed with holy oil, so that no relics of the enemy may lurk and remain in him. After this, he is baptized in the name of the holy Trinity, being dipped three times in the water."

And in his 28th chapter: "And being baptized, he immediately is signed in the forehead with the chrism, together with a prayer following, that he may be made an inheritor of the kingdom of Christ, and of Christ may be called a Christian." And in the 29th chapter: "After baptism there is delivered to the Christian a white garment, signifying pureness and innocence." ⁴

Also for this cause, the baptized were clothed with white garments, so that they might now remember that they were set free, and from being servants and bondslaves of the devil, they are made the freemen of Christ Jesus. Moreover, white colour in times past was consecrated to victories and triumphs. By this, it may seem that the white garment was therefore given to those who were baptized, that they might be mindful that while they live here on earth, they must continually fight and overcome in Christ; for the life of man is a warfare upon earth. And certainly, though offerings also began to be given to the baptized by the godfathers, that seems to have been borrowed from warfare. For by the offering or earnest (which we Switzers call Die ynbindeten ⁵) the one who is baptized is warned of his faith given in baptism, to always be mindful of what a captain he forsook, and into what garrison he was entertained, in which he must keep his faith given to his new captain Christ.

Many other things of this kind, which I find among writers of this latter age, I willingly pass over, lest I abuse your patience and gentleness. And who does not perceive that others of this kind, indeed countless new devices, are added to baptism today? Therefore, the safest and surest way is to build upon the first foundations of the blessed apostles. For if antiquity seems to bolster the last invented ceremonies, who dare deny that the authority of the apostles excels it many ways?

For the apostles were before all those who have lately invented and delivered those manifold ceremonies to be used in baptism.

⁵ presents made to a godchild at the Christening.

This also comes into question: Whether we ought to baptize with plain clear water, or with consecrated water; and why the Lord commanded us to baptize with water? St. Cyprian, Epist. Lib. i. Epist. 12, says; "The water ought to be cleansed and sanctified beforehand by the priest, to wash away the sins of the man who is baptized." ¹ But the examples and testimonies of the holy scripture more prevail with me than the authority of Cyprian, or any other man, whoever it may be. This good man of God was also deceived in another place about the mystery of baptism; ² so that we must read his writings with judgment. The scripture tells us that John the Baptist, and the apostles and faithful disciples of Christ, baptized with water that was not consecrated. For what can be spoken or read more plainly, than that "John baptized in Jordan;" yes, that Christ himself and his apostles also baptized in the river Jordan? Where or how did the apostles consecrate the water of baptism in the Acts of the Apostles? When the eunuch showed him water as they journeyed, Philip baptized him out of that pure and clear fountain. Beside this, I declared in the sermon before last, how little pureness is in the common form of baptism, by which the font is consecrated. But if any man thinks that we ought to baptize with consecrated or holy water, and he does not understand "consecrated" to mean anointed, or prepared with crosses, or sanctified with charms, but chosen for holy uses, then I would never contend with him a whit. For the water of baptism is indeed holy — not in respect to the words recited, nor by crosses and other signs that are made — but because God instituted it, and in respect to the holy use and prayers of the godly. I spoke of this not long ago, when I treated the sanctification or consecration of the sacraments.

And Christ commanded his disciples to baptize with water for various reasons. For types or figures went before baptism in water — such as the flood, the Red sea through which the people of Israel passed, and the various cleansings and set washings mentioned in the law. Nor do the apostles of Christ ignore those things. For Peter says that Noah was saved in the water of the flood, but the wicked drowned in the water. Paul affirms that all our fathers were baptized by Moses in the cloud and in the sea. Therefore, mortification and vivification is prefigured. And truly, the principal badge of the new Testament is baptism, witnessing that full remission of sins is brought to us by Christ. And the holy prophets of God, by the mouth of the Lord foreshowing and promising this, have willingly shadowed out this inestimable benefit by water. Therefore, baptism must be ministered in water. This also notably served to represent the mystery: of which I spoke in my last sermon,³ when I treated the analogy or likeness of signs. And chiefly for these reasons, baptism ought to be ministered in water, and not in any other element.

There is also contention about whether the one who is baptized ought to be dipped or sprinkled with water once, or three times. Truly, the apostles have not commanded anything particular in this cause; so that it is free either to sprinkle or to dip. Sprinkling seems to have been used by the old fathers (for honesty and modesty forbid us to uncover the body; and the fragile state of infants for the most part cannot endure dipping), since sprinkling does as much as dipping. And it is the choice of the one who administers baptism, to sprinkle either once or three times, according to the custom of the church of which he is minister. Tertullian, contra Praxeam, says: "The Lord commanded us to baptize into the Father, and into the Son, and into the Holy Ghost. Not into one: for we are baptized not once but three times, at each name, into each person." ⁴ And Gregory, answering Leonard the bishop, says: "A diverse custom is no hindrance to the holy church, if it is done in one faith. By dipping three times, we signify the mystery of Christ's lying in the grave three days." ¹

Again, the reverend fathers in the fourth council held at Toledo allow but one dipping in baptism, and then immediately add this reason:

"And lest any have doubts about the mystery of this sacrament, why we allow but one dipping, he may see in this our death and resurrection. For dipping into the water is going down into the grave as it were; and coming up again out of the water is rising again out of the grave. Also, he may perceive that in this is shown the unity of the Godhead, and the Trinity of the persons. The unity is figured when we dip once; the Trinity, when we baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." ²

I do not allege this in order to stay myself upon man's testimony; but by man's testimony to show that we are free to follow that which most serves to edify the church.

Also, there is a question touching the place of baptism: Whether it is not lawful to baptize in any other place than in the church. I say, that the church is consecrated to ministries and the worship of God, and therefore that propriety ³ of itself requires us to baptize openly in the church, But if necessity will not permit this, the baptism of Christ is tied to no place; for we hear that Philip baptized out of the fountain in the broad field. Yet let us take heed, that we do not make necessity a pretence for our lewd affections; but let all things in the church which pertain to baptism be clean. Let all superfluity be laid aside; let all filth and uncleanness be banished; let all things (as the apostle says) be done honestly and in order.

Touching the time, there is no law prescribed by the Lord. That is left free to the judgment of the godly. Those who believed the preaching of St. Peter at Jerusalem in the day of Pentecost, also the eunuch whom Philip baptized, likewise Cornelius the centurion, Paul the apostle at Damascus, Lydia the purple-seller (a religious or devout woman), the keeper of the prison, those of Philippi, and also other faithful men or women, as soon as they had tasted of the gifts and graces of Christ and believed his word, they immediately desired to be baptized: they did not put it off ⁴ till another time. Therefore, those who do not linger in receiving baptism for themselves or their families, do very well. Delaying circumcision in his children did not fall out well for Moses. ^{Exo 4.24-25} Therefore, just as we grant that the time of the baptism is free, so it ought to be our duty to take heed that we not abuse our liberty; always being mindful of these words spoken by God: "The uncircumcised man-child, in whose flesh the foreskin is not circumcised, shall be cut off from his people, because he has broken my covenant." And we are not ignorant that baptism took the place of circumcision. Therefore, omitting baptism is not free. There were some in Cyprian's time who held the opinion that baptism should be received on the eighth day, in the manner of circumcision. But Cyprian, and the sixty-six bishops and elders who were with him in the council, ordained the contrary; namely, that everyone should receive baptism without any delay, and speedily procure it for their family. That place is extant in Epist. Lib. iii., Epist. viii. ⁵

Furthermore, Socrates the historiographer, Lib. v. ca. 22, says: "I know also another custom in Thessaly, according to which they baptize only on the days of Easter. By this it comes to pass that, except for a very small number, they die unbaptized."¹ But after a time a law was made, that the infants of the faithful should not be baptized except at the feasts of Easter and Whitsuntide. They excepted the time out of necessity. We may read this in Decret. Syricii Pont. in Isidore; and in the epistles of Pope Leo to the bishop of Campania and Sicilia, which in order are reckoned to be fifty-seven and sixty-two.² But the things that moved them to this may be easily disproved and overthrown. Truly, from the beginning, the time of baptism was not so limited. Nevertheless, that law of baptizing the faithful at the feast of Easter and Pentecost was renewed by Pipine, Charles, Lodovick, and Lothar, French kings, and was spread as far as their dominions reached.³ Many things are sung in the service of the papists at the time of Easter and Whitsuntide, which are not understood except by this law and custom. At length it fell into disuse, and the faithful were baptized as occasion and opportunity first served.

This also is in controversy: Who ought to baptize, and what does the baptizer work? I will speak of the last, first.

The baptizer visibly gives the sacrament of regeneration, and a testimony of the remission of sins; but by his Spirit, the Lord invisibly regenerates, and forgives sins, and seals the regeneration.

John and the apostles baptize with water: Christ baptizes with the Holy Ghost; not only with the visible sign of fire and the gift of tongues, but he alone gives all spiritual gifts. That they might expressly declare this, the ancient fathers diligently distinguished between power and ministry. For Augustine says, Tract, in John 5:

"It is one thing to baptize by way of ministry, another thing to baptize by power. Our Lord Jesus Christ, if he would, could have given power to any servant to give his baptism, as in his stead; and he could translate or remove from himself the power to baptize, and place it in one of his servants, and give as great force to this baptism which was translated or removed into his servant, as it would have if given by the Lord. He would not do so for this purpose: that the hope of those who were baptized should hang on him, by whom they acknowledge they are baptized. Therefore, he would not have a servant settle his hope in a servant. And therefore, cried the apostle, when he saw men willing to put their hope and trust in him: 'Was Paul crucified for you? Or were you baptized in the name of Paul?' Paul therefore baptized as a minister, not as the power itself; but the Lord baptized as the power."

And again:

"John the Baptist learned by the dove, 'Upon whomever you see the Spirit descending, like a dove, and tarry still upon him, this is he who baptizes with the Holy Ghost.'" Therefore, O dove, let not deceivers seduce you, who say, We baptize. O dove, acknowledge what the dove taught: 'This is he who baptizes with the Holy Ghost.' By the dove it is known that it is he; and do you think that you are baptized by his power, by whose ministry you are baptized? If you are of that mind, then you are not yet in the body of the dove; and if you are not in the body of the dove, it is no marvel, because you do not have simplicity; for simplicity especially is figured by the dove. John learned by the simplicity of the dove, that this is he who baptizes with the Holy Ghost." ¹

Furthermore, the minister of the church, being lawfully ordained, ought to baptize. The Donatists contend that none can baptize except someone who is pure and holy. They boldly avouched that any baptism administered by a lewd-living minister, or who was defiled with wicked vices, was fruitless and void of effect. Augustine gravely disputed against them, and convinced them by the truth of the scripture. In his 166th epistle he says:

"See how perversely and wickedly that is spoken, which you usually say: Because if he is a good man, he sanctifies the one whom he baptizes; but if he is an evil man, and the one who is baptized does not know it, then God sanctifies him. If this is true, then men should rather wish to be baptized by ministers unknown to be evil, than by those who are known to be good, so that they may be sanctified by God rather than by man. But may this madness be far from us. Why then do we not speak truth and are rightly wise? Because grace always belongs to God, for the sacrament is his, and only the administration is committed to man. If he is good, he clings to God, and works with God; but if he is evil, God works by him the visible form of the sacrament, but God himself gives the invisible grace. Let us all be wise in this, and let there be no schisms or divisions among us." ²

The same Augustine, in his third book contra Literas Petilianis,³ cap. 49, plentifully sets forth the same matter. And because we have also handled it in the end of our sermon before last, it is needless to speak one thing twice.

Here is a question objected to us, touching the baptism of midwives: Whether women midwives should and may baptize at the point of necessity — that is, when the infant is in jeopardy of dying before he comes to be baptized at the hands of the ecclesiastical minister? We answer, that baptism is a sacrament of the church, and that women are forbidden to minister in the church; therefore they neither can nor should baptize, just as they are by no means permitted to teach. The laws of the apostle are well known. "But I do not allow a woman to teach," says Paul, "nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence." ^{1Tim 2.12} The same law is repeated by the same apostle, in first Corinthians, fourteenth chapter, and confirmed by God's law. Man's testimonies agree with God's. For Tertullian, in his book De Velandis Virginibus, says: "It is not permitted for a woman to speak in the church, much less to teach or to baptize, nor to offer; nor to take to herself the execution of any man's office, much less the priest's." ⁴ This also is repeated in the fourth council of Carthage,⁵ where Aurelius Augustine is said to have been present.

Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, disputing against diverse heresies and confuting Marcion, says: "He also gives women leave and licence to baptize." ⁶ He says as much of the Quintilian and Peputian heretics.⁷ Reasoning against the heretics Collyridiani, he also says:

"If women were commanded to sacrifice to God, or to execute any regular thing in the church, then Mary should rather sacrifice in the new Testament, who was made worthy to carry in her own arms the King of all kings, the heavenly God, the Son of God; whose womb was made a temple and dwelling for the dispensation of the Lord in the flesh, being prepared for that purpose through the bountifulness and marvellous mystery of God. But it did not so please God. And neither was it committed or granted to her to baptize; otherwise her Son might have been baptized by her rather than by John."

The same author adds:

"And truly there is in the church an order of women-ministers called women-deacons; but they are not permitted to sacrifice, nor to attempt anything except for reverence sake of women-kind, or for the hour of bathing, or visiting, or for affection and travel." ¹

Though they offer in objection to this, the example of Zipporah the Midianite, wife of Moses, who circumcised her son in the time of necessity, Exo 4.24-25 that does not establish a common law; just as the example of Deborah does not make all women judges.

For there are many peculiar things done in the scripture, that if any man set about drawing general rules and common laws from them, he would bring in countless absurdities. What if Moses, in the same place, only describes his wife's deed as being moved to perform this ministry to God out of anger and displeasure, and not for religion's sake? For, grudging ² against her husband, yes, and against God, she took the foreskin of her son which was cut away, and in reproach, threw it at his father, at her husband's feet, saying: "You are a bloody husband to me." As if to say: Ich habb woll ein blutigman an dirr. ³ And though the angel was appeased with Moses because he seemed to allow the deed of the woman as well pleasing to God, that is more to be imputed to the mercy of God, than to the righteousness of the woman's deed. It grievously displeased God that David had slain Uriah, and moreover had taken Bathsheba as his wife; and yet, of His goodness and singular mercy, He granted to call Solomon, who was born of Bathsheba, by the name Jedidiah,⁴ because the Lord loved him. So the gracious Lord is also reconciled with Moses, who either by his own negligence or through the fault of his Midianite wife, lingered in the circumcision of his son, against the law, longer than was fitting. And God is content with, and accepts in good part, the circumcision which the woman performed from indignation rather than for religion. Yet He would not, following her example prevented, have other women circumcise.

But, you say, baptism ministered by a woman prevents the peril of death or eternal damnation into which the infant would fall if he departs this world without baptism. My answer is that when the infant, newly delivered out of his mother's womb, departs with too speedy a death, so that the parents cannot (however they might desire it), bring him to be baptized by the minister of the church, this pinch of necessity, truly, is not to the damnation or death of the infant. For being received into the covenant by the grace of God, he is delivered from death through the blood of the Son of God. We are not destitute of testimonies of scripture duly serving to prove this.

It was not lawful in the law to circumcise an infant before the eighth day. And it is certain that very many departed out of this world before the eighth day. Yet, meanwhile, if any man-child had departed on the third or fourth day after his birth, no condemnation was imputed to him. For otherwise David — a very sound man in religion, and one who loved his children dearly, and one who was very desirous of the salvation of his household — when his child was dead, which was begotten and born to him by Bathsheba, could not have shown himself so cheerful to his courtiers. He said to them, among other things, that he would go to the dead child, namely, into the land of the living. ²Sam 12.23 Also, if it was no danger to women-children to die uncircumcised (for they were saved without circumcision), then truly, neither is it damnable for men-children to die unbaptized at the point of necessity. For we have often said that holy baptism entered in and took the place of circumcision. To this pertain the testimonies out of the law and the prophets. In the law, the Lord protests more than once, that he has a most certain care and regard of infants. In Jonah he expressly professes that he has a consideration and a respect for those who have not yet come to the years of discretion: for the Lord spared the most famous city of Nineveh partly for their sakes.

You say, These testimonies of the old Testament do not pertain to us all, who live under the new Testament. I answer that God, after Christ had come in the flesh, is not more rigorous to us than he was before Christ's coming. For if it were so, should we then say that Christ did not come to fulfil, but to weaken and abolish the promises of God? After all, in times past among those of old, the grace and the promise were effectual in necessity without the sign. But now, among us, being without the sign, these promises somehow become void and of no force?

Therefore, trusting to God's mercy and his truth and undoubted promise,² I believe that infants, departing out of this world by too precipitous a death, before they can be baptized, are saved by the mere mercy of God, in the power of his truth and promise through Christ, who says in the gospel: "Suffer the little ones to come to me; for of such is the kingdom of God." ^{Mat 19.14}

Again: "It is not the will of my Father who is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish." ^{Mat 18.14} For truly God, who cannot lie, has said: "I am your God, and the God of your seed after you." ^{Gen 17.7} Whereupon St. Paul also affirms that they are born holy who are begotten of holy parents: not that any holy thing is born of flesh and blood; for "that which is born of the flesh is flesh:" ^{Joh 3.6} but because that holiness and separation from the common seed of men is of promise, and by the right of the covenant. For we are all by nature and natural birth born the sons of wrath, death, and damnation; but Paul attributes a special privilege to the children of the faithful, with which by the grace of God, those who by nature were unclean, are purified. So the same apostle in another place gathers holy branches of a holy root; and again elsewhere he says: "If by the sin of one many are dead, much more the grace of God and the gift of grace, which by one man Jesus Christ, has abounded to many." ^{Rom 5.15} And therefore Augustine did not doubt to say:

"As all who die, die in no other way than in Adam; even so, all who are made alive, are not made alive except in Christ. And upon this, whoever says to us that anyone, in the resurrection of the dead, can be made alive other than in Christ, he is to be abhorred and detested as a common plague of the Christian faith." ³ Ad Hiero. epi. 28.

Some object that,

By this means, the use of baptism is made void and is quite taken away; indeed, Pelagianism has sprung up again, which St. Augustine, with many other learned and holy men, beat down and kept under with such great travail. And God falsely spoke when He said: "The soul, whose foreskin is not circumcised, shall be cut off from his people, because he has broken my covenant." ^{Gen 17.14} Jesus falsely spoke when he said: "Truly, truly, I say to you, Unless a man is born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Joh 3:5 For if these statements are true, and children are not baptized, then truly, the sequel is that those dying without baptism are not saved.

I answer that by no means do I weaken holy baptism, much less take it quite away, when I defend that infants in the pinch of necessity, not being guilty of the contempt of God or wicked negligence, are not damned though they die unbaptized. For then salvation would be tied to the sign, and the promise of God would be made void — as though that promise alone, without the sign at the point of necessity, were vain, and could work nothing; as if the hand of God were shortened and bound to the sign, as it were. For otherwise I teach, by all means, that infants are to be baptized, that baptism is not to be delayed negligently, nor put off maliciously. But in the meantime, if they depart unbaptized by too speedy death, I exhort and charge that a good hope and confidence is to be had in the truth and mercy of the Lord, who promises in the law and the gospel, that he is the God of young infants, and that his will is that not so much as one of his little ones should perish.

We have nothing to do with Pelagius and Pelagians. Nor are we ignorant what St. Augustine has written to Jerome in this cause, Epist. 28.

"Whoever says that infants who leave this life, not having partaken of Christ's sacrament of baptism, are quickened and made alive in him, this man doubtless sets himself against the preaching of the apostles, and he condemns the whole church. It is for this cause that they [i.e., the church] hasten and run with their children to have them baptized: for without doubt, they believe that they could be made alive in Christ by no other means." ¹

And against the Pelagians, Epist. 106: "The apostolic seat, dealing against Pelagius, curses those who said that unbaptized infants have life everlasting." ²

v.376

The same Augustine, Lib. i. De Ani. etc. cap. 9, to Renatus, disputes against Vincentius Victor, who grants that infants are enslaved to original sin, yet, they are nevertheless saved though they are not baptized. Against them, he produces this saying of our Saviour: "Unless a man is born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." ³ But we, who condemn both Pelagius and Pelagians, affirm both those things which they deny; namely, that infants are born in original sin, and therefore the sanctification of Christ is necessary for them, without which they are not saved. Again, we defend and maintain that the same infants ought to be baptized if it is possible, though by the right of the covenant, they belong to the body of Christ and are sanctified by the blood of Christ. Pelagius taught that infants should not be baptized; for he held the opinion that they are without any fault, or any sin, blame, and offence. Therefore, this wicked and ungodly man did not acknowledge either our own corruption, or the benefit which God has performed by, in, and through Christ. Yet you can find neither of these in our assertion and doctrine. Therefore, we take no part with the Pelagians. St. Augustine, in that same epistle to St. Jerome, expressly says: "You are not of those who say that no guilt is drawn from Adam, from which the infant should be washed by baptism." ⁴ And against Julian also, Lib. i. cap. 2, ⁵ he proves by the statements of the holy fathers, that infants have original sin; and he gathers from this, that infants should therefore be baptized, because they have sin. The Pelagians gathered the clean contrary: infants have no sin; therefore they are not to be baptized. For the council of Carthage writes thus to Innocent: "The Pelagians deny that infants are to be baptized: for these, they say, did not perish, nor is there anything to be saved; because there is nothing in them that is corrupt or wicked," etc.

But we believe that infants are born in sin, yes, and that they are born the children of wrath, and are also corrupt and wicked. Moreover, we believe that the Son of God was born without sin of a pure virgin, to fulfil and confirm God's promises — which do not exclude infants from salvation, but let them in as joint partners in the league; therefore, we hold and defend that they are to be baptized. And therefore, we simply cannot allow this reason gathered from Augustine:

"Outside of the fellowship of Christ, no man comes to life. But by baptism, we are joined as members into the body of Christ, and have fellowship with him. Therefore, infants who are not baptized are outside the fellowship of Christ, and they are therefore condemned."²

For we do not deny that we are grafted into the body of Christ by partaking of the sacraments (as we declared in our last sermon about sacraments, immediately before this one). So too, we have shown elsewhere, too often already and very largely, that the beginning of our union or fellowship with Christ is not wrought by the sacraments. Rather, the same uniting or fellowship which was founded and grounded upon the promise, and by the grace of God through the Holy Ghost, was indeed communicated to us and ours before the use of the sacraments; it is merely continued and sealed to us by participating in or receiving the sacraments. Therefore, though an infant dies without baptism, and by necessity is shut out from having fellowship with Christ,³ so that he is neither a partaker nor yet sealed by the visible sign of the covenant — yet, he is not altogether an alien or stranger from Christ, to whom he is fastened with the spiritual knot of the covenant, by virtue of which he is saved.

The place in Genesis 17, alleged about cutting off the uncircumcised from the people of God, in consideration of the time, it fitly corresponds to those who are of mature age and well grown in years, and not to babes or infants. This is seen in Moses, whom the angel of the Lord, would have slain⁴ for neglecting circumcision, or for delaying it longer than was lawful, as he testifies about himself. Nor am I ignorant that certain old interpreters⁵ do not apply that to Moses, but to Eleazar, the son of Moses. But the very course of the history and of its circumstances, sufficiently prove that the danger lay on the father's neck, and not on the son's. What if a reason were added in the words of the law, which by no means corresponds to infants? "Therefore the uncircumcised shall perish," he says, "because he has broken my covenant." So, if we consider that circumcision in the very same place was commanded not only to infants, but to those who were of mature age, such as to Abraham, Ismael, and others desiring to be visibly joined into the fellowship of God, we should not marvel that destruction is threatened to the disobedient. For if any man today understands and knows the Lord's ordinance comprehended in His words, "He that believes and is baptized shall be saved," and yet he will not be baptized, but boasts that faith is sufficient for him unto salvation, then that baptism is irrelevant; for he has despised the ordinance of God, and is condemned as a rebel and an enemy⁶ of God.

⁶ non amico, Lat. omitted: and for one who is not a friend.

Furthermore, that passage from John 3 is not to be understood about the outward sign of the holy baptism, but simply of the inward and most spiritual regeneration of the Holy Spirit. When Nicodemus did not understand this perfectly, the Lord figured and made it manifest to him by parables about water and the spirit, that is to say, about the wind or the air, by elements that are very basic and familiar. For later he adds: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," etc. Again, "The wind blows where it wishes," etc.; this must be meant about the air; for the other part of the comparison follows: "So is every one who is born of the Spirit." ^{Joh 3.6,8}

Furthermore he adds: "If I tell you of earthly things, and you do not believe; how will you believe, if I tell you of heavenly things?" ^{Joh 3.12} But the argument which he put forth was not altogether earthly; for this is the argument of his whole disputation: "Unless a man is born from above he cannot see the kingdom of God:" ^{Joh 3.3} that is to say, unless a man is renewed, and as it were born again by the Spirit of God, which is given from above (that is to say, poured into him from heaven), he cannot be saved. The doctrine is altogether heavenly; but the means by which he delivered, declared, and presented this heavenly doctrine, is earthly. For by things taken from the earth, he shadowed out to man (who is coarse in understanding and earthly), a spiritual and heavenly thing, and laid it open to the view of his eyes, as it were. As the qualities of bodies are often changed by water and air, and as the effect and working of water and the air in bodies is marvellous; so likewise is the working of the Holy Ghost in the soul of man, which it changes, purifies, and quickens, etc. For so the Lord himself afterward expounds another parable about the Spirit (as I just told you).

Because all old writers, for the most part, understood water to mean sacramental water, that is, holy baptism, we also accept this interpretation. For we willingly grant that baptism is necessary to salvation, in those who are of mature age as well as babes or infants, so that necessity does not constrain the contrary. For otherwise, if with St. Augustine we stubbornly set about condemning infants by this passage, then truly we would also be compelled to condemn those who are baptized, if they depart this life without partaking of the body and blood of Christ. For St. Augustine, infected with a similar error, argues that the sacrament of the Lord's Supper be put into the infants' mouth,¹ or else they are in danger of death and damnation,² because it is written: "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you have no life in you." ^{Joh 6.53}

Therefore, he places these two sentences in this same order: "Unless a man is born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God;" and, "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man," etc. So that if you obstinately persist in St. Augustine's argument, truly you would condemn the whole church today, which denies the Lord's Supper to infants. But if a suitable interpretation is allowed in this, and the same place and reasoning are not disagreeable to it, why are you so rigorous and obstinate in another?

What would you say if, in this opinion, Augustine himself does not satisfy you, not in all and every point? A layman might think it is a venial sin ³ if he baptizes in time of necessity. He cannot tell whether it is reverently said that baptism ministered by a layman ought to be iterated or redone.⁴ But how much better and safer it would have been, letting the necessity of baptism pass, which has no lawful basis, in order to hold the opinion that infants, if they are not prevented by death, should be baptized by the minister of the church, in the church, with their parents procuring it at the first opportunity? And to hold that too speedy and sudden a death (which we call "the pinch of necessity") is no hindrance to salvation for those who are not yet baptized? Augustine trembles and is afraid to determine the punishment of damned infants for not being baptized; nor does he truly know what he might say with certainty. In his first book, De Anim. etc., cap. 9, he says: "Let no man promise to unbaptized infants a middle place of rest or felicity, whatever it is, or wherever it is, between hell and the kingdom of heaven." ¹ But that statement, for the most part, is accepted by all men. Thus the infants are buried in the churchyard in a certain middle place between the profane and holy ground.

And again Augustine writes, contra Julianum Pelagianum, Lib. v. cap. 8: "Those infants, of all others, will come in the easiest damnation." And immediately he adds: "Although I cannot describe what kind and how great that damnation will be, I dare not say it would be better for them not to be born, than to be there." ² And again, in his epistle to St. Jerome, 28, he says: "When I come to determine about the punishments of little infants, believe me, I am driven into narrow straits, nor do I find anything at all to answer." ³ Here also may be added that which he disputes about in Lib. iv. contra Donatist. cap. 22 and 23, touching the thief who was crucified with Christ. Among other things, Augustine says: "Baptism, then, is fulfilled invisibly, when it is not contempt of religion, but the point of necessity, that excludes and shuts one out from visible baptism." ⁴ Why then should we not also believe that baptism is invisibly performed in infants who depart by too timely a death, since it is not contempt of religion, but the extremity of necessity which cannot be avoided, that excludes and bars them from visible baptism? And since many today grant that any man of mature age may be saved without baptism, at the point of necessity, if he has a desire for baptism, why then may not the godly desires of the parents acquit their newly born infants from guiltiness? But this much up to here.

Touching this also, there has been bitter jarring, both in times past and in our age, concerning who is to be baptized. Pelagius in times past, denied that infants should be baptized, which we just heard.

Before Pelagius' time, Auxentius Arianus,⁵ with his sectaries, denied that infants are to be baptized.⁶ Some in the time of St. Bernard denied the same, as we may gather from his writings.⁷ The anabaptists today, the kind of men raised up of Satan to destroy the gospel, likewise deny it.⁸ But the catholic truth, which is delivered to us in the holy scriptures, simply pronounces that all those are to be baptized whom God acknowledges as his people, and it pronounces that they are partakers of purification or sanctification, or the remission of sins. For in this entire treatise concerning the sacraments I have already shown and now show that baptism is a badge or emblem of the people of God, and an assured token of our purification by Christ. Therefore, since the young babes and infants of the faithful are in the number or reckoning of God's people, and partakers of the promise touching purification through Christ; it follows of necessity, that they are to be baptized, as well as those who are of mature age who profess the Christian faith.

But there, a busy disputation begins. Who are the people of God, and partakers of the remission of sins by Christ? The disputation touches the secret election of God, and other hard questions that depend on this. But we can rid our hands of this briefly and simply. We say that the people of God are acknowledged either by men's confession of the Christian faith, or else by the bountiful promise of God.

BY MEN'S CONFESSION — for we acknowledge them to be the children of God, who now being grown to mature age, openly confess the true God, that God is their God, and that Jesus Christ is their Saviour. But this confession is made either unfeignedly, or hypocritically: unfeignedly when we confess, as St. Peter did, "You are Christ, the Son of the living God;" or when the eunuch says, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God." But this can be hypocritical, as when Simon Magus says in the Acts of the Apostles, that he believes in Jesus Christ.

Whether a man believes unfeignedly or hypocritically when he makes an open confession of his faith in Christ (God alone sees the secrets of the heart; for he alone is rightly believed to be the searcher of men's hearts), it does not belong to us, if he makes a right confession, to separate or cast him away from the people of God. For Philip did not cast off or push away Simon Magus; but upon his confession, he received him as a faithful man, and baptized him as a faithful man, even though indeed, and before God, he was a hypocrite. In the first sermon of this decade, ¹ we declared that hypocrites are also reckoned among those in the church, till they are revealed. But concerning remission of sins, only those among them of mature age, who unfeignedly believe, will obtain it. This is often shown in another place. St. Peter said to Simon Magus, even though he was baptized, "You have neither part nor fellowship in this business, because your heart is not right in the sight of God." Act 8.21

Furthermore, BY THE FREE AND BOUNTIFUL PROMISE OF GOD, and not only by the confession of men, we esteem and acknowledge the people of God. For to whomever the Lord promises that he will be their God, and whomever he receives and acknowledges as his own, those no man may exclude from the number of the faithful, without a horrible offence. And God promises that he will not only be the God of those who confess him, but of infants also; he promises to them his grace and remission of sins. Who therefore, challenging the Lord of all things, would yet deny that infants belong to God, are his, and that they are made partakers of purification through Christ? And that God acknowledges infants for his own, and sanctifies them, is made manifest by the very sum of the covenant. "I will make my covenant between me and you," says the Lord to Abraham, "and your seed after you in their generations, by an everlasting covenant; that I may be God to you, and to your seed after you." Gen 17.7 Circumcision is added as a sign of sanctification, which I spoke about abundantly when I treated circumcision in order.² Nor is there any reason why any man should fear that the promise is abrogated with circumcision and the ceremonies of the law, and that the covenant is broken and annihilated by the coming of Christ.

For we said just now, that Christ came to fulfil the promises of God, not to break them. Mat 5.17 And therefore, the Lord in the gospel speaks of infants, that is to say, those who have not yet confessed the faith, and says: "Suffer little children to come to me, and do not forbid them; for of such is the kingdom of God." Mat 19.14 And though it is said "of such," and not "of those;" yet no man is so ignorant as not to understand that there is a likeness between those things which are compared between themselves. Therefore, if the kingdom of God belongs to those who are of mature age because they have become like little children, then surely it follows of necessity, that the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven also belongs to infants or little children. For it follows in the gospel: "Whoever does not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in no way enter it." Mar 10.15 Therefore it behoves the heirs of the kingdom of God to first be infants or little children. And who does not know that no man, unless he is sanctified and purified, will enter into the kingdom of heaven? Children enter into the kingdom of God: therefore they are purified, namely, by the grace of God. For by their nature and birth they are unclean, and sinners; but for Christ's sake they are purified,¹ who said that he "came to seek and save that which was lost." Luk 19.10 Paul also expressly testifies that "by the sin of one, Adam, sin came on all men to condemnation; and that by the righteousness of one, Christ, good came upon all men to the righteousness ² of life." Rom 5.18 It is therefore certain that infants are partakers of purification and remission of sins through Christ, even though they do not confess remission of sins. What, does the Lord not say in the gospel, "It is not the will of your Father who is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish?" Mat 18.14 Again: "He who receives such a young child in my name, receives me; but he who offends one of these little ones who believe in me, it would be better that a millstone were hung about his neck," etc. Mat 18.6 See therefore, and "take heed, that you do not despise one of these little ones: for I say to you, that their angels in heaven always behold the face of my Father who is in heaven." Mat 18.10 Behold, what could be more manifestly spoken? It is not the will of my heavenly Father that infants should perish. Therefore he receives them freely into grace and favour, even though they have not yet confessed.

Moreover, he that receives such a little one (namely, whom he set in the midst of them) for Christ's sake, is said to receive Christ himself. Look, he attributes to the receivers of infants, what he promised to the receivers of the prophets. He adds: "But he who offends one of these little ones who believe in me..." He manifestly calls the little ones, who are not yet able to confess, believers, because, of his grace, he reposes them to be believers. Nor is this any wonder or strange thing, since God indeed imputes righteousness for faith, to those who are of mature age. For in all points, righteousness, acceptance, or sanctification, is free and imputative, so that the glory of his grace might be praised. Furthermore, his will is that little ones should not be despised, much less be cast out from among the number of the saints. Indeed, he affirms that angels are given to them to be their keepers. Though they are ministers of God's majesty, yet they are given and granted to little children to be their guard. So that hereby we may judge what great store the Lord sets by infants, and learn not to wipe them from the score of God's people, to whom the inheritance of life is due. We attribute nothing here to the birth which is after the flesh, but all things are attributed to the grace and promise of God. Now it is evident by all these testimonies, that the infants of the faithful are to be baptized, as well as those of mature age who confess the faith.

Now, on the contrary, the anabaptists contend that none is to be baptized, except he alone who is able both to be taught, and to believe, yes, and to confess his faith also. And to confirm this, they bring these sayings of our Saviour, out of St. Matthew, "Go therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father," etc. Mat 28.19 Out of Mark, "Go into the whole world, and preach the gospel to all creatures: he that believes and is baptized, shall be saved," etc. Mar 16.15-16

¹ As worded, this could mean either that all children of believers will be purified, or that all elect children of believers will be purified; either way, all children of believers are to be baptized. The sacrament is a sign and seal of the promise, just as circumcision was a sign and seal of the covenant (Gen 17.11). Yet, not all are Israel (Rom 9.6). Therefore, the sign, though applied universally, is not universally effective, then or now. That is, the sacrament cannot cause purification or salvation, just as Bullinger has consistently argued. That's why elect children dying before being baptized, are not in peril of damnation; for salvation is not by the will of man (nor by ceremony), but of God (Joh 1.13). Baptism is nonetheless necessary for infants as well as adults. It's a matter of obedience, not logical conclusions. – WHG

Behold, they say, teaching goes before baptism; therefore, those who are not able to be taught should not be baptized. Furthermore, to believe goes before, and to baptize follows after: infants do not believe, therefore they are not to be baptized. Upon all these, they heap examples out of the Acts of the Apostles, those which prove that it is the faithful, that is to say, those who confess their faith, who were baptized by the apostles.

They also reckon up the newly-instructed Christians ¹ of olden times, for whom (they say) if they had baptized infants, no place had been given. I answer: If the order of the words makes any difference in this matter, we also have some in readiness to serve our turn. For in Mark we thus read: "John baptized in the desert, preaching the baptism of repentance." ^{Mar 1.4} In this place we see that baptizing goes before, and preaching follows after. Yes, I would also show that the place which they allege for themselves out of Matthew, also makes an argument for us. For Matthew's words are these: "All power is given to me both in heaven and on earth," says the Lord. "Go therefore," and μαθητευσατε (matheteusate), that is to say, disciple (if I may coin a word); that is, make me disciples, or gather together all nations. Yes, he also teaches them the ways and means to gather disciples for him out of all nations, or gather all nations, by baptizing and teaching them. By baptizing and preaching, you will gather together a church for me. And he sets them out severally, one after the other, sweetly and shortly, saying: "Baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things which I have commanded you."

Now, therefore, baptism goes before teaching. But we do not gather from this, that only those nations which never heard anything before about God and the Son of God and the Holy Ghost, are to be baptized; nor would the apostles have borne that. But we allege these things to declare how fickle the foundation is on which the anabaptists build. And we simply say that what these men imagine, is not true: that the Lord commanded his apostles only to baptize them whom they taught. Nor does he point out here, who are to be baptized in the whole world;² but he speaks of those who are of mature age, and of laying the first foundations of faith and of the church among the gentiles, being as yet rude and altogether ignorant in religion. Those who are of mature age are able to hear preaching or teaching: infants are not. Those who are of mature age are able to believe and confess: infants are not. Therefore, he says nothing here about infants.

Yet they are not therefore debarred from baptism. It is a general law, "He that does not labour, let him not eat;" ^{2The 3.10} but who is so cruel and unnatural to think that therefore infants are to be starved to death? The Lord, when true religion began to be spread abroad, sent his apostles into all nations, to those who were ignorant of God and also strangers to the testaments of God. Truly, it behoved them not to baptize first, and teach afterward; but to teach first, and then baptize. If today we were to convert or turn the Turks to the faith of Christ, truly we should teach them first, and afterward baptize the servants of Christ and those who would yield themselves into his subjection. So the Lord himself, in times past, first renewed his covenant with Abraham, and instituted circumcision as a seal of the covenant; and Abraham was circumcised after that. But when he understood that infants were also partakers in the covenant, and that circumcision was the seal of the covenant, he afterward not only circumcised Ismael, being thirteen years of age, and all who were born in his own house, but also infants, among whom we reckon Isaac. Even so, the faithful who by the preaching of the gospel were turned from gentilism, and confessed Christ, were baptized. When they understood that their infants were counted among the people of God, and that baptism was the badge of God's people, they also had their infants baptized. As it is written of Abraham, that he circumcised all the male children in his house; so we often read in the Acts and writings of the apostles, that after the master of the house has turned to Christ, the whole family is baptized.

But concerning the newly-instructed Christians in olden times, they came from the Gentiles daily into the church, were instructed in the principles of faith (being ignorant of them), and afterward they were baptized. But the ancient fathers themselves nevertheless also baptized the infants of the faithful — which we will shortly declare.

Nor do they lawfully reason, when they conclude in this way: He who believes and is baptized, will be saved; infants do not believe; therefore they are not to be baptized. For again, it is certain that it is spoken of those who are of mature age, as in Matthew.

And because he requires faith and confession of faith by those who are of mature age, it does not follow from this that he requires the same of infants. For he accounts infants as his own, of his mere grace and free promise, without their confession. So that from the contrary, we reason thus: Those who believe are to be baptized (which our adversaries also confess); infants believe, for God reckons them among the faithful, as I manifestly proved before. Therefore, infants are to be baptized.

They object that infants do not understand the mystery of baptism; and therefore it is not only repugnant to religion, but to common sense and reason, to baptize infants; for to baptize an infant is to baptize a log, since neither of them has the use of reason. But these filthy knaves, let their tongues run at random against the very majesty of God. God commanded us to circumcise the infants; and circumcision contains high mysteries, which infants do not understand. But has God ordained anything against reason and common sense? Go, you false knaves, go with your blasphemies to the place which you deserve! It is a most filthy deed, yes, and more than barbarous, to compare infants to logs; for we already taught you out of the gospel, what great store God sets by infants. But men who now begin to use sound reason, are diligently and earnestly to be taught and admonished to remember that they are baptized, and to endeavour, by calling on the name of the Lord, in all points to be answerable in life and conversation to their promise and profession. For Abraham instructed his son Isaac, and all the holy fathers instructed their children.

But letting pass these brainsick, frantic, and foul-mouthed railers who (as we have heard) never lack words to wrangle, however much, however often, and however earnest a conference we have had with them, ¹ let us proceed to declare in a few yet manifest arguments, that infants are to be baptized, and that the apostles of Christ our Lord have baptized infants.

The Lord commanded us to baptize all nations, and therefore infants; for they are comprehended under the phrase "all nations." Again, whomever God reckons among the faithful are faithful. For Peter hears in a vision: "That which God has cleansed do not call common or unclean." ^{Act 10.15} God reckons infants among the faithful; therefore they are faithful: unless we would rather resist God, and seem to be stronger than He. And now we consider it beyond all controversy, that the apostles of Christ baptized those whom Christ commanded them to baptize. And he commanded to baptize the faithful; therefore the apostles baptized infants.

The gospel is greater than baptism: for Paul says, "The Lord sent me to preach the gospel, and not to baptize." ^{1Cor 1.17} It is not that he absolutely denied that he was sent to baptize, but because he preferred doctrine; for the Lord commended them both to his apostles. Furthermore, in the gospel children are received by God, and not refused. Who then, unless he is willfully obstinate, can debar them from the lesser of the two? In sacraments, the thing signified and the sign are both considered. The thing signified is more excellent; infants are not debarred from that. Who, then, would deny them the sign? Truly, the holy sacraments of God are more esteemed by the word than the sign. By the word we gather that women are not excluded from the supper of the Lord. Although we do not read that they were in the first institution, and sat at the first table of the Lord, nor that there is any express law which commands us to admit them to the supper — yet nevertheless, without fear or doubt, and by a perfect argument,¹ we admit them.

St. Peter could not deny the baptism of water to those whom he saw the Holy Ghost was given, which is an assured token of God's people. For he says in the Acts of the Apostles: "Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Therefore, the holy apostle Peter did not deny baptism to infants. For he assuredly knew by the doctrine of his Lord and Master (to say nothing now of the everlasting covenant of God), that the kingdom of heaven is for infants. No man is received into the kingdom of heaven, unless he is the friend of God; and these are not destitute of the Spirit of God: "For he who does not have the Spirit of Christ, is none of his." Rom 8.9

Children are God's; therefore they have the Spirit of God. And therefore, if they have received the Holy Ghost, as well as we; if they are accounted among the people of God, as well as we who are grown in age, then who, I ask, can forbid them from being baptized with water in the name of the Lord? At first the apostles murmured, not being sufficiently instructed then against those who brought infants to the Lord. But the Lord rebuked them, and said: "Suffer little children to come to me." Why then do the rebellious anabaptists not obey the commandment of the Lord? For what other things do they do today, who bring children to baptism, than what others did in times past, who brought infants to the Lord? And the Lord received them, laid his hands on them, and blessed them. To be short, by words and gestures, he notably signified that children are the people of God, and are most acceptable to God. But why then, they ask, did he not baptize them by the same means? Because it is written that "Jesus himself did not baptize, but his disciples did." Joh 4.2 Now, since it is so plainly determined from the thing signified, why do we still contend about the sign? Up to here, good men are satisfied; but contentious persons go on to busy themselves with questions.

Beside this, circumcision among the old people of God was given to infants; therefore baptism ought to be given to infants among the new people; for baptism took the place of circumcision. For St. Paul says: "By Christ you are circumcised with circumcision made without hands, by putting off the body of the flesh subject to sin, by the circumcision of Christ; buried with him in baptism." Col 2.11-12 Look, Paul calls baptism the circumcision of Christians, "made without hands;" not that water is not ministered by hands, but that no man is hereafter circumcised with hands, the mystery of circumcision nevertheless remaining in the faithful. Nor will you read any of the old interpreters of the church who have not confessed that baptism took the place of circumcision. Indeed, the likeness and similitude of them both, shows a manifest succession.

Join this to what I have said: the servants of God have always been careful to give the signs to those for whom they were ordained. That I may pass over all others, did not Joshua diligently provide that the people should be circumcised before they entered into the land of promise? And since the apostles, the preachers to the whole world, have been the faithful servants of Jesus

¹ ex syllogismo, Lat. – from a syllogism \(drawing a conclusion from two premises\).

Christ, who may hereafter doubt that they baptized infants, since baptism took the place of circumcision?

Undoubtedly, the apostles of Christ framed all their doings to the types and figures of the old Testament. Therefore it is certain that they framed baptism also, and therefore baptized infants, because they were in the figure of baptism; for the people of Israel went through both the Red sea and the river Jordan with their children. And though they are not always expressed in the holy scriptures, as women are not; they are comprehended and understood by them.

To this pertains what is clearly set down in the scriptures: that the apostles baptized whole houses or families. In houses, first of all, children are comprehended, as the greatest and most beautiful part of the house. So then, the apostles baptized children or little ones, and not only those of mature age. And it may be declared very easily that a house especially comprehends infants or little ones. First, out of Genesis 17, which I just alleged. Next, Joseph sent for Jacob his father with his whole house, out of the land of Canaan into the land of Egypt, lest his house have perished with hunger. There are many places of this kind in the law and the prophets, and in the whole scripture. But say there were no infants in those houses which the apostles baptized (which these janglers object); nevertheless, they pertain to the house, and they are counted part of it; so that if they had been in the house, without doubt they would have baptized them. Therefore, though they contend that they were not baptized in those families or houses, truly I say that the fault was neither in the children, as though they had been unworthy of baptism, nor in the apostles, as though they were not inclined to baptize infants; but simply because they were not present: for if they had been present, they would have been baptized. Why? Because the apostles baptized whole houses to which children did belong.

Now I can show by the writings of the old doctors, that baptism of infants has continued from the apostles' time even to us; nor was it ordained by any councils, or by the decrees of any pope, or any other men; but it was instituted and delivered by the apostles from the scriptures. Origen says, Lib. Enarrat. in Epist. Pauli ad Rom v. expounding the 6th chap.: "The church of Christ received baptizing infants from the apostles themselves."¹ St. Jerome mentions baptizing infants, Lib. iii. Contra Pelagianos,² and in his epistle to Laeta.³ St. Augustine cites the place of Chrysostom, cited by Julian, chap. ii.⁴ He also says to Jerome, Epist. 28: "St. Cyprian, making no new decree, but most steadfastly keeping the faith of the church, was of this opinion with certain of his fellow-bishops, that the new-born child might rightly be baptized."⁵ The place of Cyprian is to be seen in Epi. ad Fidum; as also I declared before, when I spoke of the time of baptism.⁶ The same Augustine against the Donatists, Lib. iv. cap. 23 and 24, boldly affirms, that "baptizing children was not fetched from the authority of men, or of councils, but from the tradition or doctrine of the apostles."⁷ Cyril, Lib. in Levit. viii. both approves the baptizing of children,⁸ and condemns re-baptism.⁹

I do not allege these to build baptizing children upon man's witness, but to teach that man's testimonies agree with the testimonies of God, and that the truth of antiquities is on our part. Lies and new forgeries are on the shameless anabaptists' side, who pretend that baptizing children was commanded by the pope.

Now I think it is not lost labour to say something about anabaptism. In the time that Decius and Gallus Caesar were emperors, there arose a question in parts of Africa about re-baptizing heretics. And St. Cyprian and the rest of the bishops, being assembled together in the council of Carthage, liked anabaptism well. But Cornelius, bishop of Rome, indeed a holy and learned man, and a martyr also, together with many other bishops of Italy, disapproved of it. For they would have heretics, after they had renounced their wicked opinions and confessed the right opinion, be cleansed only by the laying on of hands. You may read this in Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, Lib. vii. There is also extant a treatise of that matter in the Ecclesiastical Decrees, cap. 52.¹ But we must understand that St. Cyprian affirmed nothing obstinately in this cause. For in the end of his epistle to Jubaianus he writes: "These things I have briefly sent to you in writing, in our mean capacity, most dear brother, commanding no man to follow them, nor preventing any man's opinion; but that every bishop, having liberty of his own judgment, may do what he thinks best."² After that time, both the Arians and Donatists re-baptized. Historiographers write of this, especially Sozomenus, Lib. vi.,³ touching the Arians. Ecclesiastical writers also touch the same thing elsewhere in their works.

St. Augustine disputed with other learned men against the Donatists. There is also an imperial law made by Honorius and Theodosius, that holy baptism should not be iterated.⁴ Justin. Caes. has published that In Cod. Lib. i. Tit. 6, in these words: "If any minister of the catholic church is found to have rebaptized anyone, let both him who committed the unappeasable offence (at least if he is punishable by age), and also him who is won and persuaded to it, suffer punishment of death."⁵ Moreover, Valentin., Valens, and Gratianus, charged Florianus, superintendent of Asia, in these words:

"That same minister who by unlawful usage, iterates holy baptism, we account him unworthy of an ecclesiastical function. For we condemn their error, who tread underfoot the precepts of the apostles; and having obtained the sacraments in Christ's name, they do not purify again by a second baptism, but defile and deflower them under the name of cleansing."⁶ This much they say.

And truly, those who rebaptize and are rebaptized, both defile the name of God, which was invoked over the baptized in the former baptism, and cast from them the institution of God as vain and vicious. Christ, we read, was baptized but once. The apostles were not baptized twice. All the saints of God are baptized only once. Yes, those whom Judas baptized once, we do not read were baptized again by a worthier minister. For I showed in my last sermon, that the pureness of the sacraments does not depend upon the worthiness or unworthiness of the minister. Nor can you read that anyone in olden times was twice circumcised, not even those who were manifestly known to be circumcised by idolatrous priests before the reign of Hezekiah and Josiah. They were not baptized ¹ into idolatry, but into the covenant of the Lord God; which I admonished you about elsewhere.

Therefore, it is a horrible offence to iterate the ceremony of baptism, and it is without example. Nor is there any necessity in this matter. For to what end is it to baptize again, when baptism once given is sufficient for the whole course of a man's life? Beside this; since anabaptism is nothing but a confederacy, conspiracy, and certain linking together by one mark into a new and seditious, or at least superstitious, company; into a new and schismatic church; and into a new and strange kind of doctrine. It is as contrary as can be to the doctrine of Christ and his apostles; truly it is no marvel that the obstinate anabaptists are suppressed and punished by common laws. For otherwise these things are damnable, and not to be ignored or suffered by a Christian magistrate.

The anabaptists quickly object using these two places. The first is out of the fifth chapter of Joshua, where we read in these words: "Make sharp knives (of stone), and go to again, and circumcise the children of Israel the second time." Behold, they could not be circumcised the second time, they say, unless they had been circumcised before. I answer: To circumcise the second time, or to do a thing once again, does not signify to do that which was done before. For once the foreskin was cut off, how could it be cut off again? Therefore, what was left undone for a certain space is now again renewed, and so it is said to be done the second time. So that the second time is not applied to those who should be circumcised, but to the time in which those who were uncircumcised should be circumcised. For they were first solemnly circumcised in Egypt, before they ate the Passover. Now, entering into the land of Canaan, those are solemnly circumcised "the second time," who were not previously circumcised, because of the wilderness and journeying. And so it immediately follows in the same chapter, that all the males who came out of Egypt died in the wilderness, and their sons were uncircumcised; so that now it was expedient for them to be circumcised, as their fathers were before them. The anabaptists thus have no defence at all in this testimony of the law.

The latter testimony to maintain anabaptism, or rebaptizing, they bring out of the 19th chapter of Acts; where they say that those twelve men of Ephesus were once baptized by Apollos with the baptism of water, and likewise with that of John's; but the same men afterward are rebaptized by Paul in the name of Christ. ^{Act 19:1-7} I answer that those twelve men were not baptized again by Paul with water; they were baptized with water once, which was sufficient for them. But neither could Paul minister another baptism of water than that of John's. For I taught and evidently proved, shortly after the beginning of this sermon, that the baptism of water ministered by John, Christ, and his apostles, is one and the same. I declared there, that the baptism of fire, or of the Spirit, is peculiar and proper to Christ. Therefore, those men of Ephesus were baptized with the baptism of water, as the Samaritans were by Philip; but they were not yet fully instructed about the baptism of fire, nor were they baptized with fire. Indeed, they confess that they do not know whether there is any such baptism, that is, whether there is a holy Ghost who in the visible form of fire, should come down upon men. For they could not be altogether ignorant that there was a Holy Ghost, without whom, undoubtedly, they would not have believed; indeed, in whom they would have believed if they had rightly believed. Therefore, they were only ignorant of that baptism of fire. As Peter and John laid their hands on the Samaritans, and they immediately received the Holy Ghost, so Paul lays hands on the men of Ephesus, and they received the Holy Ghost. For Luke says: "When they heard these things, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus." ^{Act 19:5} And lest any man understand this to mean the baptism of water, he later adds the manner of it in a plain exposition, saying: "And when Paul had laid his hands on them, the Holy Ghost came upon them." This, I say, he called baptizing in the name of the Lord Jesus; for it follows: "And they spoke with tongues, and prophesied." This has always been the fruit and effect of the baptism of fire in the primitive church, as I declared shortly after the beginning of this sermon. Therefore, the anabaptists have no testimony out of the scriptures for their anabaptism, nor for re-baptizing. So that all who gather their wits about them, plainly see that they are to be forsaken and shunned by all good men. But it seems we have sufficiently disputed against them. Now we go forward to expound those things that remain to be opened touching baptism, which are not the last and of least account.

Now that we have come to treat the virtue and efficacy of baptism, we will follow that order which we outlined in the description of baptism, knitting up at least the particulars,¹ because we have spoken largely of them in the general consideration of sacraments. Yet nevertheless, it is good, first of all, to know what the adversaries of the church have sometimes thought touching the force of baptism.

The Manicheans baptized none of their sect; for they taught that baptism availed the receivers nothing towards salvation.² The Seleucians, who are called also Hermiani, likewise treated baptism as nothing.³ The Messalians, who are called Euchetes, or prayer-makers (as I showed at the end of my former sermon), and the Enthusiastes, inspired, I say, by some heavenly power (or rather by some hellish fury), are persuaded that baptism neither profits nor hinders any man. For so they attributed all means of salvation to the inward working of the Spirit, yes, to man's prayers, so much that they loathed and abhorred all outward helps, yes, and doctrine also, as unprofitable and without force. Theodoret in his Ecclesiastical History, Lib. iv. cap. 11, repeats as much from them.⁴

But the holy scripture teaches that we are washed clean from our sins by baptism; for baptism is a sign, a testimony and sealing, of our cleansing. For God truly has promised sanctification to his church, and for his truth's sake, he purifies his church from all sins by his grace through the blood of his Son, and he regenerates and cleanses it by his Spirit; this cleansing is sealed in us by baptism, which we receive.

And from this, the scriptures call it cleansing, and remission of sins, purifying, new birth, regeneration, and the laver or fountain of regeneration — just as circumcision is called the covenant; and sacrifices are called sins and sanctifications. For we read in the gospel of St. Mark: "John baptized in the desert, preaching the baptism of repentance, for the remission of sins." ^{Mar} 1.4 The same is also mentioned in Luke 3.3. In the gospel of John, the third chapter, baptism is called purifying. In the Acts of the Apostles, Peter says to the people who demanded what they should do: "Repent, and let every one of you be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins." ^{Act 2.38} Ananias also says to Paul: "Arise, and be baptized, and wash away your sins, in calling on the name of the Lord." ^{Act 22.16} And now Paul himself says: "Christ loved the church, and gave himself for it, to sanctify it, when he had cleansed it, in the fountain of water in the word." ^{Eph 5.25-26} Thus the promise, indeed, the truth of sanctification and free remission of sins, is written and engraved in our bodies when we are baptized. For God by his Spirit, through the blood of his Son, has newly regenerated and purged again our souls, and even now regenerates and purges them.

And baptism is sufficient and effectual for the whole life of man; yes, and it reaches and is referred to all the sins of all those who are baptized. For the promise of God is true. The seal of the promise is true, not deceivable. The power of Christ is ever effectual to thoroughly cleanse and wash away all the sins of those who are his. However often we have sinned in our lifetime, let us call to remembrance the mystery of holy baptism, with which we are washed for the whole course of our life, that we might know and not doubt that our sins are forgiven by the same God and our Lord. Yes, and forgiven by the blood of Christ, into whom we are grafted once by baptism, that he might always work salvation in us, till we are received out of misery into glory. Nor is there any doubt that his whole life, Abraham had the mystery of circumcision continually in his mind, and rested in God and the seed promised to him. Yet I think that what St. Augustine often pithily and plainly cited, should be diligently marked: ¹

"Our sins are forgiven, or purged, in baptism — not that they are no longer in us (for as long as we live, concupiscence bears sway, and always breeds and produces in us something like itself) — but that they should not be imputed to us. Nor that we may not sin,² but that it should not be hurtful for us to have sinned, and that our sins may be remitted when they are committed, and not suffered to be continued." ³

De Fide et Operib. cap. 20. And Gratian also recites many more of this kind, Distinct, iv. de Consecrat. ⁴

Beside that, by baptism we are gathered together into the fellowship of the people of God. Thus some call it the first sign or entry into Christianity,⁵ by which an entrance into the church lies open to us. It is not that we did not belong to the church before: for whoever is of Christ, and a partaker of the promises of God and of his eternal covenant, belongs to the church. Baptism is therefore a visible sign and testimony of our ingrafting into the body of Christ; and it is rightly called a planting, incorporating, or ingrafting into the body of Christ. For I said in the general discourse about sacraments, that by baptism we were first joined with Christ, and afterward joined with all the members of Christ, our brethren. For Paul says: "All you who are baptized have put on Christ." ^{Gal 3:27} But to put on Christ is to be made one with him, and to be joined and incorporated in him as it were, that he may live in us and we in him. ⁶ For he alone by his Spirit regenerates and renews us, and most liberally enriches us with all manner good gifts; which the same apostle in another place expresses in these words: "God saved us by the fountain of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he shed on us richly through Jesus Christ our Saviour." ^{Tit 3:5-6}

Yes, and therefore Christ our Lord is baptized in our baptism, to declare that he is our brother, and we are joint-heirs with him. ^{Rom 8:17} Therefore, St. Augustine said very well: "Baptism is thus far forcible: that being baptized, we are incorporated into Christ and counted his members." ⁷ The same Augustine calls baptism "the sacrament of Christian fellowship." ⁸ For we are visibly gathered again by baptism into the unity of one body with all the faithful, as many as have been,

are, and shall be. For Paul also says: "By one Spirit we are all baptized into one body."¹Cor 12.13 And it follows from this, that baptism serves for our confession, and is rightly called the token of Christian religion. For it is a badge or emblem, by which we witness and profess that we consent and are linked into Christian religion. We confess that by nature, we are sinners and unclean, but sanctified by the grace of God through Christ. For if we were clean by nature, then what need did we have for any cleansing? But now, since we are cleansed, who doubts the truth of God? Therefore, when we receive baptism, we truly and freely confess both our sin in which we were born, and also the free forgiveness of sins.

Lastly, the remembrance and consideration of the mystery of baptism puts us in mind of the duties of Christianity and ¹ godliness — that is to say, to weigh diligently with ourselves all our life long, whose body we are made members of, to deny ourselves and this world, to mortify our flesh with its concupiscences, and to be buried with Christ into his death, that we may rise again in newness of life, and live innocently; to love our brethren as our members, with whom, by baptism, we are knit together into one body; to remain in the bond of concord and in the unity of the church, and not to follow strange religions; being mindful that we are baptized into Christ, to whom alone we are consecrated, and far separated and divided from all other gods, worships, or religions, and, in short, from all heresies.

Let us also think that we must constantly and valiantly fight against Satan.² Therefore, as often as we remember we are baptized with Christ's baptism, so often are these things put into our minds, and we are admonished of our duty. But the apostle handles this matter more at large in the sixth chapter of his epistle to the Romans, where he expressly mentions that by baptism, we are made grafts of Christ, that is to say, that we might grow out of him as branches out of the vine, and feel in our minds and bodies, both the death and resurrection of Christ.

For since we are endued with the Spirit of Christ who works in us, our body truly dies daily, but our spirit lives and rejoices in Christ. To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

5-9. THE NINTH SERMON: OF THE LORD'S HOLY SUPPER.

OF THE LORD'S HOLY SUPPER; WHAT IT IS, BY WHOM, WHEN, AND FOR WHOM IT WAS INSTITUTED; IN WHAT WAY, WHEN, AND HOW OFTEN IT IS TO BE CELEBRATED, AND ITS ENDS. OF THE TRUE MEANING OF THE WORDS OF THE SUPPER, "THIS IS MY BODY." OF THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST IN THE SUPPER. OF THE TRUE EATING OF CHRIST'S BODY. OF THE WORTHY AND UNWORTHY EATERS OF IT: AND HOW EVERY MAN OUGHT TO PREPARE HIMSELF FOR THE LORD'S SUPPER.

To the holy baptism of our Lord Christ, is coupled the sacrament of the body and blood of our Lord, which we call the Lord's Supper.¹ For those whom the Lord has regenerated with the laver of regeneration, he also feeds with his spiritual food, and nourishes them unto eternal life. Therefore, it necessarily follows that next we treat the holy supper of the Lord.

This has many names, even as the feast of Passover does, and it is instituted in its place. In olden times it was called,² The passing over, or the Lord's Passover; which was indeed a memorial of the Passover — also, a remembrance, sign, solemnity, a festival or holy day, a meeting together, or a holy assembly, an observation or worshipping, a ceremony and sacrifice of Passover: a sacrifice or offering. We have spoken of this in a convenient place.³ This is called "the Lord's Supper" by St. Paul the apostle, because this ceremony was instituted by the Lord at his last supper, and because it is offered to us as a spiritual banquet. Paul terms it "the Lord's table," and doubtless for no other causes. Paul also called it the communion; not so much because we have communion or fellowship with Christ, and he with us, as because, being many, we are one bread and one body, who partake of the same bread. Luke calls it the "breaking of bread," naming the whole by a part. And it is evident that our forefathers of old did not give a morsel to the receivers of the Lord's Supper, but they broke the bread among themselves. In time past, firm leagues were performed by breaking bread. It is also called a memorial and remembrance of the Lord's passion; for the Lord said: "Do this in remembrance of me." Luk 22.19 It is named a thanksgiving, because when we celebrate the Lord's Supper, we thank him for all his benefits, and especially for his death, by which we are redeemed. It is called also a token and a mystery, and a sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord. Our forefathers termed it by this word synaxis. Synaxis is a joining together, a knitting, a closing, or an agreement. For the church is joined and united to Christ in the holy supper by a most strait league. And to conclude, the members are joined very fast together with it.

Furthermore, it is called an assembly of saints, a holy company, and a gathering together. For in olden times, it was never customarily celebrated except in the common assembly of the church; this is plainly proved by the words of the apostle in 1Cor. 11.20-29. To conclude, we do not offend

² More correctly: even as the feast of the passover, into the place of which it is instituted, was called, etc.

at all, if we call the supper of our Lord the testament and will of God and of our Lord. For in this sacrament you will find all things that belong to a full and perfect testament. For Christ is the testator; all faithful Christians are appointed heirs; the legacy is the forgiveness of sins and life everlasting, obtained by the body of Christ given, and his blood shed. The letters or table of this testament or will, are the words of the Lord's Supper, witnessing by a public writing as it were, that Christ is the food and life of the faithful; the order and observance of it is the seal, as it were.

Therefore, just as we call that which has sealed letters, a testament — it contains a testament both by writing and sealing — so the Lord himself called his supper a testament; for "this cup," he said, "is the new testament in my blood." Luk 22.20 For the new testament is the remission of sins, which Jeremiah the prophet plainly testifies in the 31st chapter, Jer 31.31-35 and Paul to the Hebrews, in the 8th chapter. Heb 8.8-13 This holy mystery has various other names; but these for the most part are the chief and most commonly used. We will speak elsewhere of the other names.

They define (for the most part) the Lord's Supper as a spiritual banquet, with which the Lord both keeps his death in remembrance, and also feeds his people unto life everlasting. But let me set down a larger description of it for you. The supper of the Lord is a holy action instituted for the church, from God, in which the Lord, by setting bread and wine before us at the banquet, certifies to us his promise and communion, shows us his gifts, lays them before our senses; visibly gathers us together into one body, and in short, would have his death kept in remembrance by the faithful; he admonishes us of our duty, and especially of praise and thanksgiving.

First, we say that the supper of the Lord is an action or deed. For when the Lord made his supper, he gave thanks to God; he broke bread and gave the cup, and said, "Do this in remembrance of me." Yet, it cannot be every action. For at the table where we eat meat, we also give thanks to God, and we break bread and give the cup — but it is a holy action, because it is from God and instituted for the church. Therefore, it far differs from our ordinary suppers; for it is specially instituted by the Son of God for the church; and also because it has the word of God and the peculiar example of Christ. Therefore St. Paul, differentiating between this and common eating, says: "If any man hungers, let him eat at home; lest you come together to your condemnation." 1Cor 11.34 And again: "Do you not have houses to eat and drink in?" 1Cor 11.22 As if he had said, This supper is mystical. Again, what manner of action it is, immediately appears by what follows, where the Lord, by setting bread and wine before us at the banquet, assures us of his promise and communion, etc. This supper, therefore, has his peculiar limits. Although I spoke of them generally when I treated the virtue of the sacraments, I will repeat certain ones that most serve this purpose, when I draw toward an end of this sermon.

But concerning the description of this supper, these things are chiefly to be considered and declared. First, who instituted it, and who the true author and maker ¹ of the Lord's Supper is. It is not any man, but the very Son of God himself, the wisdom of the Father, very God and man. So that, we do not come to the table of men, even though the minister is the chief man there; nor do we receive holy signs at the hands of the minister only, but also at the hand of our Lord himself;² whose guests we are, if we are faithful. He has consecrated the supper for us, and yet he consecrates it by his holy word, his will, and his power. We spoke of this before. And because the faithful understand and know these things, they sit down to the holy and heavenly banquet with Christ, being wholly occupied in heavenly things, both in mind and soul.

² accumbentes ad mensam Christi Domini nostri, Lat. seeing we sit down at the table of Christ our Lord.

He instituted the supper the same night he was betrayed; and the next night by his death and blood-shedding, he confirmed the new testament. For as soon as he had eaten the figurative lamb with his disciples, and had plainly told them that from that time forward, this ceremony should not be used, the supper was established in place of what was abolished. Just as the bloody lamb signified that Christ would suffer, even so the bread, which is without blood, witnesses that Christ (who is the bread of life) is already baked upon the cross, and has suffered, and been made food for all believers. Therefore, that night was worthy to be observed and celebrated, and that last supper is full of mysteries. For commonly, we most of all account the words and deeds of our dearest friends, which they use just before their death. Therefore, just as all Christ's doings are beloved and precious to us, so ¹ his last supper should be most dearly beloved and precious in our sight.

The supper consists of the word and manner, the promise and ceremony. The word is this: that Christ is preached to have been given up to death for our sins, and that he shed his blood for the remission of our sins. Promise is made to all who believe, that their offences will be forgiven. The same thing is also expressed by the manner. The manner is diligently set down in writing by St. Matthew, Mark, and Luke, from whom St. Paul did not at all vary. I will recount the words to you, dearly beloved, as they are gathered out of these four into one text:

"The same night, in the evening in which he was betrayed, the Lord came with the twelve; and when it was time, he sat down, and the twelve with him. And while they were eating, Jesus took bread; and when he had given thanks, he broke it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, Take, and eat; this is my body which is given (or broken) for you. Do this in remembrance of me. Likewise taking the cup (after he had supped), he gave thanks, and delivered it to them saying: Take this, and divide it among you; drink you all of it. And they drank all of it.

And he said to them, This is my blood, which is of the new Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of their sins. This cup is the new Testament in my blood (which is shed for you). Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me. Truly I say to you, that I will not drink again of the fruit of the vine, until that day comes that I drink it anew with you in my Father's kingdom."

These are, word for word, the solemn and most holy words of the Lord spoken at his last supper.

The high bishop of the catholic church, Christ our Lord, celebrated his supper with his disciples in this way, as we have now seen and heard, without any pomp — simply, plainly, and sparingly. He took away the over-busy ceremony of the law, appointing another, very easy to be had, and not at all sumptuous. Most things pertaining to the law were troublesome, and all belonging to the gospel was easy, with nothing sumptuous. The Lord sits down with his twelve disciples. By this we learn that, first of all, there must be a company gathered together, which must celebrate the supper. The Lord does these things in his assembly. First of all, he preaches most diligently to his disciples, about those things especially which concern the mystery of his passion and of our redemption. And wherever we find the preaching and hearing of the word of God or of the gospel of Christ, there are also groanings and vows or prayers of the faithful.

Therefore, those who intend to celebrate the supper of the Lord, before all things, according to the example and institution of the high bishop Christ our Lord, they most diligently hear the preaching of the gospel, and also pray most earnestly. Afterward he took bread; and the Lord blessed it and broke it; moreover, he gave it to his disciples, and bid them to eat. Shortly he shared the cup among them, commanding them all to drink of it. And thereupon he plainly and expressly commanded them, saying, "Do this;" namely, as you have seen me do. Therefore, the disciples ate the bread, and drank all of the cup. Therefore, those who celebrate the Lord's Supper lawfully, one to another, break, distribute, and eat the Lord's bread, which they receive at the hands of Christ's ministers; and likewise, they distribute and drink all of the Lord's cup, which they receive at the hands of Christ's ministers.

And as the high bishop Christ bid them to do it in remembrance of him, so those who celebrate the Lord's Supper remember the death of Christ and all his benefits. Moreover, as the Lord has gone before us in his example, in giving thanks to God the Father, so likewise the faithful end this holy mystery by giving thanks, and praising his goodness and mercy because he is good, and his mercy endures for ever. This is the simplest and best manner of the Lord's Supper, which the apostles received from Christ, and delivered to be observed by all nations.

Therefore, when these questions are asked — whether it is lawful to sup according to another rite or manner; whether it is lawful to add to or take anything from the manner that was left and delivered, or to change anything in it; whether the supper of the Lord should only be celebrated in the manner already delivered and not in any other — there is no small folly and rashness; indeed, there is rather great ungodliness betrayed in this. For what end is served by the simplest, plainest, best, and most perfect form of the supper, that was delivered by the Lord himself, and received by his apostles, if we devise another? Who, I ask you, would deliver a better one than the Son of God himself, the high priest of the catholic church, has already delivered? Or who, I beseech you, in his right wits, would either add to or take anything from the ordinance of God? Who dares to be so bold as to change what is delivered by the everlasting wisdom of God? All the sayings and doings of Christ are most perfect. Therefore, the form of the Lord's Supper is also a most perfect form of a right singular and excellent ordinance or institution. The rites or ceremonies of celebrating the sacraments of the old Testament were most perfect. They were so delivered from their first institution, that nothing was added to or taken from them by those who were religious, not even many years after. For Hezekiah the king celebrated the Passover; so likewise Josiah celebrated it; but not according to any other rite or manner than what was delivered from Moses. The fathers circumcised their infants; but not according to any other manner or rite than what was first instituted. In times past, whoever had not sacrificed in the same place and according to the same manner which God commanded by Moses, was accused of murder under the law.

Nadab and Abihu are struck with lightning from heaven for bringing strange fire into the tabernacle. Uzzah is struck with sudden death, for the ark of the Lord of hosts was not handled in the way commanded by the law. And therefore, that manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper, as it was instituted by the Lord and delivered to the church by the apostles, is to be observed with great religion. That is, unless we believe that the institutions and manners of celebrating our sacraments are more imperfect than those of olden times; or that God the Father less regards the profanation or religious observation of his Son's institution now-a-days, than those of Moses and the fathers in olden times. But Paul, the vessel of election, knows that Christ's institution is most perfect, and that it should still be kept simply and without any addition in the church. He says to the Corinthians: "I received from the Lord, that which I also delivered to you." ^{1Cor 11.23} For he thought it a heinous offence, to deliver anything else to the church than what he had received from the Lord. Therefore, let us hold fast with great religion, what was delivered to us by the Lord and the apostles. For the apostle delivered nothing else to the Corinthians — indeed, many years after the Lord's ascension into heaven — than what was faithfully set down for us in writing by the holy apostles and evangelists, St. Matthew, Mark, and Luke.

Certainly, it is well known how for a hundred years after the death of the apostles, this simple manner of celebrating the Lord's Supper was held in the church. For the pastor or minister of the church, after he had preached the gospel, and given public thanks to God in open prayer, then came out into the midst of the holy assembly. Before the face of the people stood a table furnished with bread and wine, behind which the minister stood and blessed the people, saying, "The Lord be with you." The people answered, "And with your spirit," Then the minister replied, "Lift up your hearts;" admonishing the congregation that the holy mysteries are to be celebrated, and therefore they must lift up their minds from visible things to invisible.

The people answered: "We lift them up to the Lord." Afterwards, exhorting the whole company to give thanks, he cried aloud: "Let us give thanks to the Lord our God." The congregation answered, "It is fitting and right to do so." Then the minister proceeded, saying: "It is very fitting and right, our bound duty, and it behoves us," (turning himself then to the Lord,) "that we give thanks always, and in all places to you, Lord, holy Father, almighty and everlasting God, through Christ our Lord, who the day before he suffered his passion, took bread, gave thanks, broke it, and gave it to his disciples;" with the remainder, as follows in the gospel. These things being repeated out of the gospel, the minister proceeded further, saying: "Let us pray. Being admonished by wholesome precepts, and instructed by divine institution, we are emboldened to say, Our Father, which art in heaven," etc. After the recital of the holy mysteries,¹ the people received the holy mysteries and communed together; and after they had given thanks and praised God, they were dismissed. And there remain to be seen certain footsteps of this form in the writings of the ancient fathers, namely, in St. Cyprian, St. Augustine, and others. But in latter times, the prayers, blessings, and ceremonies grew to be very great. Moreover, Christ's institution was changed, and turned into a strange use; and in fine, the mass was patched together, in which there appears but little antiquity. But I have treated these matters very largely in another place,² and you yourselves are very well seen in this point. We who defend and hold that the institution of our Lord Christ, which was delivered to us by the apostles, is most pure and perfect, do not regard either what any man, or any bishop, has at any time added to the holy rite, or taken away or changed. Rather, we regard what the one who is before and above all, first commanded to be done. If the authority of him that instituted it, or if learning and holiness, or if antiquity, may be of force, then the victory is ours, who have Christ on our side with the best chosen company of the apostles. For from these, we have what we celebrate; and what we hold, all godly men ought to celebrate.

Why the Lord instituted this mystery under the form of bread and wine, is evident. For bread comforts, and wine makes glad, the heart of man. I also touched on this, where I treated the proportion and agreement of the sacraments.³ Moreover, our fathers in the figure of manna, ate bread which rained down from heaven. Also, they used bread and wine in their gratulatory sacrifices, and those of thanksgiving, and in their drink-offerings. But there has sprung a great contention concerning the substance of the Lord's Supper; some holding the opinion that it ought to be celebrated with unleavened bread, and others, with leavened bread.

But among our forefathers of old, there was no such contention about these; for the churches used both indifferently as it pleased them. It may seem that at the first supper the Lord used unleavened bread at the table, according to the ancient manner of celebrating the Passover; upon which many churches used unleavened bread.⁴ Notwithstanding, they did not condemn others of heresy who used leavened bread. The pope and his adherents, conceiving no small displeasure at this,⁵ have deeply accursed the Greek church for so trifling a matter. But the Artotyrites were justly condemned by the ancient fathers; Epiphanius ¹ mentions them, between the Pepuzianes and the Priscillians, setting bread and cheese upon the table in their celebrating, contrary to Christ's institution.

It is further disputed whether unmingled wine, or wine mingled with or diluted with water, is to be used at the supper by the faithful.

Cyprian the martyr holds the opinion that in this mystery ² the wine should not be unmingled, but diluted with water, and be so offered — that is to say, drunk by the faithful. For thus he has written:

"Because Christ has borne us all, and also bore our sins, we may perceive that in the water, the people are to be understood; and in the wine, the blood of Christ is to be understood. For when water is mingled with the wine in the cup, the people are united to Christ; and the multitude of the believers is coupled and joined to him in whom they believe. And thus, in blessing the Lord's cup, water alone may not be offered, nor in the same way may wine alone be offered. For if any man offers only wine, the blood of Christ begins to be without us; but if it is water only, then the multitude begins to be without Christ. But when they are both mingled together, and are joined with a thorough mixture between them, then a heavenly and spiritual sacrament is wrought there." ³

By these words truly St. Cyprian shows us a good mystery. But why do we seek to be wiser than Christ, and to mingle together ⁴ more mysteries than we have received from him? The holy scripture mentions no water, but rather it reports that the Lord used nothing else but mere wine. For the Lord says: "Truly I say to you that henceforth I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine." ^{Mar 14.25} Plainly, ⁵ he did not say the wine, but, "the fruit of the vine," so that we would not mingle it in any way. But what if that holy martyr of God, St. Cyprian himself, has laboured by all the means he might, to show that what is to be followed by the faithful in celebrating the Lord's Supper, is only what they have received from our Lord Christ himself?

And because that testimony greatly supports our treatise concerning Christ's supper — that it is to be celebrated according to the words of the gospel — I will recite it word for word out of the second epistle of the 3rd book of Cyprian's Epistles.

"We must not depart in any respect from the doctrine of the gospel. And those things that our Master taught and did himself, the scholars should also observe and do. The blessed apostle in another place speaks more constantly and stoutly, saying, 'I marvel that you are so soon changed from him that called you to grace, to another gospel, which is nothing else; but there are some who trouble you, and set about to overthrow the gospel of Christ. However, if we ourselves, or an angel from heaven, preach to you any other thing than what we have taught, let him be accursed. As I have said before, so I now say again, If any man preaches any other thing to you than what you have received, let him be accursed.' ^{Gal 1.6-8} Since, therefore, neither the apostle himself, nor an angel from heaven, can preach or teach other than what Christ himself has once taught and his apostles have preached, then I greatly marvel from where this custom has grown that in some places, contrary to the doctrine of the gospel and the apostles, water is offered in the Lord's cup, which being taken alone, cannot express the Lord's blood."

And again:

"There is no cause, dearly beloved brother, that any man should think that the custom of certain men is to be followed, if there are any who up to now have supposed that water alone is to be offered in the Lord's cup. For it must be demanded of them, whom they have followed in this. For if in the sacrifice, which is Christ, none is to be followed but Christ, then doubtless we ought to hearken to and do what Christ has done and commanded to be done, since he himself says in his gospel: 'If you do what I command you to do, I will no longer call you servants, but friends.' Joh 15.14-15 And that Christ alone should be heard, the Father himself also witnesses from heaven, saying, 'This is my well-beloved Son, in whom I have delight: hear him.' Mar 9.7 Therefore, if only Christ is to be heard, we should not regard what any others before us have thought it fit for us to do, but what Christ first did, who is before all others. Nor in any case should we follow the custom of men, but the truth of God; considering what the Lord said by the prophet Isaiah, 'They worship me in vain, teaching the commandments and doctrine of men.' Mat 15.9

v.413

Again, the Lord repeats the same words in the gospel, saying: 'You set God's commandments aside, to establish your own traditions.' Mar 7.9 And in another place he says: 'He that breaks any one of the least of these commandments, and in this sort teaches men, shall be accounted least in the kingdom of heaven.' Mat 5.19 If it is not lawful to break the least of the commandments of God, then how much more heinous is it to break things so great, so weighty, and so much belonging to the Lord's passion and the sacrament of our redemption — or to change it into any other order by man's traditions, than is instituted by God?" ¹

And so forth as follows.

No man can deny that these things have no authority against the author himself. For neither by the scriptures, nor by the example of Christ, can it be proved that water was mingled with the wine at the supper. As for the authorities and testimonies which the author allows, every man may perceive how little they serve the purpose; indeed, that they are twisted from their natural meaning. The gospel plainly pronounces that the Lord drank of the fruit of the vine with his disciples. And as often as Paul mentions the cup, in no place does he teach that water was mingled with the wine, or that it ought to be mingled with it. Therefore, these water-men, that is to say, those who use only water in celebrating the Lord's Supper, are justly condemned: such as the Marcionites and Tatians were.² However, it is an indifferent matter whether you use red wine or white in the supper.

Again, why did the Lord not deliver the sacrament of the supper to us under one form, bread or wine only, but rather under both kinds? The doctors of the church by one consent suppose this is the cause: that he would signify, or rather testify, to us that he took both soul and flesh upon himself, and gave them both for us, and has also delivered our souls and flesh from everlasting destruction. For although there are two kinds, they make but one sacrament, and they may not be separated. Nor is their opinion or judgment to be allowed, who of their own private authority, or rather sacrilegious authority, corrupt the institution of Christ. They offer only the one kind to lay people who communicate: the bread. And they grant both kinds to priests; and so they claim both kinds for themselves alone.¹ But the apostle Paul received the authority from the Lord himself, to admit all the faithful people of Christ to the Lord's cup. Therefore, let these bold fellows consider from whom they received the command to exclude the laity, and to forbid them the cup which is granted to them by the Lord our God.

For Christ in plain words — as it were by the spirit of prophecy, foreseeing what would come to pass in the church — did not say of the bread, "Eat you all of this;" but when he took the cup he added, "Drink you all of this." St. Mark also adjoins to this, not without deep judgment, "And they all drank of it." Mar 14.23 To this also pertains what the Lord says in St. Luke: "Take this, and divide it among you." Luk 22.17 St. Paul the apostle, having a special regard for this excellent and plain institution of Christ, three or four times joins the cup to the bread, saying: "As often as you eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, you express the Lord's death." Again: "Whoever eats of this bread, or drinks of the Lord's cup unworthily, will be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." And again he says: "Let a man examine himself, and then let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup." Again: "Whoever eats and drinks unworthily," etc. 1Cor 11.26-29 These testimonies are manifold, and are worthy to be believed absolutely; and to which all traditions of all men whatsoever, should give way. The Lord instituted the cup of the supper for all the faithful; therefore the apostles presented it to all the faithful. For if the sacrament of the blood of Christ were given to the apostles only, then surely the thing itself, namely, the remission of sins which is obtained through Christ's blood, belongs only to the apostles. However, the Lord says plainly: "This is the blood of the new Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Mat 26.28 It is also manifestly set down in other places of the scripture, that Christ's blood was shed for the remission of the sins of all the faithful. Therefore, if the laity is capable of the thing, then how much more the sign of it? Now if our adversaries proceed further and say that only the apostles sat at the supper (who represented the figure of the priests), and that the use of the cup was granted only to them, and is not to be granted to others, but only to those who were present at the first supper — then we demand of them, by what authority they give the Lord's bread to the laity, or by what right do they admit "simple women" to the Lord's Supper? For it is manifest that neither the one nor the other sat at the Lord's table (according to their statements in this matter).

And in this point, being taken tardy,² they can go no further. But they object the danger of the cup: that if it is given to all without exception, then it would come to pass, through the folly and negligence of men, that some great offence might be committed in letting it fall, or pouring it on the floor.³ They would say that the eternal providence has not foreseen so great an offence, which these "wise men" at the end of the world, now well perceive; and so they would amend what the Son of God missed. For they cry out that one kind is enough for the lay people, because it follows by a necessary coherence, that where the body of Christ is, there is his blood also; and thus it must follow, that the other is in vain.⁴ But the Lord distinctly first offered the bread, and afterward the cup; and the Lord instituted nothing in vain. Therefore, since the Lord has so commanded, both kinds ought to be shared among all the faithful. Whoever has read the writings of the ancient fathers, will report that this was ever observed, almost to the time of the council of Constance.⁵

⁴ Originally, "that the one kind is instituted in vain." – that is, that the wine is unnecessary for laymen.

Many of these ¹ have not been afraid to say that dividing this sacrament in this manner could not be done without sacrilege.

The matter and substance of the supper being declared, some lightly question the form, or the consecration of the bread and wine. But because I treated this in the general consideration of the sacraments,² there is no reason why I should, with loathsomeness to the hearers, repeat it again. We do not acknowledge that any transubstantiation is made by force of words or characters. Rather, we affirm that the bread and wine remain as they are in their own substances, but there is added to them the institution, will, and word of Christ, and so they become a sacrament, and so they differ from common bread and wine, as we said elsewhere.

Consequently, the question ensues touching this point: Who should administer the supper: that is to say, whether anyone in the congregation should be chief in celebrating the supper: if so, then who should that be? Surely, the thing itself requires, and nature also commands, that everything be done decently and in good order. And religion requires that all things pertaining to the supper be done according to Christ's example. He was the chief dealer in the supper. And likewise, he has appointed ministers of the church, by whom he would have the sacraments administered. Therefore, just as every man does not baptize, but the lawful minister of the church; so it does not pertain to every man to prepare and administer the holy supper, but it pertains to the minister who is ordained by God. In this, now, we disprove the papistic doctrine which allows private masses, and teaches that the priest offers up the body and blood of our Lord for bystanders; and that by the mass, he applies the merit of redemption to those who with devotion come to that sacrifice. For there is not one word of the Lord, that commands the priests to sacrifice, or to privately apply the supper for others, or that promises anything to those who stand by and look at it. For he says, "Do this; eat and drink you all in remembrance of me." Luk 22.19 He does not say, Look at the priests only, while they are eating and drinking for you. So Christ is not bodily present in the bread and wine; he is joined to our hearts and minds by his Spirit; for it would be of no effect that he remained in the bread. And if he were indeed present there, he could not be sacrificed, both because he offered himself up once upon the cross, nor can the most worthy and only-begotten Son of God be offered up again to God the Father by a sinful man — just as there is no need for him to offer himself again. For St. Paul says: "Christ, being one only sacrifice offered up for sin, sits forever at the right hand of God, looking for that which is yet to come, until his enemies are made his footstool. For by one oblation he has made forever perfect, those who are sanctified." Heb 10.12-14 And again he says: "Where there is full remission of sins, there is no more oblation for sin." Heb 10.18 And we have full remission of sin by the death which Christ once suffered: therefore, there is no sacrifice in the church for sin.³

Indeed, the church celebrates the memorial of the sacrifice which was once perfectly finished upon the cross; but the church does not offer up sacrifice anymore, either with blood or without blood. Praise and thanksgiving are a most acceptable sacrifice to the Lord: the minister does not offer it for others, but with others. Here now, we therefore ascribe no other thing to the minister but the ministry: that he is the president or chief dealer to recite the prayers in the celebration of the supper. And after the holy prelection ⁴ and pronouncing the solemn words, following the example of Christ, let him begin to break the Lord's bread and distribute his cup, and let him also receive the sacrament for himself, as the other faithful people do, as companions of the faith. And when the communion is done, let him end the holy action with thanksgiving and some holy exhortation.

Concerning the place where the supper is to be celebrated, I find no contention among the most ancient ministers of the church. It is read how our Lord Jesus used the hall of a certain private man's house (Acts 20). And also the apostle Paul both preached and broke bread in a certain dining-place at Troas. The ancient church, which ensued immediately after the death of the apostles, almost to the time of Constantine the Great, had none or very few large and public churches; for it was scarcely lawful or safe in so troublesome a time, for the Christians to creep abroad. In the meantime, they used very honest places, in which they met together in holy assemblies, having places of prayer. At present there seems no place more worthy or commodious to celebrate the holy supper, than that which is appointed for doctrine and prayer. For so we learned from St. Paul, 1Cor 11. Even if tyrannical power would not allow us to have a church, what keeps us from reverently celebrating the supper in honest private houses?

Touching the holy instruments belonging to the supper, the matter also requires us to say something in this place. In the time that the apostles lived, they supped at tables set out and furnished for the purpose; they had no fixed altars built of stone, which are more fit to make a fire, and burn beasts on for a sacrifice.

A removable table agrees better with the example of Christ. Notwithstanding, we do not condemn standing altars, if they serve only for the lawful use of the supper. St. Paul, in first Corinthians, calls the Gentile altars tables; so we need not marvel that the ancient fathers termed our tables altars. For it is an easy matter to move from one to the other; and it would seem that they alluded only to the altar of the tabernacle of God. In olden times, the tables were covered, some with a fair cloth, some with a linen tablecloth or towel; from this perhaps were borrowed those things which are called corporals.¹ As for that outward bravery and worldly trimming,² it was not then used on the altars of Christians. We read how it is forbidden by the law, that there must be no altar built of hewn stone; by this proviso, all cost and bravery in religion is forbidden.

Thus it is manifest that in ancient times there were no precious or costly vessels used at the supper. For Christ and the apostles taught that frugality should be used in all places, thus condemning superfluity, and beating into us the contempt for gold and silver. So too, in those holy mysteries, they have not overthrown that doctrine of theirs, nor given occasion for excess. After long persecution, when peace was restored to the church, then began the custom of celebrating in the church with vessels of gold and silver. But then there were also some who brought back its old frugality and simplicity. Chrysostom cried out (as I declared in another place³), that in receiving the Lord's Supper, we should have golden minds, not golden vessels.⁴ And St. Ambrose says: "The sacraments do not require gold, nor are those things pleasant in gold, which are not bought with gold. The ornament of the sacraments is the redemption of captives."⁵

St. Jerome commends St. Exuperius, bishop of Toledo,⁶ who carried the Lord's body in a basket of wicker, and the blood in a glass, and had expelled covetousness from the church.⁷ And truly that canon of the Triburcan council, still extant in the pope's decrees, forbidding any priest to administer this holy mystery in wooden vessels, sufficiently proves that certain churches, more than eight hundred years since Christ's passion, used to drink the blood of Christ in wooden vessels. Therefore, wooden cups in the supper are most ancient of all. Bonifacius the archbishop (though I alleged his example elsewhere, I am forced to repeat it here, for it agrees so fitly with this present matter), long since being asked, Whether it would be lawful to administer the sacraments in vessels of wood, answered: "In olden times," he says, "golden priests used wooden cups; but now contrariwise, wooden priests use golden cups." ¹ But if any man brings vessels made of other stuff, without excess and superstition, I would not greatly strive with him, if he also acknowledges that those who use the wooden ones do not offend. For touching the form and matter of the cups, all are free and lawful for the faithful church to use.

Moreover, it is evident that the Lord in the first supper, yes, and the apostles also in celebrating that supper, used their own usual and decent apparel. And therefore, it is not disagreeable from the first institution, if the minister comes to the Lord's table covered with his own garment, if it is attractive and honest.²

Surely the communicants wear their own usual apparel. We must take heed, then, that no superstition creeps in. Our forefathers, it seemed, wore a cloak thrown over their common garments. They did not do this following the example of Christ or the apostles, but according to man's tradition. At length, that garb which is used today, was adopted to imitate the priest's garments of the old law, and it was appointed to be worn by the ministers who would celebrate the supper. Nor does Innocent III, ignore this in the 4th chap, and 4th book of his work, De Sac. Altar. Mystero.³ As for us, we have learned ⁴ that all Levitical matters are not only put away, but are not to be brought into the church again, by anyone. Therefore, because we remain in the light of the gospel, and not in the shadow of the law, we reject that Levitical massing apparel for good cause.

I also declared in another place ⁵ that it has been the manner in olden times,⁶ that every nation has used their own native and vulgar tongue ⁷ in administering the sacraments. Of the gestures which the ministers use in celebrating the Lord's Supper, we can say nothing else out of the gospel than what we have learned: "The Lord took the bread, blessed it, broke it, distributed it," etc. If the minister follows these things, he does not need to be careful of other gestures. Those who today, by the invention of men, are received into the celebration of the mass, are so far off from giving any majesty to the mysteries, that they rather bring them more into contempt. I will say nothing else that may seem more grievous.

The matter is indifferent, whether the church takes the supper sitting down, or going to the table; whether a man takes the holy mysteries in his own hand, or receives it into his mouth at the hands of the one who ministers. It is most agreeable with the first simplicity and institution of the supper, to sit, and to receive the sacraments in a man's own hands by the one who ministers; and afterwards to break it, eat it, and to divide it for others. For as the Lord sat at table with his disciples, so he reached out the mysteries,¹ saying: "Take, and divide it among you." Moreover, while there is more quietness and less stir in sitting at the supper, as the ministers carry the holy mysteries around the congregation, it is well known by histories of antiquity, that the sacrament has been delivered into the hands of the communicants. It is mere superstition and repugnant to the doctrine of the apostles, to scrape the hands of the lay people who have touched the holy sacrament of the supper. Why, by the same law, do they not also scrape the lips, tongue, and jaws of the communicants?

From these things, handled before, springs another question: What is to be thought of the remnants and leftovers of the Lord's Supper — whether any part of it should be reserved; and whether what is reserved or stored, should be adored? This question seems to have no godliness at all in it, but is altogether superstitious and very hurtful. For who does not know that bread and wine, outside the holy and lawful use appointed for it, are not a sacrament? Shall we proceed to demand with these sophisters, what the mouse gnaws when he gnaws the Lord's bread? These questions are most unworthy to be asked, and should be raked up in holy oblivion. As for storing the sacrament, the Lord teaches us not one word in the gospel, much less about worshipping it. "Take," he says, "eat, and divide it among you." He does not say, Store it and worship it; for true worshippers worship the Father in spirit and truth. Moreover, we read how the Lord plainly said in the gospel: "If they say to you, Behold, he is in the desert, do not go out; behold, he is in the innermost parts of the house, do not believe." He sets down the reason for his commandment: "For as the lightning comes from the east, and appears in the west, so will the coming of the Son of man be." Mat 24.26-27

The coming again of the Son of man,² he says, will be glorious and not obscure; nor will he come again except to judge both the quick and the dead. And therefore St. Paul the apostle, teaching us true religion, would have us worship Christ, not upon the earth, but with our minds lifted to heaven, where he sits at the right hand of his Father. And who would be so frantic, I beseech you, to worship the holy sign instead of the holy thing itself? It appears by the decrees made of late, that these things were invented by man's device. For it is certain that the feast of Christ's body, commonly called Corpus Christi, was instituted only in recent years under pope Urban, in the year of our Lord, 1264; as it appears in Clement, the 3rd book, title 16, the chapter beginning, Si Dominum.³

It remains that we discuss the question concerning the time of celebrating the Lord's Supper, and what season is best for it, morning or evening; whether we should sup together; whether we must receive it after fasting, or once we have dined; also, how often we must celebrate the supper, once, or more often, or more seldom. It is known evidently enough, that Christ sat down at the table with his disciples in the evening; but it does not follow from this, that the supper cannot be rightly celebrated at any other time than evening. The Lord, on the occasion of the feast of the Passover, and because he would be betrayed that night, both ate the supper that evening with his disciples, and also instituted that supper for us. Notwithstanding, he left us the liberty to move this mystery to the morning; for when we are sober, we are most fit to deal in all matters, specially in religion, for which we are then fitter than when our bellies are full of good cheer. Therefore, this banquet requires fasting and empty guests; yet not so much that a man may not taste something beforehand for his health's sake. For St. Paul says: "If any man is hungry, let him eat at home."

¹Cor 11.34 The same apostle also would not have any other feast received together with the Lord's mystical supper. Therefore, we say that we should not receive it with other food.

Tertullian writes that Christians often used to eat other food with it. This kind of supper, he writes, was called αγάπη (agape), that is, mutual love or charity, borrowing the name from love.¹ For the poor were refreshed with feasting of the richer sort. However, provision of food, drink, and other necessaries, might well enough be made for them outside the church. Paul would not permit in one place, both public feasts, and also celebrating the mystical supper of the Lord.

Furthermore, how many times a year the faithful ought to receive this sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the apostles have given no commandment, but left it indifferent to every church's discretion. For what is plainer than what St. Paul said: "As often as you eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, you declare the Lord's death until he comes?" ¹Cor 11.26 For the Lord (as the same apostle records it), first commanding, said: "Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me." However, let no man think that the celebration of the Lord's Supper is left so freely to him, that he need never receive it; for that would be no lawful liberty, but most unlawful licentiousness. Those who celebrate the supper of the Lord at certain and ordinary times of the year, would not have it brought into contempt or loathed because they frequent it daily. For they have some consideration of their own people; and they would have the supper celebrated worthily, and that the people have a desire for it. But those who celebrate it often, suppose that what is unfit, is that good things should be despised by often frequenting them. They say, the better the thing is, the more often it is to be used. Both these sorts desire to serve the Lord, and would have what the Lord has left free, done to great and good effect. If St. Augustine were made an umpire and judge between them, doubtless he would pronounce no other judgment than what he has already pronounced about it. Writing to Januarius, he says:

"He best decides this strife between them, who advised them especially to abide in the peace of Christ; and that according to his faith, every man do what he is persuaded is good and godly. For neither of them dishonours the body and blood of our Lord. Only, that food must not be contemned." ²

Now we have also to consider for whom this holy supper is instituted, and to whom it is to be administered. It seems that it is instituted and to be given to all faithful Christian people, of whatever sex, men and women, high and low. Therefore, so great a mystery is not to be cast to swine and dogs, to be contemned and trodden underfoot. Before it is administered, all men are to be earnestly and effectually admonished to whom this food pertains, namely, to those who acknowledge their sins, who are sorry for their faults, and who believe in Christ. All are to be admonished that, looking within, he prove himself; and afterward, so eat of this holy bread and drink of this holy drink, that he does not eat and drink it unworthily to his condemnation. But after this severe admonition, if anyone approaches the table and sits down, and by sitting down openly profess as it were, both that they are, and also desire to remain, true worshippers of Christ, by whom they trust to have remission of their sins — surely they are not to be excluded by the ministers, nor are the holy mysteries to be denied them. For the Lord himself, who is the searcher of hearts, severely, diligently, plainly, and in many words at his last supper, before he distributed the mysteries, admonished Judas, who was a hypocrite, thief, traitor, murderer, yes, a parricide, blasphemer, and forsaker of his master. But being admonished, and notwithstanding, Judas did not depart from the table, but stayed among the saints, the Lord did not violently push him away, nor openly bid him to depart. Nor did he withhold the Lord's bread from him, but gave it to him as he did to the others, even though he assuredly knew what he was. The ministers of the church do not always know this so certainly about those who sit down at the table. The Lord did not offend at all in doing this, nor did he cast what was holy to the dogs.

For the Lord warned him diligently about all matters of which he was to be warned; and yet, hearing and understanding them all, Judas remains among the saints, vaunts himself as one of the faithful, not as a hog; and as one of the faithful, he takes part of the bread and the cup. By this hypocrisy, he provoked the heavy judgment of God against him; even as today this holy food and holy drink turns to the destruction of both the body and soul of all hypocrites. Nor did the presence of the hypocrite at the Lord's Supper defile the other faithful disciples of Christ, who sat at the table. Likewise, neither are the faithful polluted today, even though they see many hypocrites sit down at the table with them; for they do not sup with them as with hypocrites, but as with the faithful. Meanwhile, the hypocrite hurts himself, and not others; he falls and perishes to his own destruction; he eats and drinks his own damnation; but the faithful lives by his own faith. We have treated this in other sermons.¹

And although infants are reputed to be of the church and in the number of the faithful, yet they are not capable of the supper. In this point, the ancient fathers shamefully erred. I have also noted this in the sermon about Baptism.² Infants are not deprived of everlasting life, even if they depart out of this world without receiving this mystical food. This was instituted for those who are of lawful years, and not for infants. "Let a man examine himself," says the apostle, "and let him so eat of the bread, and drink of the cup." And the Lord says: "Do this in remembrance of me." And again: "Declare the Lord's death until he comes." All these sayings take place in people of lawful years, not in infants. Our children must be diligently instructed from their infancy, so that they may rightly understand those mysteries, and frequent them. This is what the Lord commanded the children of Israel, saying: "If your children say to you, What manner of worship is this? You shall answer, It is the sacrifice of the Lord's Passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel when he struck the Egyptians and delivered our houses." Exo 12.26-27 Surely we must not show ourselves more slack in informing our children than they were, since we have received a more noble benefit than they did.

Like this question are these others: Whether the supper is to be celebrated privately for every cause or necessity? Whether it is to be carried to the sick and those who keep to their beds? Whether it be to be applied to the dead, that is to say, offered for the dead, to obtain rest for them? Touching these matters, I know what is commonly said and done. Some pestilence, famine, war, or tempest occurs, and then the supper is commanded to be celebrated, so that by this "sacrifice" as it were, ³ the present calamity may be taken away. Again, one is sick; another perishes with hunger, and afflicted for lack of all kinds of necessities; it requires the priest to have the Lord's Supper administered to him, so that thereby the disease may be cured by a quick and approved "remedy," and his hunger and poverty released. This is not the due celebration of the supper, but a filthy profanation of it. For the Lord has not instituted it to be a cleansing sacrifice against all calamities, by which he would be pleased; it is to be a memorial of his death, and a dutiful thanksgiving. For when we are at the supper, we offer nothing to him for which he should be favourable to us, and turn away such an evil from us, and give us such a good thing as we desire of him. Rather, we give thanks for the benefits which we have already received. Otherwise, it is lawful for those who are oppressed with troubles, to offer up their vows to the Lord (that is, their prayers); but it is not lawful to convert his holy mysteries to any other purpose than he has appointed. Nor do we have any examples to prove that any holy man ever used the Lord's Supper to any such end as these men use it.

The children of Israel received the feast of the Paschal Lamb in remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt, that they should continue thankful to so beneficial a Lord. How great an offence they would have committed if they had so often eaten their banquet because, being oppressed with calamities, they desired to be delivered, and desired it by doing that deed! They received the ark of the covenant from the Lord in token of his divine presence and assured help; but when, contrary to the end for which it was appointed, they bore it into the camp with the intent that they might obtain the victory by it, they themselves were put to flight and slain, and the ark was carried away by the Philistines into captivity.

Again, if the Lord's Supper is a public holy feast of the whole church gathered together in one, in which there should be breaking, distributing, eating and drinking, and thereby the communion of the body and blood of Christ are declared and sealed — then it follows, that the Lord's Supper should not be ordained for anyone in health or sickness, nor for anyone lying sick in his bed or at the point of death, whether privately at home, or openly at church. Nor can the godly require the Lord's Supper for any such private uses. For the institution of Christ our Lord must not be altered by any human authority or custom. Truly, St. Paul requires a public assembly of the church and a general meeting for the due celebrating of the supper. "When you meet together therefore in one place, this is not to take the supper of the Lord," that is to say, "You do not eat the Lord's Supper." The reason is, "For everyone, when they should eat, takes his own supper," etc. Therefore, he would not have anything done privately in this. Likewise, in the same place, he says that they meet together and eat the Lord's Supper to their own damnation, when they hasten to the supper, not waiting for the congregation, until they all meet and eat and drink together. For he says: "Therefore, my brethren, when you meet to eat and drink, wait one for another (if any man is hungry, let him eat at home, namely, so that he is not constrained ¹ to eat before the others arrive), so that you do not meet together to your condemnation." Therefore, the Lord's Supper is not a private, but a public supper, to be given to no man privately. And because that assembly is not public or general, when four or five communicate with the sick, their statement is nothing who say that the supper may be ordained for the sick, if others sup with them.² Moreover, who would deny that the example of Christ and the apostles is to be perpetually followed? ³

But it is evident enough that Christ celebrated his supper in a common dining place, having gathered the church to him, as well as it might be gathered at that time. St. Paul says that he followed the example of the Lord in that point, and that he delivered no other thing to the church than what he received from the Lord. Nor do we read in any place of the scriptures, that the other apostles of Christ carried the sacrament to the sick, or that they ordained the holy supper privately for someone to appease his trial. But all the apostles command us in every place to confirm and strengthen the sick and afflicted conscience ⁴ with the Lord's word. They also teach us to succour the distressed with diligent prayer. St. James has diligently set down in writing, how the faithful shall behave themselves towards the sick and those who are departing out of this world. ^{Jas 5.13f} But touching celebrating or carrying the sacrament to them, he says not one word. Nor is it likely, that the apostles, the most faithful doctors of the church, would ignore the matter, if they had thought it pertained chiefly to our salvation. They warned us often of things of far less importance. And it is certain that they have taught the church all things that belong to true godliness and salvation. but as for this matter, they have not mentioned one word of it.

⁴ Rather, and the troubled in conscience.

Some object from the Acts of the Apostles this authority: "And breaking bread from house to house, they ate meals together with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God." ^{Act 2.46} But that is to be understood about bodily and nourishing food, not mystical food: "They received food or sustenance together." For we read in the 58th chapter of Isaiah, that breaking bread is the same as feeding; it signifies that here also. For the richer gave food to the poorer, which they did with a cheerful, not with a sorrowful heart; and those who received the benefit praised God. ^{Act 2.44-46} But if any man stubbornly contends that the apostles supped in private houses, we answer that it says nothing of the present matter of the sick, and of private communion; for as I said before, at that time they used private houses instead of churches.

And therefore, they supped in private houses, not to feed the sick with the bread of the sacrament, but because the universal church in that place was gathered together in those houses, as it appears in the 20th chapter of the Acts; as is the way during persecutions. ^{Act 20.23}

They object, moreover, that the ancient fathers sent the sacrament to those who were bound in prison, and to those who were departing, to feed on as they went on their way. But I have declared elsewhere,¹ why the ancient fathers did so. To this we also add that man's custom cannot prejudice the word of God. The blessed martyr Irenaeus writes that the bishops of Rome usually sent the sacrament to other bishops who came to Rome from other places, as a token of concord and agreement.² But that custom was not used by all bishops, nor is it used in the church at present. From this it follows that many things were used by the ancient fathers (such as what we said before, in giving the sacrament to infants) which, notwithstanding, are no law for us. Good men today may also allow a private supper for a time, for those who do not yet understand the full use of the supper. But who would gather from this, that every man should do what is permitted for some out of sufferance? If we continue to contentiously affirm that it is a relief for us in our travels, then it will grow to this (which we saw happen about a hundred years ago): that hope and confidence will be put in receiving the sacrament, as though we were acceptable to God because of it, and when we depart out of this life we would fly immediately up into heaven — but without receiving the sacrament, we would be thrown directly down to hell. There must also arise sundry other errors from it. Nor is there any necessity that constrains us to administer the sacrament to the sick. For just as prisoners are absent from receiving the Lord's Supper without danger to their salvation, so likewise are the sick and those who are ready to die. For being gathered to the body of Christ by perfect faith, though absent in body, they are present with the congregation in mind; and thus, they too are nevertheless made partakers of all spiritual good things.³

And it is sufficient for them, that as long as they have been in health, they have always been present at the holy mysteries. The feast of Passover was not celebrated everywhere, but only at Jerusalem, in one place. But how many were there, do we think, that because of their bodily health, impaired by sickness and old age, could not travel to Jerusalem from so large and wide a kingdom? Even though no one brought home for them a piece of the paschal lamb in their pockets, notwithstanding, they communicated with the whole church of Israel. And who doubts that by the coming of Christ, the condition of the Christians is not improved? ¹

Our Lord Christ did not institute his mystical supper for the dead, but only for the living. Therefore, it is not to be celebrated for the dead, to be applied to their redemption. Those who die without faith, immediately fall under the judgment of damnation; but those who are dead in Christ are already joined to the company of the elders, and stand before the Lamb, singing Hallelujah forevermore. For I have declared in my sermon about the soul,² that the salvation of faithful souls who are departed by corporal death, is most undoubted. And where some object that the ancient fathers have mentioned offerings for the dead, we suppose that it does not pertain to us. For we believe the canonical scriptures without contradiction. We do not believe the church fathers further than they can prove their own sayings by the canonical scriptures; nor would they themselves have believed otherwise. And therefore, if the fathers think that the supper is a sacrifice, and that it is to be offered to procure rest for departed souls, we do not receive that opinion. For it does not agree with the canonical scriptures, which teach that the Lord did not institute his supper for that purpose; and therefore, God is displeased rather than pleased by such an abuse of the supper. Indeed, no work of man can sanctify, however good it may be, much less if it is against God's word, since that prerogative belongs only to the merit of the Son of God. And moreover, departed souls are not in any such state in that other world, that they can or should be helped by any works in this world.

But if the ancient fathers understand an oblation or offering to mean the sacrifice of praise or thanksgiving, we will not strive against them. But oblations may be made for the dead, that is to say, thanks may be given to God and his goodness praised, who has called out of this miserable world those who were endued with true faith, and has joined them to the companies of angels and all the blessed saints in that everlasting kingdom of all joy and felicity. But surely there is no truth or godliness that would have us celebrate the supper for the dead.

And we make a distinction between a sacrifice and an oblation. For there is a sacrifice of expiation, and there is a sacrifice of confession or praise. The sacrifice of expiation is offered to cleanse or purge sins, and also as satisfaction for sins. This cannot be accomplished without death and blood, as St. Paul the apostle plainly shows in the 9th chapter to the Hebrews. The sacrifice of Christ was such a sacrifice (the figures of which were all the sacrifices of all the holy fathers of the old Testament). Being both priest and sacrifice, he offered up himself once to God the Father, while he suffered upon the cross, and shedding his most innocent blood, gave up the ghost there. The supper today is no such sacrifice, but a commemoration of the death or of the sacrifice once offered upon the cross. For Christ neither should nor can be sacrificed again; being once offered, he is sufficient to cleanse all the sins of all ages. Why then should he be sacrificed again? Nor can the Son of God be sacrificed by any man, since he offered himself once to God for that same cause, being a priest forever in the order of Melchizedek. Therefore, in the church, the minister of the church does not sacrifice the body and blood of Christ in the supper for the living; but together with the whole church, he celebrates the remembrance of the sacrifice which was once offered upon the cross. As I have said about this elsewhere, ³ the supper may also be called a sacrifice, because it is a sacrament or sign of the sacrifice which was once offered by Christ, as Augustine has also left written.⁴

The sacrifice of confession is a sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, which we offer to God for the redemption and benefits of God, freely bestowed upon his church. And since we always offer it to God in prayer, but chiefly when we are joined in the sacrament of the eucharist or celebrating the supper, the ancient fathers therefore called it a "sacrifice," because in it we give thanks to God for our deliverance from death, and for the inheritance of everlasting life which is given to us. We told you before that this sacrifice is generally offered by the universal church in celebrating the supper, and not by the minister of the [particular] church alone, for those who live in that church.

Now, up to here we have discussed certain circumstances or questions which are prone to be asked about the Lord's Supper, so far as the necessity of the matter seemed to require, and as much as our small ability was able to perform. It remains that we descend further to declare for what reason the Lord's Supper was instituted by the Lord. This truly is not rashly reckoned among the chief questions, for we mentioned it immediately upon beginning this sermon. For the Lord, by setting bread and wine before us in the holy banquet, would have his promise and communion testified to us, and his gifts represented unto us, and made manifest to our senses; and he would also gather us visibly into one body, and retain the memory of his death in the hearts of the faithful; and finally, he would put us in mind of our duty, chiefly of praise and thanksgiving. We have severally expounded all these things, having discoursed about them at large in the general consideration and treatise of the sacraments. And therefore, at present we will do no more than touch them briefly for memory's sake, meaning to handle those things somewhat more largely, which by occasion arise as they are treated.

By this word communion, I mean, the society, conjunction, or partaking of the Lord Christ, by which, through his Spirit, he wholly knits and joins himself to us, and we are made partakers of him by faith, and are coupled to him. So that, being delivered from sin and death by him, we may live in him, being made heirs of everlasting life; and that he may live in us and be wholly ours, as we are wholly his.

Nor do we say that the communion of the Lord's body and blood is anything else. For by his body which was delivered over to death for us, and by his blood which was shed for the remission of our sins, it has come to pass that we, being purged from our sins, are made his members; and he now quickens us and sustains us, as food which gives life. For this reason, we are also said to eat and drink him as the food and drink of life. Joh 6.53 The promise, therefore, which we just mentioned, is none other than the word of God, which declares to us that life is in Christ alone. For Christ delivered his body to death, and shed his blood, for the remission of sins, so that we, believing in him, may have life everlasting. But this promise and communion of Christ is not first of all given in the supper, nor by the supper. For the Lord our God, immediately after the creation of the world, promised life and remission of sins to Adam and his seed through Christ; and afterward He renews the same promise with Noah, Abraham, Moses, and David, and the other fathers. And the fathers communicated ¹ with Christ and were partakers of his goodness, as Paul the apostle witnesses, with the whole scripture.

But this great goodness did not happen only to the fathers. For the promise was made to us also, and the communion of Christ was conveyed to us, and is conveyed particularly to every one of us in holy baptism, and also in the manifest preaching of the gospel. Moreover, we receive it by faith, by which we are joined to Christ, and are made his members. Therefore, as we are not void and without Christ before the supper, but are quickened by him and made his members or partners, so in the very action or celebration of the supper, the promise is renewed to us, and we renew and continue that fellowship which we have in Christ by the body and blood of Christ spiritually, truly participating in his life and all his good gifts through faith. And by this means, we eat the Lord's body, and we drink his blood. Moreover, the Lord visibly declares and seals to us that spiritual communion and promise of life made through Christ, by visible signs (the banquet of bread and wine) joined to his word or promise (that it is a quickening bread and drink).

And we, having received the signs by faith and obedience, being sealed to them, take upon us the promise and communion of Christ,¹ by imprinting or transferring into our bodies the seal or sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. The apostle also treated this in 1Corinthians chap. 10, and Romans, chap. 4. We also said more about it in the general treatise about the sacraments.

But before I further treat the other ends of the supper (consisting in its description), I will recite what some others allege about the promise and communion of Christ. They condemn our doctrine as heretical. For they contend that the Lord promised that he would give to the faithful his very body and blood, to be eaten and drunk in the form of bread and wine. Therefore, they say, it must by all means, and without any contradiction, be believed that the bread is the Lord's natural body, and the wine his blood; and that these ought to be eaten and drunk, not only spiritually, but also corporally, unto life everlasting. And they prove that Christ is bodily present in the supper, and that the bread is his body and the wine is his blood, by this reasoning: That which the Lord speaks cannot be false, for he is the truth itself; and he says, that the bread is his body, and the wine is his blood; therefore, the bread and wine of the sacrament are truly, really, and essentially the body and blood of Christ. This truth, they say, must be believed literally, even though reason itself, the whole world, all our senses, and nature itself, is against it.

We answer that indeed all things are very true which the Lord has spoken, who is truth itself; but it is in that sense which he himself said and understood it, and not in that meaning which we would force upon his words. Therefore, before all things we must search out the true sense of the Lord's words in the supper, "This is my body," "This is my blood," etc.

These men cry out, saying, that the Lord's words ought to be expounded literally, and according to the letter; for they are the words of a testament; and that does not permit his words to be expounded by a trope or figure.

But we say that all the evangelical and apostolic books are included under the title "testament"; and therefore, throughout all and every place of the scripture, nothing must be corrupted, nothing added, nothing diminished, unless we would be subject to the curse of God. And yet we are also constrained to confess that there are infinite statements in the holy scriptures, which if we proceed to expound them literally,² according to the letter, we would overthrow the whole scripture and the true faith, or we would seem to charge the scriptures with lies and contradictions. I will bring out one or two examples of this sort.

The evangelist St. John writes: "The Word became flesh." Now if we cling to the very words, then we must say that God was changed into man. But this sense is contrary to the faith and to the scriptures. For God is immutable. And Christ is true God and man, and therefore he is without any mixture or conversion of natures, but they remain in their own properties. And so we allow that exposition which declares that the Word took flesh, and that God was made man. And this sense is not against scripture; for Paul says that the Son of God in no way took upon himself the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham. Moreover, the catholic fathers, together with the apostle, expound this word est, by this word assumpsit, took upon himself. Theodoret has treated this at large in his Polymorphic, Dialog, i.¹ Again, the Lord says in the same gospel of John: "The Father is greater than I." Joh 10.29

We would force an inequality upon the holy Trinity,² if we were to contend that the Lord's words are to be literally understood, without interpretation. But by comparing with other places and taking advice from faith, we say that the Son is equal with the Father touching his divinity, but inferior to him in respect to his humanity, according to that saying of the prophet, which is alleged by the apostle to that purpose: "You have made him little inferior to the angels." Heb 2.7 We read in the gospel, that Christ our Lord had brethren, and that St. John the apostle was called the son of Mary, and Mary was called the mother of John. But who, unless he were infected with the heresy of Helvidius³ would stand on this: that these places are to be expounded according to the letter?⁴ — especially since other places of the scripture manifestly prove that those were called "brethren" who indeed were brothers' and sisters' children, cousin-germans,⁵ kinsmen, or near in blood. Also, the circumstances of the place in the 19th chapter of St. John prove that Mary was committed to John, as a mother to her son. Therefore, if they still have a desire to wrangle, as up to now (at their own pleasure) we have found them doing — crying out and reiterating, "This is my body, This is my blood; This is, This is, This is, This is; Is, Is, Is" — then we will also repeat: "The word was made, was made, was made flesh: The Father is, is, is greater than I: Christ has brethren; I say, he has brethren, he has brethren. The scripture has it so. The truth says so." But now, tell me, what benefit redounds to the church by these troublesome and odious outcries and most froward contentions? How will the hearers be edified? How will the glory of God be enlarged? How will the truth be presented? Necessity therefore constrains us to confess that in some places we must forsake the letter, but not the sense. And that sense is to be allowed which faith itself, compared with other places of scripture, and which the context of the place (the first being compared with the last), yield of their own accord as it were. Yet, we also cry out and repeat again and again, that we should not without great cause, go from the simplicity of the word.⁶

But when the absurdity (not of reason, but of piety), and the repugnancy of the scriptures, and the contrariety to the articles of our faith, force us — then we say, affirm, and contend that it is godly, indeed necessary, to depart from the letter and from the simplicity of the words. And these places⁷ which we just alleged, constrain us to depart from the letter in these words of the Lord: "This is my body, This is my blood." We will prove it by sound arguments, taken from the scriptures, once I have briefly declared the true and ancient sense and meaning of those usual and solemn words.

The question which gave rise to it was whether Mary remained a Virgin after His birth. Helvidius maintained that the mention in the Gospels of the sisters and brethren of our Lord was proof that she had subsequent issue, and he supported his opinion by the writings of Tertullian and Victorinus. Jerome vigorously takes the other side, and tries to prove that the sisters and brethren spoken of, were either children of Joseph by a former marriage, or first cousins, children of Mary's sister (www.newadvent.org — Catholic ency.). ⁷ ilia ipsa, Lat.: those considerations.

The Lord, sitting at the table with his disciples, reached out the bread to them with his own hand. And having only one true, human, and natural body, with that very same body, he delivered bread to his disciples, and not any other man's body, nor his own. Nor does that trouble us, which St. Augustine recites from David, in expounding the 34th Psalm, "And he was borne in his own hands;" ¹ to which Augustine immediately adds:

"Who is borne in his own hands? A man may be borne in the hands of other men, but none can be borne in his own. This is therefore meant about David, not Christ. For Christ was borne in his own hands, when he said, commending his body to them, 'This is my body:' for that body was borne in his own hands." ²

By these words, St. Augustine does not pretend that Christ has two human bodies; but he means that the human body borne in his hands was the sacramental body, that is to say, the bread which is the sacrament of the true body; for he speaks plainly, saying: "Commending his body, he bore that body in his own hands." For in the second sermon, almost in the same words, being but a little changed, Augustine asks: "How was he borne in his own hands? For when he had commended his body and blood, he took that in his hands which the faithful know; and in a way, he bore himself, when he said, This is my body." ³

By these words he manifestly declared that he did not mean that Christ in his natural body delivered his natural body to his disciples; but he meant what the faithful know, namely, the sacrament or mystery. For it follows: "And he bore himself in a way (I beg you, mark this saying, "in a way"), when he said, This is my body." Therefore, those solemn words, "This is my body which is broken for you;" and likewise, "This is my blood which is shed for you;" can have no other sense than this: This is a commemoration, memorial, or remembrance, a sign or sacrament, of my body which is given for you; This cup, or rather the wine in the cup, signifies or represents to you my blood which was once shed for you. For there follows in the Lord's solemn words, that which notably confirms this meaning: "Do this in the remembrance of me." As if he had said: Now I am present with you, before your eyes; I will die and ascend into heaven, and then this holy bread and wine will be a memorial or token of my body and blood given and shed for you. Then break the bread and eat it, distribute the cup and drink it; and do this in remembrance of me, praising my benefits bestowed on you in redeeming you and giving you life.

Although this interpretation is most slanderously reviled and has become abominable in the sight of many, yet it is manifestly the true, proper, and most ancient interpretation of all others. Tertullian, Lib. iv. contra Mart., says: "Christ, taking the bread, and distributing it to his disciples, made it his body, in saying, 'This is my body,' that is to say, the figure of my body." ⁴ Jerome on

Augustine writes, " All things are not done in vain; neither were they in that madness of David, of which it is said, He [was] affected, and drummed upon the gates of the city, and was carried in His own hands, and fell down at the doors of the gate, and His spittle ran down over His beard." Then, relating it to Christ, Augustine writes, "He had compassion on our infirmities, and therefore would take upon Himself the same flesh, that therein He might destroy death... Therefore He was affected, because He came even to the death of the Cross. And because whoever is crucified is extended on wood; and to make a drum, flesh (that is, skin) is extended on wood; therefore it is said, He drummed, that is, He was crucified, He was extended on wood... He had affection for us, that He might lay down His life for His sheep. He drummed: How? upon the doors of tile city. The door is that which is opened to us, that we may believe in God. We had closed the door against Christ, and had opened it to the devil. Against Life Eternal we had closed our hearts. But He, the Lord our God, because we men had our hearts closed against life eternal, and would not see the Word, Which Angels see, with His Cross, opened the hearts of mortal men, that is, He drummed against the doors of the city. And was carried in His Own Hands," etc. – WHG

St. Matthew's gospel says: "As in prefiguring Christ by Melchizedek, the priest of Almighty God, so in giving bread and wine, he might represent the truth of his body." ¹

Chrysostom also says, in his 83rd homily on Matthew: "If Jesus is not dead, then whose token and sign is this sacrifice?" ² Ambrose says on first Corinthians, chap. 11: "Because we are delivered by the Lord's death, being mindful of it, in eating and drinking we signify the flesh and the blood which were offered for us." ³ Augustine also, in many places, heaps up many figures of speech like this: "The blood is the soul; The rock was Christ;" and "This is my body." Let us hear then what he says about these phrases, so that we may understand what he thinks of the true interpretation of this text, "This is my body." In the 3rd book of Questions, in the 57th question on Leviticus, he says:

"It remains that what is called the soul, is that which signifies the soul; for the thing that signifies is usually called by the name of that thing it signifies; as it is written, 'The seven ears of wheat are seven years;' he did not say, signify seven years; and, 'Seven oxen are seven years' and many like things. In the same way it is said: 'The rock was Christ.' He did not say, The rock signifies Christ, but said it as though it were so indeed; yet it is not the same in substance, but only by signification. So likewise the blood: because through a certain vital substance it signifies the soul, in the sacraments it is called the soul." ⁴

The same Augustine, against Adimantus, cap. 12, also says: "So blood is the soul, as the rock was Christ." And again in the same place he says: "I may also expound that the precept ⁵ of the blood and soul of the beast, etc., consists in the sign. For the Lord did not hesitate to say, 'This is my body,' when he gave the sign of his body." ⁶

This much from Augustine. There is no fool so doltish ⁷ as to say that these words of Augustine are dark or doubtful. Whoever wishes may add to this what that same author has plainly written concerning figurative speech, Libro ii. Contra Advers. Legis. cap. 2. ⁸

But let us leave behind citing men's testimonies concerning the proper and most ancient exposition of Christ's words, "This is my body." Let us proceed to allege sound arguments from the scriptures, as we promised — to prove thereby, that sometimes we must of necessity depart from the letter, and that Christ's words are accordingly to be expounded by a figure, as I said.

First, it is evident that the Lord at present instituted a sacrament. By this it is manifest that the Lord spoke in the same way he tends to speak ⁹ in other places of the scripture concerning sacraments; such as when he says that circumcision is the Lord's covenant; that the lamb is the Lord's Passover; that sacrifices are sins and sanctifications; and that baptism is the water of regeneration. But we declared in the sixth sermon of this decade, that all these kinds of phrases remain to be expounded. This saying or phrase, "This is my body," "This is my blood:" is therefore to be expounded as sacramental. For it admits the common interpretation which was most truly and certainly used and received by the catholic church, ever since the time of the apostles; yes, and ever since the time of the patriarchs until this day — namely, that signs receive the terms and names of those things which are signified. Thereby, they receive no part of the substance of those things, but signs continue and remain in their own proper nature.

For this reason, in the gospel written by St. Luke, our Lord Christ joined the banquet of the Passover with our Lord's Supper in such a way that he substituted the one in place of the other. Thus, it would not have seemed strange if he said in this supper, "This is my body;" for in solemnising the feast of Passover it is said, "The lamb is the Lord's Passover." Exo 12.11 This kind of speech was not too dark to be understood by the apostles, who understood that this lamb was a remembrance of the passage once past. By that means also, they understood that the Lord's bread, given to them by the Lord, is a remembrance of his body. For in other matters of much less weight they diligently questioned and inquired of the Lord touching the proper sense and signification of the words; but they never once doubted or asked any question about these words: for all sacramental phrases were very well known to the holy fathers.

Moreover, if we continue to understand the words of the supper simply, according to the letter; it follows, that the Lord has delivered to us his body and blood, to be received corporally. And, I ask you, to what end would he deliver them if not that we might live, receiving them corporally? But the universal canonical scripture teaches that our life or salvation, and our justification, consists in faith alone. We repose this faith in the body which was given and the blood that was shed for us (which is the spiritual eating) — not in any work of ours, much less in the bodily eating of Christ's body. In another place, he shows us that this is not available at all. So then, since there is but one means by which to obtain life and justification, and that means is most simple — namely, by faith alone, and not by the work of our eating — the scripture is not repugnant to itself. Surely then, the Lord has not instituted any such work of eating; and therefore, the solemn words of the supper admit some other exposition.

If the bread were the Lord's true and natural body, it must follow that even the wicked, being partakers of this bread, would eat Christ's body, and that truly his flesh would be food to feed their bellies — since those who eat it lack both the mind and the faith to do otherwise. But all holy men abhor that thought as absurd and most unworthy (I will further treat this matter later). Therefore, the saying of Christ, "This is my body," allows for an exposition.

The whole universal canonical scripture witnesses that our Lord Jesus Christ took a body of the undefiled virgin, consubstantial in all points to our bodies, that is to say, a human body. Indeed, he was made like us in all respects, except sin. Now, it is manifest that he spoke of his true sensible body when he says, "This is my body;" for he adds, "Which is broken or given for you." But the true, natural, sensible, or human body was delivered up and died for us. And this does not appear in the bread, nor under the bread. ¹ Therefore, the Lord's words must be expounded.

Surely, if it had been the Lord's will to make his body of bread and his blood of wine, according to the power by which he made all things with his word; as soon as he said, "This is my body," the bread would have been the body of Christ, and that very body of which he spoke, would have been mortal, passible, and felt and seen. For "he spoke the word, and they were made; he commanded, and they were created." He said, "Let there be light," and light was made; and it was such a light as might be perceived and shine. But in the supper, we see nothing in Christ's hands but bread, no body. And therefore, it was not our Saviour's meaning by, "This is my body," to create or make his body of the bread. For if he had meant to do so, surely it would have been done.

Nor is there any reason why they should cast their mists before our eyes as it were,¹ and apply their coloured interpretation to a rotten construction, using words like "unspeakably, supernaturally, invisibly, not qualitatively, not quantitatively, not in a place."² For by these terms, intending to bring something else to pass, by the wonderful judgment of God they quite subvert and overthrow all that is their own.

For if their mystery is unspeakable, then why do they use these terms, "essentially, substantially, really, corporally"? For those who speak so, utter and truly set down the manner of his presence. If the bread is supernaturally the body of Christ, then why do they add "naturally?" And if the bread is Christ's body invisibly, then it cannot be corporally, nor can it be a true body, whose property is to be visible. Who would not laugh if he heard that fire burnt and gave no heat, and that light shined and gave no light? If Christ is not present in quality, quantity, and in a place, then he is not corporally present. For, I ask you, do not qualities, quantities, and a place, belong to the body? Hear what Augustine says to Dardanus touching the presence of God:

"Take the space of place from bodies, and they will be nowhere;³ and because they will be nowhere, they will not be at all. Take the bodies themselves from the qualities of bodies, and they will be nowhere; and therefore, it must be that they cannot be at all."⁴

Let us not therefore rob or spoil the Lord's body of its properties, and so deny the truth of his body. Again, so that we do not bring so many contrary and absurd things into one and the same opinion, we interpret the words of the Lord, "This is my body," as "This is a memorial or remembrance of my body;" or else, "This signifies my body."

Moreover, if this word est, "is," is to be understood substantively in the Lord's words, "This is my body," then it follows that the bread is changed into Christ's body. But all our senses witness that this is not so; the very substance remains, not just the accidents (the qualities) of the bread. It is necessary, therefore, that our adversaries understand that in this, with this, or under this, is Christ's body. But then they have left the simplicity of the Lord's words, who said, "This is my body," and not, "Under this is my body."

Again, if we are so tied to the words recited above, that upon pain of sacrilege we may not depart from them a hair's breadth, then I beseech you, how dare Luke and Paul recite the words which belong to the cup far otherwise than Matthew and Mark?

For these first two set down the words belonging to the cup in this way: "This is my blood which is of the new Testament, which is shed for many for the remission of their sins." But the second two recite them thus: "This cup being the new Testament through my blood, which is shed for you;" and, "This cup is the new Testament in my blood." But should we think that there is no difference between the blood of Christ and the new Testament? St. Paul defines the new Testament, after Jeremiah, to be a full remission of all sins; and he same says that this remission of sins is obtained through the blood of Christ. But who would so impudently contend and dare to affirm that the very cup, or the wine in the cup, is really and substantially the remission of sins?

What reason is there, if we hold onto and stick precisely to the letter, why we should be forced to confess that the cup — not the wine, nor the drink — is either the blood of Christ, the new Testament, or the remission of sins? For the Lord does not say, "This wine," but "This cup." However, to avoid absurdity in this place, we willingly admit a trope. Why then are we not indifferent ¹ in a matter of equal importance? Therefore, just as the cup or wine is the testament, or the remission of sins, so likewise the cup or wine is Christ's blood; and in like manner, the bread is Christ's body. Yet the cup is not substantially the remission of sins or blood, but the sacrament of Christ's blood, by which the new testament was dedicated, and full remission of sins was obtained for us. Therefore, the bread is the body of Christ, because it is the sacrament of the body of Christ.

Surely it is a strong and firm argument that we have produced. And of no less force and strength, we hope, is what remains, which we will now produce. The Lord at the celebrating of the holy supper says: "Do this in remembrance of me." These words do not import that we should determine that the one whom we ought to remember is really present; for who would be said to "remember" those things which he physically beholds before him?

But we must go from the simple signification of remembrance or memory, especially since Paul says: "Declare the Lord's death until he comes." For this is what we gather by it: the one whose remembrance is repeated until he comes or returns, is surely not considered present, but is looked for to come. Therefore, the Lord's body which was given for us, the remembrance of which is celebrated in the mystical supper, is not present, but is looked for to come.

Now those places touching Christ's leaving the world and departing there, do not simply admit the interpretation of the words of the supper. "It is expedient for you," he says, "that I depart: for if I do not go away, the Comforter will not come to you; but if I depart from you, then I will send him to you." Joh 16.7 Also: "I went from the Father, and came into the world." Joh 18.37 Again, "I leave the world and go to the Father." Joh 13.1 And again: "Henceforth I am not in the world; but these are in the world, and I come to you." Joh 17.11 These sayings, truly, are opposed: That he went from here; That he is no longer in the world; That he left the world — and this, That his natural body is still in the world, and it is given and received really and substantially in the supper. Nor is it lawful to figuratively interpret the testimonies which are taken from St. John's gospel concerning Christ's departure; for the apostles confess that the Lord spoke plainly or simply, without any parable. Joh 16.29 Therefore, since the apostles testify that this speech of the Lord was simple and simply pronounced, it is needful that those other words which contradict "This is my body," be taken figuratively, so that the scripture does not oppose itself.

Moreover, those places which bear record that Christ's body, after the resurrection, was circumscribed by place, was seen and felt, and which also differentiate between Christ's glorified body and the angelic spirits (by the way, we may see here that no place is left for the device of the definitive mean), do not allow for the bare interpretation of the solemn words of the Lord. The angels say: "He is risen, he is not here. Behold the place where they laid him." Mar 16.6 Also: "He will go before you into Galilee; there you will see him." Mat 28.7 And again he himself says to his disciples: "Feel me, and see: a spirit does not have flesh and bones, as you see me have." Luk 24.39

These sayings about the glorified body (which ascended and sits at the right hand of the Father) conflict wholly with ubiquity or being in every place, and the insensibility of Christ's body. Notwithstanding, this must be granted if we proceed to force the real presence of Christ's body out of the words about the supper, as simply understood. To this belongs what the apostle says, disputing about the resurrection of the dead: "If the dead do not rise, then neither is Christ risen." ^{1Cor 15.16} But "Christ is risen, being the firstfruits of those who sleep;" ^{1Cor 15.20} and therefore we shall rise also. Therefore, our own bodies being raised again, and it appearing what manner of body Christ's glorious body was, or is, our bodies will be made alike. And our bodies will be true bodies, consisting of sinews, veins, flesh, skin, and bones, visible, not invisible, and remaining in some certain place in heaven, not everywhere. From this it follows that the Lord's body is not invisible and everywhere. But if any man thinks that is not a good argument, which is fetched from our raised bodies to the Lord's raised body, or that it is contrariwise, let him accuse St. Paul, who taught us this by his example. Therefore, the catholic and right ancient faith constrains us to expound the words of the supper by a trope or figure.

Finally, when the Capernaïtes heard the Lord dispute about eating his body and drinking his blood, and thought and imagined a carnal eating and drinking, he said that he would ascend into heaven: namely, that they should not think about eating his natural body, since he would ascend into heaven in the same body. Nor is there left here any place for the new and frivolous device of certain men,¹ who pretend that to ascend into heaven is nothing else than to lay down the weak state and condition of the body, and to receive a supernatural one.

For St. Luke —whom we must altogether believe rather than such subtle devices or rather follies — says that the Lord was lifted up on high, and carried up into heaven from the sight of his disciples. Moreover, that his body was received by a cloud; and that his disciples looked up into heaven after him, until they heard the angels say to them that he would return again in the very same manner as they saw him depart. But who does not know that he will come again in the clouds of heaven? Therefore heaven, into which the Lord ascended, is the name of a place, not of a state or condition. Also in the gospel he promises us a place with himself, saying: "If I go to prepare you a place, I will come again, and take you unto me; that where I am, there you may be also." ^{Joh 14.3} Yes, he laid down all the conditions and infirmities of a mortal body in his resurrection; so that he had no need to lay them down at his ascension.

I suppose none of the faithful would deny that the Lord instituted nothing for us in vain, or without some singular and special commodity to us. But when the Lord said in the gospel, that his flesh being corporally eaten availed nothing; and where he speaks of no other body than that very same one of which he spoke in the words of the supper, namely, which he gave for us; it follows without any contradiction, that the Lord delivered nothing to us in the supper but what would profit us. But he would have delivered that which would not have profited us, if he had given us his body to be eaten corporally. It is therefore evident that it is very necessary that the words of the supper should be expounded.

To this belongs the notable prophecy and manifest commandment of our Lord Jesus Christ, saying in the gospel:

"Then if they say to you, Look, here is Christ, or there is Christ, do not believe it. For false Christs and false prophets will arise, and they will work great signs and wonders, so that if it were possible, the very elect would be brought into error. Behold, I have told you beforehand. If therefore they say to you, Behold, he is in the wilderness; do not go out. Behold, he is in the inner-most parts of the house,"

That is, in the closets or coffer, for this word, εν ταμειοις, en tameiois, signifies the most secret and inner-most parts of all the house, in which we usually lay up those things which we would keep safest; in Dutch we call it Schryn, schloss, und ghalt);

"do not believe it. For just as the lightning comes out of the east, and appears in the west, so shall the coming of the Son of man be." Mat 24.23-27

v.449

But although this place is used to explain many of the calamities of the Jews, what St. Jerome confesses cannot be denied, that likewise the destiny of the whole world is prophesied about, even to its end.¹ Therefore this place which we have alleged, concludes with the saying concerning Christ's last coming into the world at the day of judgment. And moreover, it cannot be denied that the Lord absolutely condemns that doctrine which claims that Christ remains or is present in diverse places of the world, in boxes or enclosed places. Not only do the books of the teachers of transubstantiation claim this, but tabernacles are erected to Christ's body² (which they call meat-tents³), and also chapels with famous temples and monasteries. In all and every one of these places, I say, they show us "Christ," saying, "Look, here is Christ, and there is Christ; behold the bread of angels. Christ is wholly in all these sacrifices, and he is fully and wholly in every part of them, in the same way he was when he was born of the virgin Mary, and hung upon the cross." They confirm this by and by with "miracles" and "wonders"; they also present it with proclamations, saying that such great mysteries are not to be inquired about, but simply to be believed; and that these things were wrought unspeakably and invisibly by the omnipotence of God. Nor did the Lord ignore how much this error would increase. There will be so many people who receive this error, running after Christ into the deserts and innermost places of their houses, that even the elect will be in danger.

But meanwhile, in such great a peril and danger of things, what does Christ teach his elect to do? Immediately he adds: "Do not believe it." What, do not believe that Christ is here or there on earth, in the wilderness, or in the innermost parts of the house, or even in the midst of the cities, or in the fields? He adds moreover: "Do not go out." Do not follow the multitude, which seeks Christ in a distant place, as if he were still resident on the earth. Therefore now, if the whole world, and all the councils in the world, all the kings and princes, indeed, if all the angels and saints, were to command us to believe that Christ is here or there corporally, the commandment of our only Redeemer Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the wisdom of the Father, by whom all things were made, forbids us to believe it. It should have that authority among all the godly, that they may know that they must not believe as creatures command them, but only as the Creator has commanded them.

Moreover, the Lord in this very same place in the gospel, grants us a reason for his doctrine. For why must we not believe that Christ is resident or bodily present upon the earth, but invisibly? Because, just as lightning comes from the east and appears in the west, so shall the coming of the Son of man be. This is like saying, The Son of God came once humbly into the earth, to redeem us through his humility and death on the cross; this being finished, he forsook the earth, and ascended into heaven, and sits on the right hand of the Father. From there he will not return into our regions except for judgment. But then he will appear glorious, noble, to be seen by all men, like the clearest sun, or rather like a lightning, right terrible to all the wicked. And therefore, there is no cause why, from the time of his ascension until his coming to judgment, we should look for him to come invisibly, and to remain corporally present with us. St. Jerome, expounding the same place, says:

² quae ubique locorum cernuntur, Lat. omitted: which are to be seen in all places.

³ ciboria, Lat. The tabernacle (called by modern writers the ciborium) was a sort of turret or cabinet on the upper surface of the altar, containing the pyx in which the consecrated hosts were reserved. — Hart's Eccles. Records, p. 230.

"This also must be said, that the second coming of our Saviour will not be shown in humility as before, but in glory. It would be foolish therefore, to seek him in a little corner, or in some secret place, who is the light of the whole world." ¹

But lest I seem to stand on some human authority, I will repeat what St. Paul teaches us in his epistle to the Hebrews, saying:

"Christ appeared once before the end of the world, to put away sin by offering up himself. And as it is appointed to men to die once, and after this comes the judgment, even so Christ, once being offered up to take away the sins of many, will the second time be seen by them without sin, who look to him for their salvation." ^{Heb 9.26-28}

Because our Lord came once into the world, he was once offered up; but he will come again, or the second time, at the end of the world. Therefore truly, he does not come again every day into the world. And because he has forbidden us to believe it, if any man wants to show Christ to us, present here or there in this world, then it must follow that he may be shown present here or there, indeed, in all places where the sacrament of thanksgiving is celebrated, only if we understand the words of the supper according to the letter. Therefore, it follows without any contradiction, by comparing places, that the words of the Lord's Supper should not be expounded according to the letter.

Having said this, I think I have satisfied those who are not of a contentious disposition. For undoubtedly their meaning is that we should speak of the sacraments sacramentally, and that sacramental phrases ought to be expounded sacramentally. Besides that, we should believe nothing that is repugnant to the rule of belief. But by the miracles and omnipotence of God, produced and alleged in this place for setting out and persuading us of an evil matter, they do no good at all after so many and such manifest arguments of truth. Miracles are joined to the word as if they were seals; the Lord God himself testifies of this in St. Mark. If then, they are repugnant to the word, and affirm what the word altogether denies, then who would not perceive them as that kind of miracle which the apostle speaks of in the second chapter of the second epistle to the Thessalonians — and which we just heard the Lord warned us about in the gospel, that we should in no case believe them?

The Lord can do all things, but he does not therefore do all things.² The prophet says: "Whatever the Lord would do, that he did, both in heaven and on earth." Moreover, he will not do such things as are contrary to his word and his faith; therefore, he cannot do that he will not do. Theodoret, in his third dialogue entitled Polymorphus, says:

"The Lord God will do nothing that is not in him of his own nature; he can do whatever he wills; but he will do only such things as are fit and agreeable to his nature. Therefore, of his own nature, God is true; he cannot do what is contrary to his word." ³

Other sound writers add: Not that he cannot do all things, but that he will not do what is contrary to his nature, and it does not become him to act against himself.

In the meantime, I expressly profess that I do not flatly condemn nor am I against all manner of Christ's presence in the church, even in the supper; for I am flatly against that bodily presence of Christ in the bread, which the papists defend and force upon the church of God. But I confess and acknowledge with open mouth and sincere heart that the spiritual, divine, and quickening presence of our Lord Christ, both in the supper and out of the supper, by which he continues to pour himself into us — not by signs which lack life, but by his Holy Spirit — to make us partakers of all his good graces, to justify, quicken, nourish, sustain, and satisfy us. We also feel this presence in ourselves through faith, by which we are both sustained, nourished, and satisfied. For Christ is the head of his church, and we have fellowship with him. But how would a living body be without its head? How would we be partakers of Christ, if we did not feel him present, indeed, living and working in us? But we have also treated these matters more at large in a convenient place.¹

There are some, I know well enough, who are not otherwise injurious to the truth, who question these things, crying out because the manner of Christ's presence in the supper is not fully enough expressed, especially since he himself has also said elsewhere, "Behold, I am with you continually to the world's end." ^{Mat 28.20} I am with you, he says, wholly, not just my power or divinity, not just my spirit or my strength. Moreover, it is a risk lest we seem to tear Christ in pieces, seeing that he cannot be wholly with us, unless he is present with us in body as well as in divinity. But we wonder what is in their heads. Do they not understand, that the Lord in that divine statement, spoken both at the very supper and also immediately after the supper, beat upon nothing so much as that very thing against which they set their shoulder? ² Namely, that Christ would be absent in body, but present in spirit; and that this presence would be more profitable to the church than his bodily presence? Do they not also understand why he took on flesh, and was nailed on the cross — that is to say, what the effect and use is of Christ's body? It was namely, that the sacrifice of his body being once offered for us upon the earth, he might carry it up into heaven, in token that both our bodies and souls after our death, through his merit, also be carried there? Therefore, after the Lord's body had fulfilled on earth what it came to fulfil, there is no reason why it should do anything else upon earth. He now sits, and ought to sit, at the right hand of the Father, so that he may draw all us there to him. If there is anyone who does not yet fully believe what we say, let him read the doctrine of St. Paul the apostle in the ninth and tenth chapters of his epistle to the Hebrews. Let him also read the fourteenth and sixteenth chapters of St. John's gospel. But if it is a pleasure to them to yank on the rope of contention, ³ and to stick precisely to these words of the Lord, "I am with you to the world's end," as well as to these, "This is my body, This is my blood," let them then expound to me these holy testimonies of the holy scripture.

Paul says that Christ dwells in our hearts, and that Christ lives in him, and he in Christ. The Lord says to the thief: "This day you shall be with me in paradise." And the evangelist says of the Lord being dead: "They laid him into the sepulchre." The scripture does not say, they laid flesh and bones into the sepulchre; but, they laid him into the sepulchre. The Lord did not say to the thief, your soul shall be with my spirit, or soul, in paradise; but, "Truly I say to you, this day shall you be with me in paradise." Nor does St. Paul say that Christ's Spirit and life live in him, or that they are what dwell in our hearts; but he says simply, that Christ dwells in our hearts. Who is so foolish and given to contention that, for these words and places of the scripture, he would contend that Christ's divinity was buried with his body; or that Christ's body was with his soul in paradise on that same day in which either of them departed this life; or that Christ's body together with his Spirit dwells in the hearts of the faithful, and lives in Paul, and that Paul lives in Christ's flesh? All men willingly admit the catholic sense of the catholic church, gathered from the word of God, which is that Christ in his Spirit is present in his church even to the world's end, but he is absent

³ contentionis funem trahere, Lat. – Originally, "to hale at the gable of contention." in body; and the thief's soul was present in paradise with Christ's soul that day, not with his body.¹ So it judges about the rest. But if any man mistrusts my interpretation, let him hear St. Augustine in his treatise upon John:

"He speaks of the presence of his body when he says, 'The poor you shall always have with you, but me you shall not always have.' Mat 26.11 For what he said in respect to his majesty, of his providence, and of his unspeakable grace, is fulfilled in this: 'Behold, I am with you always, even to the world's end.' Mat 28.20 But what he said of the flesh which the Word took upon himself in respect to being born of the virgin, taken by the Jews, nailed to the cross, taken down from the cross, wound in a sheet, laid into the sepulchre, and manifested at the resurrection, is fulfilled in this: 'You shall not have me with you always.' And why is this so? Because, touching his bodily presence, he was resident forty days with his disciples, who accompanied him but did not follow him. He then ascended into heaven, and is not here; for there he 'sits at the right hand of the Father:' and he is here; for he has not gone from here in respect to the presence of his majesty."

But if, disregarding all that we have said, they still proceed to urge this saying of the Lord out of Matthew, "Behold, I, even I, am (μεθ' ὑμῶν meth umoon) with you;" Mat 28.20 we will object this saying of the Lord out of the gospel: "It is expedient for you that I depart;" Joh 16.7 (look, here they also have this word 'I'). We also object against them this testimony of the angels out of Luke: "This Jesus, who is taken up (ἀφ' ὑμῶν aph umoon) from you into heaven," etc. Act 1.11 They will at length be constrained (whether they would or not) to reconcile such places that seem to be repugnant, and admit the general understanding which we have alleged and defended up to here.

Nor is there any danger of dividing Christ here; nor do we divide Christ's person, as Nestorius does, since we defend the propriety of both natures in Christ against the Eutychians. While Christ our Lord in body was still resident upon the earth, he himself witnesses in the gospel that nevertheless he was also in the heavens. And indeed Christ, who was both God and man all at once, was then in heaven, when he was crucified and resident on earth, although his body was not crucified in the heavens. Christ did not divide himself, even though being in heaven, he was notwithstanding resident and crucified in his body on earth, and not in heaven; so neither do we divide Christ, who is both God and man, even though we say he is present with us when we celebrate the supper, and that we communion with him.

Yet, we nevertheless affirm that he remains in heaven in his body, where he sits at the right hand of the Father; and so let us keep ourselves within the compass of the scripture. I have reasoned at large about this matter, where I treated both natures in Christ as unmixed in the one person.³

Up to here I have spoken about the natural meaning of the words of the Lord's Supper as briefly and plainly as I possibly could. I will not need to use many words touching the passage from Paul in first Corinthians, chap. 10, "The cup of blessing which we bless," etc., along with such other texts which are alleged to prove his bodily presence, for we already handled that passage once or twice.

It therefore remains that we examine and weigh what these people deliver to us touching the eating of Christ's body; and what the canonical scriptures teach is to be thought about that eating. What the Lord has promised, they say, he most surely and fully performs. They add: And he promised that he would give us his true body and very blood to be eaten and drunk in the form of bread and wine unto everlasting life. They gather that he has therefore given his very body and blood to the faithful, in the form of bread and wine, for food and drink unto everlasting life. For this reason, it must be eaten corporally, because it is corporal. To confirm this, they allege the Lord's words, as written in the 6th chapter of John's gospel.

We answer: God most perfectly and fully performs what he has promised. But we add, that he does not perform according to that meaning which we devise, but as his word truly imports. We must therefore see, first of all, in what sense the Lord promised to give his flesh for bread, and his blood for drink to the faithful; and next, how we should eat his flesh and drink his blood. These things truly, which the Lord promises here, are nearly all allegories and parables. The Lord promises that he will give us his flesh for bread or food, and his blood for drink.

But because food and drink are ordained and given to men to preserve their bodily life, and the Lord in the 6th chapter of John does not speak of the life of the body but of the soul, a passage is made from bodily things to spiritual things. When the Lord therefore promised that he would give us his flesh for bread or food, and his blood for drink, what did he promise other than that he would give his body to death, and shed his blood for the remission of sins? For by the death of Christ, we are preserved and delivered from death by food, as it were. By Christ's blood we are washed from sin, and our souls are spiritually drunk as it were with drink. Therefore, the Lord says nothing here about the bread of the Lord's Supper, nor does he promise that at the supper he will make the bread his flesh, nor that he would give his body in the form of bread. My exposition about Christ's words, concerning giving his body or flesh in the form of bread, etc., would be false and feigned, unless I confirm it by the words of Christ.

The Lord said in the gospel: "Seek the food that does not perish, but remains to life everlasting, which the Son of man will give you." Joh 6.27 Then he adds, by interpretation, "And the bread which I will give you is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." Joh 6.51 I said that I would give you bread or food (for this word "bread", in the Hebrew manner, is used by the Lord for food and all manner of sustenance); but he says, This bread or this food is my flesh, and therefore I promise to give you my flesh, when I promise to give you the bread of life. Here you have to expressly understand that the Lord, by bread, did not mean bodily bread, or the bread of the supper. But how does he promise to give his flesh for bread, that is to say, to be food for us, or to quicken us? The Lord repeats this word, "I will give;" and he says, "Which I will give for the life of the world." I will give it, that is to say, even to the death, that through my death I may quicken you. Therefore, by dying, my flesh will feed, that is to say, it will quicken. This much concerning the promise of his flesh for bread. Now follows the eating of it.

The holy scripture sets down in every place, without trope or allegory, that through faith we are made partakers of Christ's death, or of his body which was given for the world unto life. In this present place, by a trope or allegory, he bids us to eat and drink the flesh and blood of Christ unto everlasting life. Therefore, to eat Christ's flesh and drink his blood is nothing else but to believe that Christ's body was given for us, and his blood shed for us to the remission of sins; and consequently, that we remain in Christ, and have Christ remaining in us. For the faith which we spoke of, is not only an imagination or a thought concerning things past and exceeding our capacity; but that faith is a most certain assurance, and a feeling of heavenly things received within us, to our great commodity. For not only faith, but also the virtue and force of faith, is signified by the Lord in John's gospel, by the allegory both of eating and drinking. Food does not pass into the substance of our body without delight. So also by faith, through a great desire of the spirit, we are joined with Christ, that he may live in us, and we may live in Christ, and be partakers of all his good gifts. This is the spiritual eating of Christ, who never thought, nor so much as dreamed in this place, of the gross and bodily eating, which indeed is unprofitable. Because the whole point of the controversy consists in these words about eating and drinking the flesh and blood of the Lord: they interpret the words bodily, and we interpret them spiritually. It seems good to show that by these words about eating and drinking, the Lord meant nothing else than to believe, and consequently to abide in Christ, and to have Christ abiding in us. Therefore, by comparing places in the scripture, we will produce SIX EVIDENT TESTIMONIES in confirmation of our assertion.

1. "I am," says the Lord, "that bread of life: whoever comes to me shall not hunger, and whoever believes in me shall not thirst for ever." Joh 6.35 But who would deny that there is a relation between eating and not hungering, drinking and not thirsting? Therefore, [if this were meant bodily, then] when the Lord said, "He shall not hunger," he should first have said, "Whoever eats me." But rather he used the word coming, and said, "Whoever comes to me shall not hunger." Therefore, to eat is to come, and to come is to eat. And he immediately expounds on what it means to come to him, saying: "Whoever has heard from the Father, and has learned, is the one who comes to me;" Joh 6.45 that is to say, who receives me, and believes in me. For Paul also says: "Whoever comes to God must believe." Heb 11.6

These testimonies prove without contradiction, that "eat" is nothing else but "believe." Yet what follows is more manifest: "And whoever believes in me shall never thirst." And whoever drinks shall not thirst. Therefore, he has put "drink," for "believe." Therefore, to drink is to believe; for faith satisfies and pacifies our minds. Here is an answer to those who make this objection: Whether the Lord did not have words by which he might declare his mind, that by eating and drinking he meant believing? They have here, I say, a clear testimony by which he uses the one for the other.

2. Again, in the same treatise, the Lord says: "Whoever eats my flesh, and drinks my blood, has everlasting life; and I will raise him at the last day." Joh 6.54 And again in the same treatise he says: "This is the will of him that sent me, that whoever shall see the Son, and believe in him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him at the last day." Joh 6.40 Look, here you have again these words, to eat Christ's flesh, to drink his blood, and to believe in Christ, all in one sense.

3. Again, the Lord says: "I am the living bread which came down from heaven." Joh 6.51 And again he says: "Truly I say to you, he that believes in me has life everlasting... Whoever eats of this bread shall live forever." Joh 6.47, 58 Then to eat Christ, and to believe in Christ, are all one.

4. And again he says: "Whoever eats my flesh, and drinks my blood, abides in me, and I in him." Joh 6.56 Moreover, in his canonical epistle John says: "Whoever confesses," that is to say, believes, "that Jesus is the Son of God, God abides in him, and he in God." 1Joh 4.15

5. Again: "Truly, truly, I say to you, Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you can have no life in you." Joh 6.53 And the same Lord also says in the 8th chapter of John: "If you do not believe that I am he, you shall die in your sins." Joh 8.24 And again: "Truly, truly, I say to you, whoever keeps my word, shall never see death." Joh 8.51

6. Again the Lord says: "Just as the living Father has sent me, and I live by means of the Father; so likewise, whoever eats me will also live by means of me." Joh 6.57 And in the 5th chapter, John says: "As the Father has life in himself, so he has granted the Son to have life in himself." Joh 5.26 And likewise, in his canonical epistle he says: "Whoever believes in the Son of God has a testimony in himself." 1Joh 5.10 And, "Whoever has the Son has life." 1Joh 5.12

To these most evident testimonies of God, we will now join the testimonies of men who say the very same thing: that to eat Christ is nothing else but to believe in Christ and to abide in Christ. St. Augustine in his 25th treatise upon John, expounding these words of the Lord, says:

"This is the work of God, that you should believe in him whom he sent:" Joh 6.29 as he left written: "This is therefore to eat the food that does not perish, but which remains unto everlasting life. Why then do you prepare your teeth and your belly? Believe, and you have eaten." ¹

In his 26th treatise he says the same again:

"To believe in him, is to eat the bread of life. Whoever believes in him eats invisibly and is filled, because he is born invisible."

And again, in the same treatise he says:

"This is to eat that food and drink that drink: to abide in Christ and to have Christ abiding in him; and by this means, whoever does not abide in Christ, and in whom Christ does not abide, doubtless he does not eat his flesh spiritually," etc. ²

The same Augustine, Lib. de Doctrina Christiana, cap. 16, showing when figurative speech is to be admitted and when not, says this:

"If it is an enjoining speech, or forbidding some heinous offence or trespass, or commanding some profit or good deed to be done, it is not figurative. But if it seems to command some heinous offence or trespass, or to forbid some profit or good deed, then is it figurative. 'Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, you can have no life in you;' this seems to command a heinous offence and trespass: therefore it is figurative, willing us to be partakers of the Lord's passion, and to sweetly and profitably keep in memory, that his flesh was crucified and wounded for us." ³

Thus said Augustine, who doubtless set down not only his own meaning in this, but also the meaning of the whole catholic church at that time. Let our adversaries therefore take heed what they do, who would drive all the faithful to this wickedness and offence: namely, that we should corporally eat Christ's body.

Furthermore, to this is to be added what almost surpasses all that we have alleged before, because of the perspicuity and plainness of it. The Lord himself answered those who wondered, or rather murmured, after he had declared the sum of the true faith. They asked, "How can he give us his flesh to eat?" Joh 6.52 "Does this offend you?" Joh 6.62 he asks, that I said I would give you bread which came from heaven, even my flesh, to be food for all believers? — I suppose that offence will have no just place, when you see me ascend into heaven, from where I came down to you, and where I was with my Father before all beginning. Then you will perceive by my divine ascension that I am the heavenly bread, the natural Son of God, and the life of the world: you will perceive, moreover, that my flesh is not to be eaten bodily, and to be consumed and torn in morsels, but is carried up into heaven for a pledge of the salvation of mankind. And then he says: "It is the spirit that quickens; the flesh avails nothing." Joh 6.63 And he says still more plainly: "The words which I speak to you are spirit and life." It is certain that Christ's flesh avails very much, and is more profitable to the world than any tongue can express, yes, even the most eloquent. Indeed, the Lord has warned us beforehand, that we will have no life unless we eat his flesh.

Then the Lord denies that his flesh avails us anything at all, if it is eaten as the Capernaïtes understood it, that is to say, bodily. For being eaten bodily, it avails nothing; but being eaten spiritually, it quickens. And the Lord plainly professed that he spoke of spiritual eating, in which life consists.

These things being declared and confirmed in this way, we will gather them into a short summary, in which we think a sufficient answer is made to our adversaries' objection. The proposition is true, which holds that the Lord certainly performs what which he has promised. But the second proposition is false, which says that, by the word "bread" in the sixth chapter of John, the Lord meant the material bread of the sacrament, and that he promised he would convert it into his flesh. For by "bread" he did not mean the material bread of the sacrament, but food to live with, according to the propriety of the Hebrew tongue. Indeed, his very flesh was delivered to death to be food, I say, so that we might live through Christ's death. Therefore, the argument should have been framed this way:

What God promises he performs; but he promises that he will give us his flesh for bread — that is to say, to be food and life for us. Therefore, he has given his flesh to be food — that is to say, he has given himself up to death, so that by his death we might live.

This being true, surely the food of which the Lord speaks is not bodily food, even though the Lord has a true, human, and natural body, of like substance to ours. Rather it is spiritual food: not that the flesh is converted into the spirit, but because it should be received spiritually, not bodily. It is eaten spiritually by faith, not with the bodily mouth. For just as chewing or eating makes us partakers of the food, so we are made partakers of the body and blood of Christ through faith.

But you may say, How does it come to pass that bread (of which mention is made in the 6th chapter of John) does not signify the bread of the supper — which almost all the doctors, interpreters, and ministers of the church, apply these words to the Lord's Supper? I answer that these words of the Lord may be applied to the matter of the Lord's Supper for other reasons, even though the bread does not signify the bread of the sacrament.

Yes, I confess that these words of the Lord, about eating his flesh and drinking his blood, bring great light to the matter of the Lord's Supper. St. Augustine, Lib. de Consensu Evangelistarum tertio, capite primo, says: "John said nothing in this place (John 13) about the body and blood of the Lord, but plainly witnesses that the Lord has spoken more at large of it in another place."¹ He says this, undoubtedly referring to the 6th chapter of John. Since it is therefore one and the same² body of our Lord which he speaks of in both places (in the 6th chapter of St. John and the 26th chapter of Matthew); and in both places, that body is said to have been delivered to death for us, or for our life; and likewise, because there is but one means to partake of Christ, which is by faith in his body, which was delivered up and his blood shed; and finally, because it is the catholic or universal and undoubted doctrine, that eating Christ's flesh bodily avails nothing — surely the things written in the 6th chapter of John are agreeable with and fully open (clarify) the matter of the Lord's Supper.

With the intent that these two kinds may be better understood, I will recite what testimonies have always been alleged by the church out of the holy scriptures, concerning the two kinds of eating of Christ. Christ's body is eaten and his blood is drunk spiritually; it is also eaten and drunk sacramentally. The spiritual manner is accomplished by faith, whereby being united to Christ, we are made partakers of all his goodness. The sacramental manner is only performed in celebrating the Lord's Supper. The spiritual eating is perpetual for the godly, because faith is perpetual for them. They communicate with Christ both outside the supper and in the supper; and by it they increase and continue their new beginnings, as we showed before. ¹ Now, by adjoining the holy action, all things are done more manifestly and plainly. As for unbelievers and hypocrites, with their captain Judas, they never communicate with Christ — neither before the supper, nor in the supper, nor after the supper — because they continue in their unbelief. They partake of the Lord's sacraments to their own judgment and condemnation. ^{1Cor 11.29}

² So also ed. 1584: but ed. 1577, flesh and the same, etc.: una atque eadem caro et idem corpus, &c, Lat.

I know what some teach here, and how they devise a third kind of eating Christ, which is neither spiritual nor sacramental, but compounded of sacramental and corporal. For they also hold the opinion that the true and natural body of Christ is received bodily by unbelievers in the forms of the sacrament. However, it will more easily appear by certain sound arguments from the scripture, that this is but a device of man. We will apply these arguments to the traitor Judas, so that by this one example, all the ungodly (impious) may learn what they eat and drink at the Lord's Supper. For the judgment which is made of the head being revealed to us, it will be easier for us to pronounce of the members.

Some truly doubt whether Judas was present at the supper, when the Lord distributed the holy mysteries; among them is St. Hilary.² However, the evangelical history plainly says that the Lord sat down to meal with the twelve; yes, Luke so handled his narration, that we cannot doubt that Judas received ³ the mysteries with the rest of the apostles; which St. Augustine also avouches, Libro de Consensu Evangelistarum tertio, capitulo primo;⁴ and likewise in the 62nd treatise on John,⁵ and on the 10th Psalm,⁶ and in his 163rd epistle.⁷ Yes, moreover, Aquinas also, responding to St. Hilary in this point, approves it with us, Parte tertia Quaesti. 81. Art. 2. ⁸ Now, it being manifest that Judas was at supper with the rest of the apostles, it seems needful that it was known what he received of the Lord. He received the sacrament of Christ's body, as the other disciples did; but because he did not have faith, as the others had, he did not partake of Christ, nor did he eat and drink the Lord's body and blood.

For as many as eat the Lord's body and drink his blood, do not hunger or thirst; for they dwell in Christ, and Christ in them; they are Christ's members; and they never die. The contrary appears in Judas and all his fellows. Thus, unbelievers neither eat the Lord's body nor drink his blood. Moreover, it is beyond all doubt, that there is no agreement between Christ and Belial; for the apostle has pronounced this out of the general consent of the scriptures. ^{2Cor 6.15} But Judas is called Satan by Christ himself; therefore, Judas did not communicate with Christ. Now, if we contend absolutely that Judas ate the Lord's body, then truly we would be constrained to wickedly affirm that it is not only an unprofitable, but also a hurtful food. However, godliness teaches us that Christ is always a wholesome food for all those who eat him truly. St. Augustine also denies that Judas ate the Lord's body or drank his blood. In the 59th Treatise on St. John he says, "The apostles ate the bread which was the Lord, but Judas ate the Lord's bread against the Lord. They ate life, but he ate punishment." ¹ Again, in the 26th treatise:

"Whoever does not dwell in Christ nor Christ in him, doubtless he neither eats his flesh spiritually, nor drinks his blood: even though carnally and visibly he breaks the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ in his teeth; but rather, he eats and drinks the sacrament of so great a matter to his condemnation," etc. ²

He writes the same, and almost plainer, in the 21st book and 25th chapter, De Civitate Dei.³ Against these they object the authority of Paul, saying that those who eat unworthily are not guilty of the bread and cup of which they have eaten and drunk, but are guilty of the Lord's body and blood; and also, that they eat and drink their own damnation, for they do not discern the Lord's body. From this it necessarily follows that they have eaten and drunk the Lord's body unworthily, and not just the sacraments of Christ's body and blood.

We answer, that Paul says this in plain words: "Whoever eats of this bread and drinks of the Lord's cup," etc. ^{1Cor 11.27} Mark this: he says, "Whoever eats this bread and drinks of this cup unworthily;" he does not say, Whoever eats the flesh and drinks the blood unworthily. For those who eat the Lord are not without faith, and Christ dwells in them and they in him. If you marvel how unbelievers can be guilty of the Lord's body and blood eaten only sacramentally, learn it from other places of the scripture. The Lord says in John: "Truly, truly, I say to you, He that receives whomever I send, receives me; and whoever receives me, receives him that sent me." ^{Joh 13.20} Therefore, whoever does not receive an apostle, does not trespass against the apostle, but against God himself, even though meanwhile he has not seen God, nor would he seem to have repelled him. We read how the Judge will say to those on his left hand: "Depart from me, you wicked, into everlasting fire: for I was hungry, and you gave me no food: I was thirsty, and you gave me no drink," etc. ^{Mat 25.41-42}

But now, listen to how the reprobate takes exception to this sentence of the Judge. "Lord, when did we see you hungry or thirsty, and did not minister to you?" Then hear again what the Judge will answer: "Truly I say to you, in that you did it not to one of the least's these, you did it not to me." ^{Mat 25.44-45} Therefore, one who sins against a minister or a beggar, sins against Christ himself, though meanwhile he has not hurt Christ's person in any point. So also, whoever receives the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ unworthily, is guilty of the body and blood of Christ, though meanwhile he has not received the very body and blood of the Lord. Paul says in another place, that revolvers crucify again for themselves the Son of God. ^{Heb 6.6} In another place, he also denies by all means that it is possible for Christ to be crucified or to die any more. ^{Heb 10.26} Therefore, Christ cannot be crucified again by apostates or revolvers; however, their shameful falling away from him is esteemed as if they had crucified the Son of God. Therefore, even though the wicked do not eat the Lord's very body nor drink his blood, nevertheless they are guilty of betraying the Lord's body and blood as far as it lies in them to do so.

If a rebel treads under his foot the seal or letters of the prince or magistrate, even though he does not touch the magistrate himself nor tread him under his foot, he is said to have trodden the magistrate under his foot; and is not accused for hurting the seal or defiling the letters, but he is charged with treason, and accused of treading the prince under his feet. What marvel is it, then, if we hear it said that those who eat the Lord's bread unworthily, are guilty of the body and blood of Christ? For the bread and the mystical cup are a sacrament and seal of it.

Up to here we have disputed about eating the body of Christ, and drinking his blood, handling every point of it with as much brevity as we could. Now we will knit up the other ends of the Lord's Supper, being placed in Lord's the description of the supper. We said that the supper was instituted by the Lord, so that it might visibly represent the gifts of God to the church, and lay them out before the eyes of all men. But we have learned by the whole discourse of this matter, that Christ himself is a most full and rich treasure of all the gifts of God — namely, being delivered unto death for us, we have from him all things belonging to life, remission of sins and life everlasting. Since these things are invisible and gotten by faith, they are also visibly, that is to say, by sacraments, represented to almost all the senses — to the sight, hearing, taste, and feeling — with the intent, that man, being wholly moved with these, both in body and soul, may celebrate this most comforting mystery with great rejoicing in his heart. To this now pertains that analogy I spoke of before in the seventh sermon of this decade,¹ by which I would have these things better learned.

Furthermore, we said that the supper was instituted by the Lord, that he might visibly gather together into one body all his members, who were in a way dispersed throughout all the world. And we said somewhere else ² that the holy men called the supper a league or confederacy. We are invisibly knit with Christ and all his members by unity of faith and participation in one Spirit; but in the supper, we are joined together by a visible conjunction.

For now we are very nearly knit and joined together not by words, but by deeds also, by a mystery, by a sacrament, revealing and declaring to all men, by celebrating the supper, that we are also of the number of those who believe that they are redeemed by Christ, and that they are Christ's members and people. And we bind ourselves together to Christ and the church, that we will keep the sincere faith, and also promise that we will use good deeds and charity towards all men. Look for more touching this matter in the seventh sermon of this decade.³ Regarding this truly, St. Paul proved that it was not lawful for those who receive together at the Lord's table, to eat meat offered to idols, and take part in profane sacrifices. ^{1Cor 10.20-21} Today, if many would rightly weigh and consider this, they would not be seen so busy in strange and foreign sacrifices.

We also said that the Lord instituted the supper, that thereby he might keep his death in memory, so that it would never be blotted out with oblivion. For Christ's death is the summary of all God's benefits. He would therefore have us keep in memory the benefit of his incarnation, passion, redemption, and of his love. And although the remembrance of a thing that is past is celebrated (namely, his death), yet it greatly belongs to us, and it quickens us. Nor must we think that this is the least end; for there is none so diligently expressed as this. For the Lord recites, "Do this in remembrance of me." ^{Luk 22.19} But that holy rite or holy action, joined with the word or with the preaching of Christ's death and the redemption of mankind, marvellously renews that benefit from time to time, and does not let it be forgotten!

Last of all, we said that the supper was ordained by the Lord, that thereby we might be admonished of our duty, praise, and thanksgiving. It is our duty to be sincere in the faith of Christ, and to embrace all our brethren with Christian charity for the Lord's sake, and to beware that we do not defile our bodies with the filth of the world, since we are cleansed with the blood of Christ.

Paul the apostle says: "As often as you eat of this bread, and drink of the Lord's cup, declare the Lord's death until he comes." ^{1Cor 11.26}

But to declare the Lord's death is to praise the goodness of God, and to give thanks for our redemption obtained through his death; for the apostle Peter says: "You are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people set at liberty,¹ that you should show forth virtues of him that has called you out of darkness into his marvellous light." ^{1Pet 2.9} But we have spoken of this also in another place. ²

This much I thought it good to repeat in few words, touching the ends of the supper, which every godly man being instructed by the Holy Ghost diligently considers. I would now let you go, dearly beloved brethren, except that I see it will be a common commodity to teach in few words, how every one should prepare himself for the Lord's Supper, so that he does not come to it unworthily. But it would not be a lost labour to first of all search out who worthily or unworthily eats and drinks of the Lord's bread and cup. No man can deny that there are degrees in our worthiness and unworthiness, if he rightly examines the judgments of God, and looking narrowly into the nature of our religion, is able to judge it. The chief degree of unworthiness is to come to the holy mysteries of faith without faith. He comes worthily, who comes with faith; and he comes unworthily, who comes without faith. Those works which are said to be worthy of repentance in the gospel, are penitent works, or appropriate for those who profess repentance.³ But what is more seemly, more fitting and just, than that the one who is to celebrate the Lord's Supper, believes that he is redeemed by Christ's death, who was offered up as a price for the whole world? And that for that reason, he is desirous to give thanks to Christ his Redeemer. Contrariwise, what is more unseemly and unjust, than to receive that pledge of Christ's body, and meanwhile have no communion or fellowship with Christ; to come to thanksgiving, and yet not give thanks from the bottom of his heart? For what else unites us to Christ, or makes us partakers of all his benefits, and also thankful, but faith? What separates us from Christ, and spoils us of all his gifts, and makes us most loathsome, but unbelief? Therefore, faith or unbelief makes us partakers of the Lord's table worthily or unworthily.

In the Acts, Paul the apostle says to the Jews who, through unbelief, rejected or treated as nothing the preaching of the gospel, "The word of God should first be preached to you; but because you reject it, and judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, behold, we turn to the Gentiles." ^{Act 13.46} How did the Jews pronounce that they were unworthy of everlasting life, and like judges, pronounce sentence against themselves? In setting themselves against God's word through unbelief; by not apprehending Christ by faith, who is the life and righteousness of the world. Therefore, the chief and greatest portion of our worthiness or unworthiness consists in faith or unbelief. St. Peter witnesses that our hearts are purified by faith. ^{Act 15.9} True faith, therefore, is the cleanness of Christians. About which St. Augustine says:

"The unbeliever does not eat the flesh of Christ spiritually, but rather he eats and drinks the sacrament of so great a thing to his own condemnation; because being unclean, he presumed to come to Christ's sacraments; which no man receives worthily except he that is clean. Of him it is said, 'Blessed are the clean in heart; for they shall see God,' etc." ⁴

Moreover, they eat and drink of the Lord's Supper unworthily who, although they are not destitute of faith, yet by abusing it, they pervert the right institution of the Lord. Such seems to have been the error of the church of Corinth, which mingled the private and profane with the ecclesiastical and mystical banquet, and did not differentiate between the Lord's bread, which is called Christ's body, and common food. For Paul says: "Whoever eats and drinks unworthily, he eats and drinks his own damnation, not differentiating the Lord's body." Therefore, to see no difference with the Lord's body, is to unworthily eat the Lord's bread and to drink of his cup. For this word διακρίνειν (diakrinein); to judge or differentiate, is to weigh and consider a matter exactly with judgment, to the uttermost of a man's power, to judge it, and differentiate between that and all other things. Furthermore, the Lord's body is not only that spiritual body of the Lord — namely, the church of the faithful — but it is that very body which the Lord took of the virgin, and offered up for our redemption, and that now sits at the right hand of the Father.

To be short, the bread of the sacrament in the supper is the Lord's body; it is, I say, the sacrament of the true body which was given for us. Whoever, therefore, does not differentiate between this, the Lord's mystical bread, and profane food, but comes to Christ's table as he would to a table of common and gross food, and has not acknowledged that this heavenly food differs far from other human food, does not come in the way the Lord instituted, but follows his own reason. Surely he does not differentiate the Lord's body, but eats and drinks his own damnation.

Paul again expounds, saying: "Therefore, my brethren, when you come together to eat, wait for one another, so that you do not meet to condemnation." ^{1Cor 11.33-34} Whoever therefore precludes the public supper by eating his own private supper, that is to say, whoever does not sup as the Lord has appointed, eats and drinks unworthily. For before, unworthy eaters and drinkers are said to eat and drink their own damnation; and here they are said to meet together to their condemnation, who hasten to the supper, not waiting for their brethren; and they do not differentiate the Lord's body. St. Augustine in his 62nd treatise upon John says:

"The apostle speaks of those who received the Lord's body without difference and carelessly, as if it had been any other kind of food whatever. Here therefore, if the one is reprov'd who makes no difference about the Lord's body, that is to say, does not discern the Lord's body from other foods, how then should not Judas be damned, who came to the Lord's table feigning that he was a friend, but was an enemy?" etc. ¹

How much more grievously they seem to sin today, who, perverting the lawful and first use that was instituted by the Lord, establish their own abuse with great contention; yes, and grievously persecute those who cry out against it and will not receive it!

Furthermore, since by experience we find every day that there are many things lacking in our faith, by means of which diverse vices spring up among us, of which our own unworthiness is the lightest or least of all.² For the Lord of his grace may easily wash these away, and almost wipes them away by sending his cross upon us — not imputing such infirmities to us to our condemnation. For in another place the apostle says, "there is no condemnation for those who are grafted into Christ Jesus, and do not walk after the flesh, but after the Spirit." ^{Rom 8.1}

Neither does our most just Lord punish these sundry sorts of unworthiness with equal punishment. Let us therefore see what the blessed apostle teaches us concerning the punishment of those who eat unworthily. He says: "Whoever eats this bread, or drinks of the Lord's cup unworthily, will be guilty of the Lord's body and blood." By these words he means that chief and most foul unworthiness of all others: namely, unbelief. For he is guilty of the Lord's body and blood, to whom the fault of the Lord's death is imputed — that is to say, to whom Christ's death becomes death, and not life. As it also happened to those who crucified Christ, through unbelief and wickedness; for Christ's blood seemed profane to them, as if it had been the blood of some beast, murderer, or wicked person, worthily shed for his offences. And I ask you, what else does he think, than that Christ's blood is profane, who does not believe that it was shed for the sins of the world? And yet he dares take part of the Lord's Supper, so that he may worthily be said to be guilty of the Lord's body and blood. It is a very great offence to eat the Lord's bread and to drink of his cup unworthily, through unbelief. This is laid before our eyes by the example of Judas. He did not believe in the Lord Jesus. Indeed, he conceived how to deliver him into the hands of thieves and murderers; yet he nevertheless sat down to meal, and took part of the Lord's Supper. Therefore, in the end the devil worthily claimed him wholly for himself.

For St. John witnesses, that about the end of the supper, the devil entered into Judas. It is not that he was not in Judas before he came to the supper (for he had begun to dwell in him before, and to stir him forward); but because, after so many admonitions from our Lord Christ, and after that, profaning the mysteries of Christ, and trodding them underfoot as it were, the devil wholly entered into him, and fully possessed him.

The apostle Paul threatened damnation to those who do not differentiate the Lord's body, who are placed, as it were, in another degree of unworthiness, saying: "For whoever eats and drinks unworthily, eats and drinks his own damnation." He sets down the reason for it in this sentence: namely, why we should not rashly and carelessly come to the Lord's table, for we then approach to our condemnation. But condemnation or judgment is the pain or punishment which the Lord lays upon his faithful people when they sin, not in another world truly, as he does upon unbelievers, but in this world. For it follows in the words of the apostle, which conveys the same sense to us: "For this cause, many are weak and feeble among you, and many sleep. For if we had judged ourselves, we would not have been judged. But when we are judged, we are corrected by the Lord, so that we should not be condemned with the world." 1Cor 11.30-32 The apostle plainly distinguishes between the unworthy eaters who are subject to God's correction, and worldly men, that is to say, unbelievers, whose punishment the Lord defers to that other world. But upon his faithful people, who yet offend through negligence, and come to the supper insufficiently instructed, he lays diverse and sundry afflictions, such as pestilence, famine, sickness, and the like, to shake off their drowsiness. For it follows: "If we had judged ourselves," that is, if we ourselves had restrained our vices, and separated ourselves from evil, "we would not have been judged," that is to say, punished and corrected. For he immediately adds: "But when we are judged, we are chastised by the Lord." To be judged, therefore, is to be chastised. But hereby we learn from where so many mischiefs flow into the church, namely, by the unworthy use of the Lord's Supper.

But some man will answer here, If the matter is so, it would be better to wholly abstain from the Lord's Supper. But if anyone wholly abstains, he also thereby sins against the Lord, and does so grievously. For he treats as nothing the Lord's commandment, who says, "Do this;" yes, he treats as nothing both the Lord's death and all the gifts of God. Therefore, the one who omits to celebrate the supper has not escaped danger. We have said this before. You must go another way to work, if you desire to avoid both danger and sin. Hear the counsel of Paul, very compendiously saying: "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup." 1Cor 11.28 And we must mark that in this examination, he sends no man to another, but sends every man to himself. The papists bid you to, "Go to an auricular confessor," to confess yourself there, to receive absolution, and to make satisfaction for your sins according to the form you are commanded; and so they bid you, as if sufficiently cleansed, to go to the Lord's table. But Paul, the doctor of the Gentiles and the vessel of election, does not say a word about those things, but simply says: "Let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup." For just as God is the searcher of the hearts, and requires the affection of the mind, and hates hypocrisy, so none knows what is in the heart of man, or what affections we bear toward God, except we ourselves.

Therefore, he would have us, ourselves, examine everything in ourselves; that is to say, he wills every man to descend into himself, and to examine himself. This examination cannot be made without faith and the light of God's word. But the faithful man, having the light of God's word shining before him, and faith exerting her force and power, inquires of himself whether he acknowledges all his sins which he has manifoldly committed against God, and whether he is sorry for having committed them; and whether with sincere faith of heart, he believes that Christ has washed away and forgiven all his sins; and whether he freely confesses with his mouth, as he believes in his heart, that life and salvation consists in Jesus Christ alone, and in no other; and whether he has determined with himself to die in this confession; and whether he means to diligently and earnestly apply himself to innocence and holiness of life; and whether he is ready to love and help all the members of Christ's body, of whom he is also a member, and is ready to spend his life for them, according to the example of Christ; and whether he has remitted or pardoned all anger and enmity; and whether he is desirous to call to mind Christ's passion and the whole mystery of our redemption, and to give thanks to God for our redemption, and for all other gifts of God already received and to be received. This is the right examining, which agrees with receiving the mystical supper. And when we have done so, we may, in humbleness and fear of the Lord, and with gladness,¹ approach the supper of our Lord Christ.

But here the faithful tremble, who are privy as it were, to their own imperfection and infirmity; for they do not find these things to be so perfect in their minds, as otherwise they know a just perfection requires. Satan comes, and he throws in many and great obstacles, with the intent that he may draw us back from the celebration of the supper. Therefore we say, if any man supposes that none is to be admitted to the supper except one who is purged from all sin and infirmity, surely he would drive away and exclude all men, however many live in this world. Indeed, he would altogether deprive them of the Lord's Supper, so that it would no longer be for sinful men but for angels. We must remember that this examination rests within its own bounds, and that God here also, as everywhere else, uses his clemency and mercy towards us. He knows our weakness and corruption, and can bear with us our infirmities. The Israelites under king Hezekiah, not being fully cleansed, took part of the paschal lamb. But the king prayed, and said: "The Lord, who is good, will have mercy on all men who with all their heart seek the God of their fathers, and will not impute it to them, such that they are not sanctified." And to this is added in the holy history, 2Chron. 30th chap.: "And the Lord heard Hezekiah, and he was pleased with the people." The worthiness which is inquired after by an exact examination, is not absolute perfection, but a will and mind instructed by God, which humbly acknowledged its own unworthiness, and therefore humbly prays for an increase of faith and charity, and ² all perfection in Christ alone.

² requirit, Lat. omitted: seeks.

At that first supper the apostles were Christ's guests, and among these was Judas; but because he lacked faith and was a traitor, indeed, a murderer, he was made guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. The other apostles were also sinners themselves, but not wicked; they believed in Christ; they loved Christ, and they loved one another like brethren. Therefore, they did not eat the Lord's Supper unworthily, as Judas did; although in the meantime, at the same table, they showed tokens of great imperfection. For Peter, not without great contempt and reproach by his brethren, prefers himself before them all. Moreover, they contend among themselves for honour, which of them would seem to be greater than another. I will not now recite that right after they arose from the table, they shamefully forsook their master and ran away, and in many ways behaved themselves unworthily. But all these things were easily washed away, for faith had taken very deep root within them.

Nor will I hesitate here to recite word for word the comfort of Master John Calvin, a godly and learned man, who with great commendation teaches in the church today, my fellow-minister and most well-beloved and dear brother, which he has set down for the afflicted in this case.

"Let us call to remembrance that this holy banquet is a medicine for the sick, a comfort for the sinful, a largess to the poor; which to the healthy, righteous, and rich, if any such could be found, would bring small vantage. For seeing that in this banquet Christ is given to us to be eaten, we understand that without him we faint, fail, and are forsaken. Moreover, seeing that he is given to us to be our life, we understand that without him, we are but dead. Therefore, this is the greatest and only worthiness which we can give to God: if we lay before him our own vileness and unworthiness, that through his mercy he may make us worthy of himself; if we despair in ourselves, that we may be comforted in him; if we humble ourselves, that we may be lifted up by him; if we accuse ourselves, that we may be justified by him. Moreover, if we strive for that unity which he commends to us in the supper; and if, as he makes us all dwell in him, we likewise wish there were one soul, one heart, and one tongue in us all — if we well weigh and meditate on these things, then these thoughts will never trouble us.

We who are naked and destitute of all goodness, we who are stained with spots of sin, we who are half dead, how could we worthily eat the Lord's body? Let us rather think that, being poor, we come to a plentiful giver; we who are sick come to a physician; we who are sinful come to a Saviour; so that the worthiness which is commanded by God, consists chiefly in faith, which reposes all in God and nothing in ourselves: secondly, it consists in charity; and such charity that it is sufficient if we offer it to God imperfect, so that he may increase it to the better, seeing that we cannot perform it absolutely as it ought to be." ¹

I said this much up to here about the most holy supper of our Lord Jesus Christ, the most excellent and wholesome sacrament of Christians. For even from the very beginning, while the apostles were yet living, Satan, the most deadly enemy to our salvation, lying in wait, has set about to overthrow it by many corruptions and defilings. Now faithfully cleansed from these for a time, Satan does not leave it so, but intermingles and throws a heap of contentions into this, which was made a token to the church, of a covenant never to be broken.²

For which the thing itself, and our salvation, requires that we be circumspect, and give no place to the tempter; but agreeing altogether in Christ, and being joined into one body by the faithful

² Rather, he does not cease to cast it in the way and to bring it in, as a kind of ball of contentions, though it is to the church a token of a covenant never to be broken.

5-9. THE NINTH SERMON: OF THE LORD'S HOLY SUPPER.

celebrating of the supper, we may love one another, and give everlasting thanks to our Redeemer and Lord Christ; to whom be praise and glory now and forever. Amen. Amen.

5-10. THE TENTH SERMON: THE INSTITUTIONS OF THE CHURCH.

OF CERTAIN INSTITUTIONS OF THE CHURCH OF GOD. OF SCHOOLS. OF ECCLESIASTICAL GOODS, AND THE USE AND ABUSE OF THEM. OF CHURCHES AND HOLY INSTRUMENTS OF CHRISTIANS.
OF THE ADMONITION AND CORRECTION OF THE MINISTERS OF THE CHURCH, AND OF THE WHOLE CHURCH. OF MATRIMONY. OF WIDOWS. OF VIRGINS.
OF MONKS. WHAT THE CHURCH OF CHRIST DETERMINES CONCERNING THE SICK; AND OF FUNERALS AND BURIALS.

There remain certain things, but a few truly, which are to be expounded to you, dearly beloved; which partly pertain to the institution of the ecclesiastical ministry and its preservation; there are partly certain peculiar ordinances of the church, which the church cannot lack. In this last sermon of this Decade, so far as the Lord gives me grace to speak, I intend to treat these things as briefly as I can.

First of all, we must know that the Lord our God has not burdened his church with too many laws and institutions. Rather he has set down a few, easily numbered, and those are not costly, intricate, or long, but profitable, simple, plain, and short. In times past, the Lord appointed under the law a costly and sumptuous worshipping of him for the people, notwithstanding that all things in it were certain, numerable, and moderate; nor would he have anything added to, or taken from it, at the pleasure of men, or to be used other than he had appointed.

Who then would think that after abrogating the law, the Lord would deliver to the church of his new people, a sumptuous and infinite discipline? Therefore, it is partly the covetousness of the pastors and estates of the church, and partly the monstrous superstition of the common people, that has made everything so sumptuous and infinite in the church. Let us stick to this, that the Lord our God has instituted in his church but very few things, and only such as are necessary. And therefore, we should all endeavour that the church not be over-burdened with traditions and institutions which did not proceed from God himself. The church of God is decked and furnished gorgeously enough, if she just retains and keeps the institutions of her God and Lord.

The chief and principal points of the godliness of the church of God are, the sincere teaching of the law and the prophets, of Christ and the apostles; faithful prayer offered to her only God through Christ alone; a religious and lawful administration and receiving of Christ's sacraments; all of which we have treated up to here through five decades. To this belongs charity also, which is a communicating of riches or well-doing. We have said something about this already in the first decade,¹ and we will say something else in this sermon. Nor does Luke in the Acts mention any other things that describe what manner of church the faithful primitive church of Christ was, being founded by the apostles, and what were its principal points. "They were continuing," he says, "in the doctrine of the apostles, in communicating, in the breaking of bread, and in prayer."

Act 2.42 Under these few points, all godliness is comprised.

To the ecclesiastical ministry are joined these that follow. Christian schools have the first place, which produce a plentiful increase of prophets or ministers of the church. All nations have understood, unless they were altogether barbarous, that without schools, no kingdoms or commonwealths can happily be maintained. And therefore, not only Moses in the book of Genesis,² but also Strabo in the 17th book of his Geography, reports how the most famous colleges for priests and philosophers were instituted among the Egyptians.

Histories also mention that the most noble men of the whole world travelled into Egypt to obtain wisdom. Plato also is said to be the first among the number of the chief and principal philosophers.¹ Neither is it unadvisedly written in the book of the Kings, that Solomon excelled the wise men of the Egyptians in wisdom. And not only the Egyptians, but also the Palestines, a nation more famous for wars than for learning, are said to have had their priests, of whom they asked counsel in matters of doubt, as Samuel writes in his holy history. ^{1Sam 6.2} And Daniel also witnesses that the Babylonians had most famous schools; as also the Medes and Persians did, from where sprang their Magi, I should say wise men, notable in all parts of philosophy. I need not say anything about the Greeks and Romans, since there is no man who does not know their most famous city of Athens, which is so much spoken of by all learned men, and also the goodly colleges of their priests and soothsayers. But, omitting foreign examples, let us allege our own, or those which are ecclesiastical.

God, who gave to his people a most absolute form of a happy commonweal and kingdom, distributed schools through forty-eight towns of the realm. Those towns, because of the philosophizing Levites, were called Levitical. For he had consecrated all the Levitical tribe to the priesthood and to studies — not that it was unlawful for gentlemen of other tribes to study philosophy or wisdom, but because the Levites were peculiarly appointed to holy studies.² For it is evident that Isaiah and Daniel, two of the brightest lights of those who prophesied, were of the tribe of Judah. Other tribes also have produced men right singular in all kinds of knowledge. And those towns likewise were called Levitical and priestly, not that only priests dwelt in them, but because they had synagogues in them. But at the tabernacle in Shiloh, and especially in the city of Jerusalem, there was a school surpassing all others, in the manner of a university as they call them now-a-days. And the same holy history witnesses that the most famous men governed those schools.

For we read in Rama that Samuel, who was highest in all wisdom, godliness, and learning, was governor and principal of Naioth, that is to say, the burse (as they term it) or college of prophets. Elijah and Elisha, the clearest lights of the church of Israel, were rulers over the school of Jericho and Gilgal. That naughty Jeroboam pulled down the schools, and trod underfoot the order of the priests, and put in their places, without any choice, some who were the refuse of the people. But the men of God, Elijah and Elisha, knew well that without schools, sound doctrine could not flourish or be preserved; and therefore they applied themselves wholly to renewing the schools. And when lawful tributes were denied to them, being bestowed by wicked princes on flatterers and bellies, that is to say, on priests of the idols of calves and of Baal, it came to pass by the goodness of the Lord, that some good men bestowed something on those who were desirous of learning — those who, contenting themselves with a mean living, behaved themselves valiantly in that most corrupt age. But those notable men, those wise men and prophets who governed schools, were called fathers; for which their disciples and scholars were termed the sons of the prophets. Amos and Jeremiah call them Nazarites.³ For Amos says, "I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet;" ^{Amo 7.14} namely, he was not brought up in the knowledge of liberal arts. And the same man says again: "I have raised up prophets from your sons, and Nazarites from your young men." ^{Amo 2.11} And Jeremiah commends the manner of those who studied; and in his Lamentations he bewails those who perished altogether in the captivity. ^{Lam 4.8} They are further called the sons of the prophets for the affection which they bore towards their schoolmasters, as if they had been their parents, and for their obedience and daily study towards them. But the nobler and wiser the princes were, the more diligence they employed in repairing schools, and restoring ecclesiastical order.¹ A man may see this, not only in David and Solomon, but also in Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah and Josiah, who were most virtuous and most happy princes. In the captivity and after the captivity of Babylon, the Lord's people were dispersed and scattered into many kingdoms far and wide.

But wherever they were carried, they erected schools or synagogues; and when the city of Jerusalem was restored, they often came to it. Therefore, the Acts of the Apostles mentions that when St. Paul preached the word of God among the Gentiles, he went into the synagogues and taught. And St. James the apostle says: "Moses had of old, those in every city who preached him in the synagogues." ^{Act 15.21} He does not speak of the cities of Judea and Galilee, but of the cities of the Gentiles, in Syria, Cilicia, and Asia. And what we read in the Acts shows that, being dispersed and scattered abroad, they sometimes came to the holy city of Jerusalem. "There were dwelling at Jerusalem certain Jews, religious men, from all nations under heaven." ^{Act 2.5} And also what St. Paul recites about himself, confirms it; that being born free in the city of Tarsus, he travelled to Jerusalem to Gamaliel's feet, ^{Act 22.3} that is to say, with the intent to hear the instruction and to be a scholar under Gamaliel. So likewise, we read that at Jerusalem there were colleges or synagogues of the Libertines, Cyrenians, Alexandrines, Cilicians, and Asians. ^{Act 6.9} This use of schools continued until Christ's time, yes, and after his ascension into the heavens, almost until the destruction of the city; although in the meantime it may appear to have been depraved at various times.

Christ also, the Son of God, our king and high bishop, instituted the most famous school of all, calling to it the twelve apostles and the seventy disciples; chosen men, I say, eighty-two in number. Indeed, the apostles drew very many disciples to themselves. And primarily, St. Paul, the chosen instrument of God to convert the Gentiles, we read had in his company Sopater of Berea, Luke of Antioch, Mark of Jerusalem, Barnabas, Sylva or Sylvanus, Caius and Timothy, Aristarchus and Secundus, Tychicus and Trophimus, Titus and Linus, Crescens and Epaphras, Archippus and Philemon, Epaphroditus and Artemas, and many others. He has also commended most diligently to good men the studious and the ministers of the churches, exhorting all men to liberality, that they may lack nothing. And writing to Titus: "Bring diligently, Zenas the lawyer and Apollo on their way, that they may lack nothing." ^{Tit 3.13}

Moreover, it may be gathered by plain and manifest proofs out of the thirteenth chapter of the Acts, that there was a very famous and apostolic school at Antioch in Syria. Eusebius, also of Caesarea, abundantly witnesses what noble schools were at Alexandria in Egypt, and in other renowned churches.² We also declared that more at large, when time served, in a book we wrote about the institution of bishops.³ But in the process of time, when all things pertaining to the church began to decline for the worse, ecclesiastical schools also degenerated into abbeys, or into colleges of canons and monks.

But of all these things about which we have spoken, I think it is not unknown to anyone, that schools principally belong to the preservation of the church, and to the maintenance of the holy ministry. In these schools, good arts might be exercised very profitably, to further the study of the holy scriptures. Of this sort, chief of all are the studies and knowledge of holy tongues, of logic, natural philosophy, and the mathematics; and these should be moderately known, and directed to the certain scope and end of godliness. For a man may sometimes find his wits worn and grown old in diverse arts and disciplines, and yet not once meddling or inured with holy exercises and studies. But I would to God that the wicked, being too glutted with profane study, would also stop contemning holy scriptures as plain barbarous. A man also may find some wits so busied in the study of the mathematics, that they are better fit to be masters of buildings, than governors or pastors of churches. Indeed, they have so far crept into the study of astronomy and the astronomer's heaven, that they quite forget the blessed heaven, ¹ which is the seat of the blessed saints, and anything pertaining to them. Instead, they will be sufficiently happy if they can but once attain to the knowledge of the motion of the visible heaven, and to the course of the stars.

There are those who meddle too much with the study of philosophy, and the trifles of logic, and the rules of rhetoric, and never attain to any end, nor earnestly think of directing their travails to edifying the church. Commonly they become contentious and brawling disputers for the most part, and arrogant controllers. To them, nothing seems to be neatly and aptly enough spoken or done by others, except what is tempered, and as it were tuned, to their great conceiving heads, thus agreeing with prescribed rules that they do not swerve from, even so much as a hair's breadth. These men snarl ² and entangle all things with their doltish disputations, puffing out nothing but quarrelling controversies, most arrogantly taking upon themselves to judge all men's doings and sayings whatsoever. Indeed, though others are good and tolerable, they snap at them, and maliciously cavil against them, being vain babblers rather than philosophers — yes, the very plagues of schools and churches. They spit out the poison of debates, contentions, variances, strifes, and divisions, at and into the church. Against these, St. Paul the apostle seems to speak to Timothy. For after he had briefly set down the sum of sound doctrine, he adds to it:

"Teach and exhort this. Whoever teaches otherwise, and does not hold himself contented with the healthful word of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the doctrine which is according to godliness, is puffed up, knowing nothing, but spending his time about questions and contention in words; from this grows hatred, strife, slander, evil suspicions, vain conflicts of men who are corrupt in heart and destitute of the truth, who suppose godliness is for gain. Avoid the company of such."

1Tim 6.2-5

Truly, it never went well with the church, when learned and studious men, forsaking the plainness and pureness of the word of God, turned their eyes another way, and did not aim at the word of God alone. Those in ancient times ³ did not contemn the word of God. But meanwhile, they attributed more to traditions than was convenient. And by that means, they gave occasion for errors, and also confirmed those abuses which were already brought in.

Certain years past and gone, Gratian and Lombard,⁴ with other ecclesiastical writers, set about to systematize ⁵ the opinions, and gather together a perfect and certain sum of divinity. But thereby they not only carried the schools away from the scriptures, but also intruded strange doctrines into the church. After these, followed Alexander, Albertus, and Thomas,⁶ who not only depended on those Sentences and commended them to others, but also endeavoured to mingle philosophy with divinity, and to couch ¹ them together into one body. And from this it came to pass that we had so many ways and sects, so many puddles crawling full of frogs, so many schools, so many abbeys, and so many sophisters. And if today we likewise continue unhappily to couple philosophy with the holy scriptures, and superstitiously call them into disputation, and subject them to examination by human rules, or to handling by the arts; then we will also corrupt them in the schools, perverting the integrity ² of the apostolic doctrine, to the great detriment of the church. Meanwhile, it is certain that good arts and learning do much for perspicuity and plainness, but only if moderately and religiously applied with judgment, so that the scriptures may have the upper hand, and all other arts obey them.

Therefore, let pure godliness be taught in ecclesiastical schools, yes, let godliness be the end of all our studies. At first, let the studious be diligently taught the catechism, and let them never rest until such time as they have learned it perfectly, and made it familiar to themselves. Then let this newborn godliness be daily increased with lectures and holy sermons. Let the writings of the holy evangelists and apostles be always read to them, so that they may become perfect in them in due season. Let them also commodiously learn the tongues and good arts, and let them be exercised in writing and reasoning. But above all, let dissoluteness and wantonness be banished from the godly-instituted and Christian schools. Let discipline, yes, even if it is somewhat sharp, flourish.

For if youth are corrupted in the schools and grow up in that corruption, what, I ask you, should we look for from their hands when they are set in authority over the church? Let us not believe that they will be the salt of the church, who as they are most dissolute and blockish, so they cannot abide sharpness in others. Do we think they will become lights of the church, who themselves hate the light, and are delighted in darkness and in the works of darkness? Therefore, what the sons of Eli were in the church of Israel, the corrupt sons of the prophets in the church of Christ will be, and are. Therefore, they will likewise perish with the people who are committed to them. And therefore, now-a-days there is great offence committed through too much leniency in the schools; a mischief which will never be washed away. For a man will come into many schools, where he thinks he sees so many soldiers and ruffians (not scholars and students), whom they commonly call "clerics." Neither their fare, their apparel, their manners, their words, nor their deeds, declare them to be of any good disposition, honest, or studious. I know that much is to be ascribed to our unhappy and most dissolute age, in which the stubborn and rebellious will not listen to the counsel of the eiders; and again, I know that there are great offences committed through the negligence and indulgent ³ gentleness of those who are in authority. But since the welfare of the church consists in well-ordered schools, we should all use great diligence, that in this behalf no offence may be committed through our carelessness and negligence. I said have this much concerning ecclesiastical schools, in as few words as I might conveniently use. For I have treated this more at large in my book about the institution of bishops. ⁴

Furthermore, to the end that schools, and the whole ministry, may be maintained, together with all holy buildings and ecclesiastical charges, there needs to be sufficient wealth and a corresponding ability. Therefore, this place admonishes us to say something concerning ecclesiastical goods.⁵

God, in that commonwealth which he would have excel all others by being best furnished with all necessary things, appointed standing fees to be paid to the holy ministry of the common charge — namely, the tithes, first-fruits, and various other kinds of offerings.¹ These things are expressed in many words in the law by Moses, the man of God. He did not fear that in handling that matter, he would be accused of greedy desire or covetousness. For those things which God commanded him to declare plainly to the people, he faithfully uttered to them. Indeed, the law of nature commands us to reward the one who takes pains, and to maintain common costs by common contribution. And those revenues or tributes that were publicly gathered, were not bestowed except to public uses; for they were partly given to the ministers for their ministry and service, partly disbursed on public buildings and holy charges, and partly employed to relieve the poor. And although the Levitical law, along with the whole priesthood, is abrogated by the new Testament, it is notwithstanding certain that the same universal law which commands that public charges be levied by public contributions, is not abolished.

For we read that our Lord Jesus Christ, although he did not live by the tithes and revenues of the priests, yet he lived by the contributions of the godly (for he executed a public function). ^{Luk 8.1-3} And sending his disciples abroad to preach, he expressly says to them: "I would not have you be concerned for food and apparel; for the labourer is worthy of his hire." ^{Luk 10.7} Therefore, the primitive church which the apostles have gathered to Christ, bestowed their houses, lands, and money, for the preservation of the ministry and other things necessary for the church. ^{Act 4.34-35} The priests and Levites at that time possessed the holy revenues, not giving one iota to the apostolic church, which they rather wished might starve; but the godly and faithful people knew very well that earthly substance and riches were very necessary for the preservation of the church. For God has appointed men, and not angels, to be ministers of the church; and has recommended poor men to the church to stand in his stead. But, as men are prone to do, they lack and are destitute of many things. Therefore, through the moving of the Holy Ghost, good men contribute together and bestow money, houses, lands, and other goods, by which both the poor, and also the holy ministry, may be maintained.

And from this it is also evident that the church of the people of the new Testament, ever since the time of Christ and the apostles, had goods and possessions publicly gathered and received; and they also laid out and bestowed them again for public and common commodity.

Gregory, the first of that name, bishop of Rome,² says that it was the custom in his time, and also before his time, that there should be FOUR PORTIONS or parts of the church of God; one for the BISHOP and his family, another for the CLERGY, the third for the POOR, and the fourth for repairing the CHURCHES.³

THE FIRST PART. There are a great many who say that a BISHOP should not receive wages from the church. Let us therefore examine what Christ and his apostles teach us touching that matter. Christ our Lord, who never committed any unjust thing, received maintenance from those women whom he taught, who "ministered to him from their substance." ^{Luk 8.1-3} Also, sending his disciples abroad, and not wanting them to be concerned for food and drink and raiment, says further: "The labourer is worthy of his hire." The Lord judges it to be worthy, fit, and right, to administer necessaries to preachers. Therefore, they do no unworthy deed, who receive wages, to thereby provide necessaries for themselves and their family. Indeed, he compares preachers not to idle

bellies, not to those who freely eat other men's bread, nor to beggars, but to labourers. For the Lord sets down in the law, how it is a great offence to deny labourers their hire; even so, their offence is not small, who allow those who are faithful feeders of the flock, to perish and decay through need. For in another place, the Lord speaks to his disciples, saying, "You have freely received it, and therefore freely give it." ^{Mat 10.8} But he speaks of the gift of working miracles, and of the benefit of health to be bestowed on the sick, diseased, and oppressed; for thus it is written: "Heal the sick, cleanse the leprous, raise the dead, cast out devils." ^{Mat 10.8}

And to these words he added this: "You have received it freely, and therefore bestow it freely." Therefore, though the apostles received a reward from those to whom they preached, yet never has any man read that they took anything for the gift of healing, which they received in the Lord's name. Elisha would not take anything at all, even though it was freely offered to him by Naaman the Syrian captain, for Naaman was healed of the leprosy by his counsel; yet Elisha did not refuse the gift of the man who came to him from Baal-Shalisha. ^{2Kng 4.42} From the same gospel of Christ our Lord, ministers have to learn to what use they should put the wages they have from the church. For when the Lord commanded Judas to depart, who carried the purse, the remainder of the disciples thought that he had been commanded to go and buy those necessaries which would serve for the holy day, or else to bestow something on the poor. Therefore, it is plain that the Lord used the stipend he received, to provide necessaries for himself and his disciples, and also to give alms from it.

Mark well, then, that the ministers of the church may provide things necessary for their living, function, and maintenance of their household, out of the wages they receive from the church. Again, they may also from the same wages give alms to the poor, as though it was of their own goods, truly gotten. For the Lord says plainly in the law, that the sacrifice of the Levites, made from tithes and other oblations or holy revenues, would be as acceptable to him, as their sacrifice who offer anything out of their own chest, store, or possessions. Truly, if a labourer offers to God anything from his hire or wages, that is to say, if he gives to the poor, does it not seem a very acceptable sacrifice to God? The alms that the minister of the church bestows, proceeding from the wages of the holy ministry, are very acceptable then. Take the case of a labourer who is building a church, and receives his wages from the church-goods. Should a man therefore say that the labourer took alms, and that one alms should not be given out of another? He received wages for his work, for he laboured; and therefore, he gives alms from his wages, and from his own lawful and proper goods. Why then should the minister of the church be thought to live by alms, and should not give alms from alms, notwithstanding that he labours for his wages, and should therefore receive the reward of his work, just as a labourer does, to whom the Lord himself compares the minister?¹

If any man is so far past honesty to think so, then he may not hear what I say, but let him hear what Paul the apostle says: "If we sow spiritual things to you, is it a great matter if we mow your carnal things?" ^{1Cor 9.11} And again: "Those elders who govern well are worthy of double honour, and chiefly those who travail in preaching and teaching. For the scripture says, You shall not muzzle the mouth of the ox treading out the corn; and, The labourer is worthy of his hire." ^{1Tim 5.17-18} Behold, therefore, the apostle does not think that that inestimable goodness of the ministry can by any means be recompensed with a vile thing, I mean, with earthly wages. Again, "Those who labour," he says: those who labour, I say, not those who loiter in teaching. These he compares to an ox, which is a toiling beast, and thrashes out corn;¹ and also to a labouring man. What I so greatly warn you about, is because in our wicked and unthankful world, certain men (rather most unthankful monsters) are to be found, who are persuaded that ministers do nothing at all, even those who most faithfully do their duty. For they cry out, saying, They eat their bread as beggars do, and it costs them nothing.² By this name and infamy they terrify many fine wits, and make them forsake the study of good learning and divinity, so that they utterly abhor the ministry, as if it were something most beggarly and dishonest. For in such a way the devil can devise to enlarge his kingdom, abusing, or rather fitly using to his purpose, our ingratitude and malice. But why do they not allow themselves to be numbered with Christ and the holy apostles, who were fed and maintained by the church's stipend, than to be reckoned among those unthankful and proud people who have scraped and gathered all their goods together, for the most part by usury and other wicked means? Or at least, if they have not gotten their goods by sinister means, they have received them through the liberality and mere goodness of God, for which they never sweat or took pains?

¹ An vero dicet aliquis, ministrum ecclesie, suo fungentem munere fideliter, nihil laborare? Lat. omitted: But would any man say that the minister of the church, when he does his duty faithfully, does not labour at all?

St. Paul proves by strong and many arguments, the right to receive a stipend for the holy ministry. "Do we not have," he says, "the power and authority to eat and drink, or may we not carry about with us a woman sister?" ^{1Cor 9.4-5} He means the lawfulness and authority to receive anything necessary for himself, his wife, and his whole household. And for that he asks a question, to show what he means,³ that thereby he may declare a plain truth and equity among all men. And he adds examples to this, not of every man severally, but of all generally, and specially of the chief apostles of Christ, and of those who were kin to Christ by blood, saying: "Even as the other apostles, and brothers of our Lord, and Cephas?" ^{1Cor 9.5} And who is that Cephas but Peter? The Lord said to this Cephas in the first chapter of St. John: "You will be called Cephas, which if a man interprets it, signifies stone." ^{Joh 1.42} But Peter was also surnamed a rock with the intent that the interpretation of the name might always fall on him. And who, I pray you, are the Lord's brethren, but John and James, and James the brother of Judas, and Judas and Simon, the brethren of James? All these, says St. Paul, lived from the stipend they had, being gathered from the common assembly of the church. To these examples he adds others like them, commonly put in practice. "Who," he says, "goes to war at his own costs and charges? Or who plants a vineyard, and does not eat the fruit of it? Or who feeds a flock, and does not drink the milk from it?" ^{1Cor 9.7} Surely he brings forth these similitudes very finely, and properly applied to them and not to any others.⁴ For the ministers of the church are sometimes called soldiers or vineyard-keepers, sometimes husbandmen and shepherds. And who, I pray you, is so far from reason, that he would deny food and clothing to soldiers, husbandmen, and shepherds, for the pains they take in warfare, husbandry, and about cattle?

True-hearted men, therefore, and those who are of an indifferent judgment, acknowledge that the ministers of the church may live by the ecclesiastical ministry. But lest any object that these human parables and similitudes, taken from common use, prove nothing in an ecclesiastical cause, Paul quickly adds: "Do I say these things according to man? Does not the law also say the same thing? For it is written in the law of Moses, you shall not muzzle the ox that treads out the corn." ^{1Cor 9.8-9} It is as if he had said: I have in a readiness, to confirm our right, not only human similitudes, but also testimonies from the holy scripture. And he alleges a place out of the 25th chapter of Deuteronomy, concerning the nourishing of labouring oxen. Again, lest any man say that place is not to be understood about preachers, but simply about oxen, he adds: "Does God take care for oxen? Or does he not speak it altogether for our sakes? Doubtless he has written it for our sakes, so that the one who ploughs may plough in hope, and the one who threshes in hope may partake of his hope." ^{1Cor 9.9-10} The Lord, he said, in his law would provide for us.

For he would have equality gathered by a certain syllogism or a kind of argument, in this or in a similar way: If the Lord provided for beasts and cattle, and would have them be considered, then how much more true of men! It would truly be a very unjust thing if a husbandman laboured with his ox without hope, that is to say, in vain, and without commodity. Therefore, it would also be a most unjust thing for the minister to exercise ecclesiastical husbandry in the church without hope or a due stipend. Moreover, where it is again objected here, that no corporal reward belongs to the spiritual ministry, but a spiritual reward, the apostle answers: "If we sow spiritual things to you, is it a great matter if we reap your temporal things?" ^{1Cor 9.11} He therefore thinks that the Corinthians give nothing when they give their temporal things, namely if they are compared with eternal good things, which the ministers bring by teaching. For look how far the soul excels the body; by so much more, spiritual things are better than temporal. The apostle also conceals an evident argument in these words, where he admonishes that it is fitting that the one who sows should also reap. Thus, there is also great inequality in this point: that ministers sow the better, but reap the worse.

Because men treat God and the divine ministry lightly, they therefore think that the ministers do nothing. St. Paul again confirms his own right by the example of others, saying: "If others are partakers of this right over you, why rather are we not?" For seeing none had taken more pains among the Corinthians than St. Paul, no man was more worthy of reward. Moreover, he confirms his right by the example, commandment, and ordinance of the Lord, saying: "Do you not know that those who take pains in holy things, eat of the holy things; and those who minister at the altar, are partakers of the altar? Even so, the Lord has ordained that those who preach the gospel should live from the gospel." ^{1Cor 9.13-14} Where has the Lord ordained this? In truth, when he said in the gospel that "the labourer is worthy of his hire." But I judge this especially to be observed, which the apostle says in plain words: that the Lord instituted his ordinance concerning the maintenance of the ministers of the church to imitate the ancient laws of the Jewish people. From this we gather that we do not miss the mark much, if in this and like cases, we do not utterly reject the ancient institutions of the fathers.

But just because St. Paul did not use his authority as he might have done, it says nothing against these things. For one question is about the deed, and another about the right of the thing. Indeed, Paul took nothing from the Corinthians for various reasons; notwithstanding, he took from other churches. Nor did he receive anything from the church of Thessalonica. Yet for all that, this is not prejudicial to the equity of the right; for he says to the Corinthians:

"I have robbed other churches, having received wages from them, with the intent that I might do you service. And when I was with you and lacked, I was not burdensome to any man; for the things that were lacking for me were given to me by the brethren who came from Macedonia."

^{2Cor 11.8-9}

And to the Thessalonians he says:

"We have not behaved ourselves inordinately among you, nor did we take our bread for nothing; but with labour and pain, doing our work both night and day, with the intent that we would not be a burden to any of you. Not that it is unlawful for us to do it; but because we would set ourselves down as a pattern for you to follow after." ^{2Thes 3.7-9}

And again, the same St. Paul says to the Thessalonians:

"I beseech you, that you acknowledge those who labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you that you keep them in singular love, through love for their work's sake. Be at peace with them."¹

Therefore, let so much of the church-goods, as is sufficient, be given to the ministers and teachers, so far as honest necessity requires. And this much we have spoken concerning the portion that is due to pastors.

In times past, THE SECOND PART of ecclesiastical goods was allotted to CLERICS. And clerics are the harvest of pastors, studious of divinity, and wholly disposed to the holy ministry. And because they have dedicated themselves and all they have, wholly to the church and its ministry, it is most fitting that they be nourished and maintained by the costs of the church. But it is convenient they be nourished frugally; they should be an example of lowly and thrifty living to others. For being brought up in luxury does not agree with the ministries of the church. And therefore, Amos found fault that the Nazarites drank wine; for drunkards would not maintain the church, but utterly destroy it. We spoke of this matter in another place.² Moreover, it is fitting that due portions be paid to priests, schoolmasters, scholars, and to all other ecclesiastical persons whatsoever.

THE THIRD PART of ecclesiastical goods are appointed FOR THE POOR. And there are diverse sorts of poor folk, such as widows, pupils, orphans, and infants cast out (whose parents are not known³), also those who are worn with old age and spent with diseases. There are infinite kinds of diseases, of which the most grievous are these: leprosy, fury, and madness, the French pox, or the scab of India or Naples, the palsy, the gout, and a great many more.

Not only are poor men born within the land, but also strangers who are banished from their country and home for righteousness' sake, and for the word of God. There are others who have not yet come to extreme poverty, but are even now ready to fall into it, so that, if they are not helped a little with ready money, they later come to be kept by the church-box. Again, there are some who are consumed by imprisonment, by wars, by great floods of waters, by fire, and diverse other mishaps, such as by hail, frosts, and other storms and distemperatures of the air. Of all those whose health and safeguard the Lord willed us to be mindful of, he says that whatever we bestow upon the poor, we bestow it upon him. Therefore, if we despise and disregard the poor, without any doubt we despise and neglect even our Lord God himself in the poor. We should of duty succour the poor of our own good will by counsel, comfort, medicines, cures,⁴ money, food, drink, clothes, lodgings, succouring, and by any other means that we may have, and in all such matters and cases as they need our help. If the church-goods are not sufficient to perform all this to the full, then let the abundance of all other good faithful people supply their want.

And if there are sufficient goods laid up in store, which were contributed in times past by the liberality of the godly, and which are taken away through the negligence or wickedness of the governors, so that the necessity of the poor cannot thereby be succoured — then for that reason truly, most sharp tempests of infelicities are poured out on both commonwealths and kingdoms. Why? For they are very sharply punished, who do not give to the poor from their own private goods, if they are able. With how much more grievous calamities may we think they will be plagued, who wickedly, sacrilegiously, and forcibly take away for their own private uses, those riches which were given by others for the common use of the poor! He that has this world's substance, and sees his brother in need, and shuts up his affection from him, is cruel. ^{1Joh 3.17} Therefore, he that takes from the poor, that which is already given to them, is even more cruel, and commits sacrilege.

We read that the Sodomites with their fellow-cities were burned, because they did not strengthen the hand of the poor, but rather weakened it. The Moabites and Canaanites are destroyed for disdainng strangers, and for having no care of the poor. But why do we fetch examples so far off? Why do we not call to mind the last sentence of the high Judge, uttered from his heavenly judgment-seat which is established in the clouds, pronounced in this manner:

"Come, you blessed children of my Father, possess the kingdom which was prepared for you from the beginning of the world. I have been hungry, and you have given me food: I have been thirsty, and you have given me drink: I was a stranger, and you harboured me: I was naked, and you clothed me: I was sick, and you visited me: I was in prison, and you came to me." ^{Mat 25.34-36}

The evangelist also adds what agrees very much with our purpose:

"Then the just will answer, and say, Lord, when did we see you hungry, and gave you food? thirsty, and gave you drink? "When did we see you harbourless, and lodged you? or naked, and clothed you? Or when did we see you sick or in prison, and came to you? The King answering will say to them, Truly I say to you, In that you did it for one of the least of these my brethren, you did it for me. Then he will also say to those who are on his left hand. Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels. For I was hungry, and you gave me no food: I was thirsty, and you gave me no drink: I was a stranger, and you did not harbour me. I was naked, and you did not clothe me: I was sick and in prison, and you did not visit me. Then they will answer, and say to him, Lord, when did we see you hungry, or thirsty, or a stranger, or naked, or sick, or in prison, and not minister to you? Then he will answer them, saying, Truly I say to you, In that you did not do it for one of the least of these, neither did you do it for me." ^{Mat 25.37-45}

It then follows: "And they will go into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into everlasting life." ^{Mat 25.46} The Lord also ¹ in another place in the gospel, substituting the poor in his stead, says: "You have the poor with you always, and when you will, you may do them good; but me you shall not always have." ^{Mar 14.7} And therefore we read that the primitive church was careful in providing for the poor, even to working miracles. ²

St. Paul in all places commends the poor to the church of God. He made collections for the poor in almost all churches; and the blessings which he had gathered, ^{2Cor 9.5} he distributed with great judgment, faith, and diligence; as it will appear in almost all his epistles, especially in the 15th chap. to the Romans, in first Corinthians, 16th chapter, in second Corinthians, the eighth and ninth chapters; and to the Galatians: "While we have time," he says, "let us do good towards all men, especially towards the household of faith." ^{Gal 6.10} In the first epistle to Timothy he warns that consideration be given as to who should be helped, and who not to be helped. ^{1Tim 5.3f} In the same epistle he charges Timothy and all the bishops, how to deal with the richer sort in the church, saying:

"Command those who are rich in this world, that they not be high-minded, nor put their trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who gives us all things abundantly to enjoy; that they may do good, that they may be rich in good works, that they may be ready to give, and bestow willingly, laying up for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may take hold of life everlasting." ¹Tim 6.17-19

And to the Hebrews: "Do not forget to do good and to distribute: for with such sacrifice God is pleased." ^{Heb 13.16} Therefore, riches were gathered even in the time of the apostles, to succour the necessity of the poor with. Deacons were appointed by the church as providers and stewards. The Acts of the Apostles mentions who among those first deacons were most famous, and there was also the notable martyr of Christ, Laurence.¹

The writings of the ancient fathers testify that with those ecclesiastical goods, prisoners were redeemed out of captivity; poor maidens of lawful years were married; hospitals, almshouses, spittals, harbours, hostels, and nurseries, were built, namely to entertain poor travellers, for the maintenance of the poor who were born in that country, for the relief of the sick and diseased, for the necessity of old men, and for the honest bringing up of pupils and orphans.² Concerning these matters, certain imperial laws are still extant.

Therefore, in reforming churches, very diligent heed must be taken, that no offence be committed in this through oversight or on purpose; that the poor not be defrauded; and that in taking away one abuse, we do not bring in many. If there are plenty of goods, let them be kept; if there are none, let them be gathered from the rich. Then let the state of the poor be searched, and what every man needs most, or how provision may best be made for everyone. This being known, let what is fitting and necessary for everyone be done speedily, gently, and diligently. Then, if any of the common goods remain, let them be kept against such calamities as may ensue. Let nothing be consumed unprofitably or irreverently. Again, do not let the treasure of the poor unhappily be detained from them by fraud³ and to the increase of their poverty. For there may be a like offence committed on both sides; for on each side the poor are defrauded of their goods. Touching liberality, we have treated that in another place in these decades;⁴ and about providing for the poor, in another of our works.⁵ And Lewis Vives has written very well about relieving the poor.⁶

THE FOURTH AND LAST PART of the goods of the church pertains to HOLY BUILDINGS, such as churches, schools, and houses belonging to churches and schools. Churches, because of the companies gathered together in them, are also called congregations. They are the houses of the Lord our God. Not that God, whom the wide compass of the heavens cannot comprehend, dwells in such houses; but because the congregation and people of God meet together in those houses to worship and perform due honour to God, to hear the word of God, to receive the Lord's sacraments, and to pray for the assistance and presence of God. Churches, therefore, are very necessary for the church and people of God. Touching holy assemblies, I have said something in the disputations about prayer. ¹

At the commandment of God, Moses built a moveable church; and afterward, the most wise king Solomon founded a standing church, not without great cost. Notwithstanding, we must not therefore think that God likes such great charges after he had sent Christ and fulfilled the [Old Testament] figures. For before the law was made, it is not to be found that the patriarchs ever built any great churches;² even after disannulling the law in the church of Christ, a mean and sparing cleanliness pleases God best. For God disapproves those foolish and mad kinds of buildings, not unlike those of Babylon,³ venturing to set the top of the tower above the clouds. God does not like the riotousness ⁴ of churches, for without any riot, He gathers his church together from all the parts of the world; he has also taught this church both sparingness and contempt for all riot. A church is large and big enough, if it is sufficient to receive all who belong to it; for the place is provided for men, and not for God. But above all things, let that place be clean and holy. A church is hallowed or consecrated not (as some superstitiously think) by repeating certain words, or making signs and characters, or with oil, or purging fire; but with the will of God and his commandment, bidding us to assemble and come together, promising his presence among us; and it is also hallowed by the holy use of it.

For the holy church of God is gathered together in the temple; the true and most blessed word of God is also declared in the temple; the holy sacraments of God are received in the temple; and also prayers are poured forth to God in the temple, which are most acceptable to him. Truly, of itself, the place is not at all holy. But because these holy things are done in that place, in being done there, the place itself is called holy. Therefore, it is not without great cause that all profanation and filthiness be far from the holy temple of the Lord. The senator's court or seat of judgment, is accounted so holy a thing that whoever used himself irreverently towards it, in word or deed, was to be accused of treason. And yet in this [earthly] court, the senators are gathered and assembled together only to hear the matters of suitors in transitory things, that will pass away and perish. By how much more then, should reverence be given to temples, into which the children of God come to worship him, to hear the true word of God, and to receive his holy sacraments! And therefore, just as we hate and abandon all superstition in temples, so we do not love the profanation of them; rather, I say, we cannot abide it. Nor do we have leisure at this time, in the consideration of temples, to repeat and search out open and plain superstitions.⁵ We have spoken of this matter in another place.⁶

I find it a matter of controversy among the fathers of olden times, to which part of the world we should to turn when we pray. Socrates, the historiographer, in his fifth book, cap. 22, speaking of the most ancient apostolic church of the whole world at Antioch, says: "At Antioch, which is in Syria, the church is set contrary to others; for the altar does not look towards the east, but towards the west."⁷ It may be that they imitated the fashion of the old people in building and setting their tabernacle, and in the fashion of their temple. For they worshipped God turning towards the west, without doubt, because of the coming of Christ in the latter time and at the end of the world.

Otherwise, men commonly worship with their faces towards the east. But in all these matters, so that there is no superstition, dissension, licentiousness, and offence, a man may do what he wishes.

But there should be no temple built for worshipping the saints. For to God only, to whom all honour and worship is due, we ought to build churches; which we are taught by the examples of ancient fathers, and the determination of the whole scripture. The heathenish idolaters built temples to creatures, sinning against the true and eternal God in committing a grievous offence. St. Augustine, in his book De Civitate Dei, says plainly: "We do not build temples to our martyrs."

¹ And again, in his first book against Maximums, a bishop of the Arians, Augustine says:

"If we were to build a church of timber and stones to some excellent holy angel, would we not be accursed by the truth of Christ and the church of God, because we do that service to a creature, which is due only to God? Therefore, if we would commit sacrilege in making a temple to every creature whatsoever, how may it be that God is not true, to whom we make no temple, but we ourselves are a temple for him?" ²

Therefore, they are to be accounted liars, who affirm that temples were built by certain religious men in the worship of the apostles, while they were alive. We have spoken of this matter in times past, as we have against both the riotousness of the church, and the unprofitable expenses of it, in the first book entitled De Origine Erroris, the 21st chap.

Instruments belonging to the church ought to be holy, clean, and void of all riot, and far from any kind of superstition. The instruments are these: a holy seat or pulpit, in which the minister may teach and preach; convenient seats for the congregation; a font ready to baptize infants in,³ and the Lord's table, with those things that are necessary for it, such as water, bread, wine, books, candles, baskets, and cups.

These were sometimes all of gold; but good and godly bishops have often melted them, and delivered prisoners out of captivity with it, and fed those who were likely to perish from hunger.⁴ I have gathered many examples of this sort in my book about the Institution of Bishops, the 9th chapter. As for candles, which we just mentioned, it is sure that the ancient fathers used them in the churches to drive away the darkness of the night, as it appears in the twentieth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles. But it is a foolish matter and not at all religious, to use lights in worshipping God. Lactantius cries out:

"Shall we judge him to be in his right mind,⁵ who offers the light of a burning wax-candle, or a taper, as a present to the author and giver of light? He requires another kind of light at our hands, and that is not smoky, but clear and bright: namely, the light of the mind." ⁶

But a man may commonly see, these days, a great part of worshipping God is reposed in offering candles, which is clean against the manifest truth.

Among other instruments of the church, are reckoned bells. They are to us these days, as trumpets were to the people of God in olden times. For they serve to call the congregation together, and they are included among tokens and warnings. There is a fanciful superstition about bells. They are christened by bishops; and it is thought that they have power to drive away any great tempest. In olden times, men were stirred to prayer by ringing bells whenever any grievous tempest arose. But now, the very ringing of bells, because of their consecration, seems to have a peculiar kind of virtue in it. Who can help but marvel and be astonished at this extreme blindness? Moreover, they use bells to bewail the dead. All these things are superstitious, and are to be utterly contemned. ¹

Because the true use of church-goods consists in those things which we reckoned up before, it followed that the abuse of them must be in the contraries, whether we offend in one kind or in many. Justice and equity is to be kept in these, as well as in all other things. We should not take from one man and give to another; but we must give to everyone that which is his own. Therefore, we may not take anything from the poor, and give it to the ministers of the church: nor is their portion and necessaries to be taken from them, so that the poor may live off them. The holy scripture gives one portion of the church-goods to the ministers of the church; and the same scripture wills us to give to the poor their portion. Therefore, if bishops or ministers of the church claim all the church goods for themselves, and do not give the poor the portions that are due them, they defile themselves with sacrilege. If the ministers do not claim for themselves all the goods of the church, and yet they unjustly take either more than it becomes them, or than need requires, or otherwise than the decree of God and the apostles allow — or else, if they spend unthrifly that portion which is due them — then they grievously offend. But they sin greatly, indeed, most horribly, if they waste the goods of the poor in hunting, dicing, drinking and rioting, whore-hunting, or else in warfare; and in the meantime, have no regard for the church, nor care what is done there or how.² But if a just and good portion falls to the poor, perhaps there will be a fault in this point: the steward or almoner,³ through favour or hatred, allows those who have the most need to have nothing, and the least worthy to have the most; in this case there is also great offence committed through filthy abuse.

But of all abuses, what seems to be the most shameful, is what now-a-days is most common. We bestow great costs and charges upon stones and stocks — that is to say, upon idols that are void of all understanding — but no regard is had for the poor, who are the perfect images of God. These kind of madness is heathenish and extreme folly. But since others have already largely spoken about the abuse of church-goods, and we too have set down certain matters concerning them elsewhere,⁴ I will for now make an end of speaking about it.

I would now treat the HOLY TIME. ⁵ This treatise is altogether like that about the holy place, which we argued elsewhere. We also discoursed about it in expounding the Ten Commandments.⁶ I add only this at present: that there should be no odious contention in the church concerning this matter, but that in this and other cases like it, discipline with charity is to be constantly observed. For it behoves us to be mindful of the most pernicious contention about keeping Easter. With much danger and great detriment, this has troubled the churches of the east and west for a long time.⁷ And beware, in any case, that there not be a gap left open for Satan to enter in through contention. It would be profitable, in my opinion, both in this case and in like cases, to remember the counsel which St. Augustine gives in the 118th epistle to Januarius ¹—what is enjoined of us, that is not against either faith or good manners, is to be considered indifferent, and it is to be observed according to the society of those with whom we live.

DISCIPLINE and the CORRECTION of ministers also belong to the holy ministry. How necessary this is, may be gathered by these words of our Lord Christ: "You are the salt of the earth. If the salt has lost its saltness, what will be salted with it? ² It is good for nothing else, but to be thrown out of doors, and be trodden underfoot by men." ^{Mat 5:13} I know there are some who boast of having certain privileges, by which they are exempted from all discipline. But they are deceived; for the Lord has made all the ministers of his church subject to discipline. Whoever would therefore be exempted from discipline are not Christ's ministers. Or who, I ask you, would say that he is free from discipline, whom the Lord would have altogether subject and bound to it? Against the commandment of God there is no pope's law, no privilege of king or emperor, of any force; for no man can abrogate the decree of the high God: and the Lord commands us to warn and correct every brother who does amiss.

Therefore, he would have us also sharply admonish the ministers of the churches, who are negligent and go astray. Truly, he himself often and very sharply reproveth the whole order of the priests of the church of Jerusalem. Eli, the Lord's priest, is ill-reported in the holy scripture, for he did not bridle his sons, being priests, with sharper discipline. We read how the prophets of the Lord very bitterly blamed all the colleges of priests, and also the high priests. Examples are to be found in every place throughout the holy history, and in the writings of the prophets. Indeed, St. Paul reproveth the most holy apostle St. Peter at Antioch in Syria, in the sight of the whole congregation, for he did not teach directly according to the prescribed rule of the gospel. ^{Gal 2:11-12} And to be short, Christ himself, in the revelation made to St. John the apostle, very sharply admonishes and reproveth the angels, that is to say, the ministers of the churches. ^{Rev 1:11, 20} Again, St. Paul the apostle says: "Receive no accusation against an elder, except under two or three witnesses. But those who offend, reprove before the whole congregation, that the others may stand in fear." ^{1Tim 5:19-20} There are also found in the scriptures many notable examples of most holy princes, who by their laws have restrained even the chief ministers of the churches, and have thrown from their chairs and degrees those who did not well discharge their duties.³ Yes, necessity itself and the good estate of the people of God, requires that the naughty ministers of churches be deposed. And it would be better that a few evil ministers were troubled, than so many congregations brought into danger of body and soul. For the churches and congregations are utterly destroyed through the negligence and ungodliness of wicked pastors. Therefore, let them be deposed with speed.

But to the end that the ministers of churches might better and the more easily be kept in their function and calling, the ancient fathers in olden times solemnly held convocations of the clergy once or twice in a year, applying them as remedies for the diseases of the ministers. And that I may not bring anything far-fetched here, I will recite to you, dearly beloved, what is read in the Imperial Constitutions of the emperor Justinian, commanding us in this way:

"The ancient fathers solemnly held convocations of the clergy twice a year in every province, that those things which have grown up may be examined there, and amended by competent correction. Not being previously observed, it now seems necessary to bring this to the right way.

² quo salietur, Lat. But Tyndale, 1534, and Cranmer, 1539, render the words as the translator does here.

And since we ourselves, because of this negligence, have found many to be entrapped with sundry errors and sins, we command them all, that in all provinces every year, either in the months of July or September, one synod be held, and that the priests meet together, either at the patriarch's or the bishop's, and that matters of faith be handled there, and also canonical questions, and the administration of ecclesiastical things, or of reproveable life, or other matters which require correction. These things being thus observed, the laity will also reap much profit concerning the true faith and honest life, and amend themselves for the better."

Then he adds these words:

"Moreover, we command the lieutenants of the provinces, if they see this is negligently looked to, that they urge the bishops to assemble synods. But if they perceive that they seek delays and are negligent in this, then let them certify us of it, so that we may proceed with due correction against such lingerers." ¹

This much have I reported out of the Caesarian decree. Therefore, let bishops take heed, that no fault be committed in this through their negligence; and if they forget their duty, let the magistrate beware that he does not wink at their sluggishness, to the destruction of the whole church and all the ministers of Christ.² Many vices continually creep in, for the disposition of the flesh is very corrupt. Therefore, unless there is admonition in the church and correction continually put in use, those things which we think are most firm will fall into decay and perish sooner than we suppose.

Just as the Lord would have the transgressing ministers of the churches be admonished and corrected, so he extends the commodity of that admonition and correction to the whole church. And therefore, the ancient church had a holy senate of elders, who diligently warned those who transgressed in the church, corrected them sharply, yes, and excluded them from ecclesiastical fellowship — namely, if they perceived that there was no hope of amendment to be looked for in them. But in the latter times, the popes and bishops have tyrannically taken that kind of punishment into their own hands, and exercise it sacrilegiously, contrary to the first institution. They have turned a wholesome medicine into a hurtful poison, making it abominable both to the good and bad. St. Paul, teaching that this kind of punishment was permitted by the Lord to restrain the licentiousness of many,³ says:

"I have decreed that, when you are gathered together in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, and my spirit with you, together with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ, the one who has committed this offence be delivered to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." ^{1Cor 5:3-5}

Look, this is the power and revenge of the elders of the church. The means is the destruction of the flesh: the end is the safety of the spirit, or saving a faithful man. For the same apostle has these words for the Thessalonians:

"If there is any man who does not obey our words, signify it to me by an epistle, and see that you have nothing to do with him, that he may be ashamed. Nor would I have you consider him an enemy, but warn him as a brother." ^{2Thes 3:14-15}

The same apostle also plainly shows in another place, who ought to be punished by the ecclesiastical sword. It is not those who are offenders through weakness of the flesh; nor good men being adjudged heretics, only by the bishops or their company; nor poor men for not paying their duty to their ordinary ¹ or their official. Rather, they are wicked doers, and pernicious men: "If any man that is called a brother, is a whore-hunter, or a covetous person, or an idolater, or a slanderer, or a drunkard, or a thief, see that you do not eat with him." ^{1Cor 5.11} St. Augustine allows for moderation in giving punishment; especially when, through punishment, what is to be feared is not the edifying, but the destruction of the church.² This fear might perhaps seem either vain, or too excessive, if the same apostle who commanded the incestuous adulterer to be delivered to Satan, had not said in the second epistle to the Corinthians: "I fear that when I come, I will not find you such as I wish; and I will mourn for many who offended before and have not repented of their uncleanness, nor of their whoring and wantonness which they used," etc. ^{2Cor 12.20-21} Truly, he severely threatens them, as though he will not spare them. But because he perceived that it tended toward the utter destruction and overthrow of the church, rather than to gathering it together and increasing it, if he delivered them to Satan (as he did with the adulterer), he used moderation according to God's commandment: "Allow both of them to grow, lest when you pluck up the tare, you also pull up the wheat by the roots." ^{Mat 13.29} It is necessary, therefore, that holy judgment be used, lest offence be committed either by too much favour, or too much extremity.

² Lat. omitted: But if in any quarter the wholesome ordinance of holding synods has grown out of use, let it be brought back, and with due solemnity renewed, for the preservation of the ministry and welfare of the churches.

³ Rather, that this revengement was not granted by God to the licentiousness of a few.

Moreover, let speedy reconciliation be enforced among those who are repentant. St. Paul says: "It is sufficient for such a man, that he be blamed or chided thus." ^{2Cor 2.6} St. Peter, who shamefully denied the Lord, hears from women on the day of Christ's resurrection, the gospel that was preached by angels. ³

Moreover, we have shown that there is a magistrate in the church, with authority to execute the sword upon evil-doers; a magistrate who judges and exercises the sword, yet is reckoned among the true members of the church; and that magistrate is very necessary for the church in respect to his office, as set down in our 7th and 8th sermons of the second Decade.

The special institutions and ordinances which God has appointed in the church, are these that follow. And truly, among all the ordinances of the church, WEDLOCK is not to be accounted least. If it is well used, it produces a great company of good fruits in the church. But if it is not well ordered, it breeds a number of offences and deadly mischiefs in the church. For they judge uprightly who say that a church is most holy and best assembled, which is gathered together out of many well-ordered houses. Then again, a wicked church is assembled out of many wicked houses. Therefore, in his holy word God diligently appoints couples, and garnishes wedlock very beautifully. But it is not our purpose at present to show the praise of matrimony. For it suffices to know that God himself is the author of wedlock, and that he first instituted it in Paradise. And he did it to this end: that man might live well and pleasantly with a fellow.

To conclude, he first coupled man and woman together, and being coupled, he blessed them. And so, the most holy friends of God — the patriarchs, princes, prophets, kings, bishops, wise men, and priests — lived in this kind of life. Of this perhaps, St. Paul said: "Wedlock is honourable among all men, and the bed undefiled." ^{Heb 13.4} In another place he calls the doctrine that forbids wedlock, "The doctrine of devils." ^{1Tim 4.1} For it is evidently known that Christ's disciples and the apostles were married men; nor did they put away their wives when they took the office of preaching, though some most shamefully pretend that they did.

¹ Ordinary: an officer of a church who has power to execute and enforce the ordinances of the church.

² Aug. de Sermone Domini in Monte, Lib. i. Opp. Tom. iv. fol. 251. col. 1. Par. 1531.

³ Mat 28.5-7 with Joh 20.2.

It is notable, that the apostle requires at the hands of a bishop or an elder, to be the husband of one wife; ^{Tit 1.6} and in another place he plainly says that it is lawful to carry about a Christian wife, being in the calling of the apostleship; and he claims it both for himself and Barnabas. ^{1Cor 9.5-6} What will I say moreover, that it was pronounced in the council of Nicaea, namely, that to lie with a man's own wife is chastity? ¹ For St. Paul had said before: "Let every man have his own wife, to avoid fornication." ^{1Cor 7.2} And, "The bed of wedlock is undefiled." ^{Heb 13.4} Again: "If a virgin marries, she does not offend." ^{1Cor 7.28} Therefore, we judge that papistic doctrine which forbids marriage to ministers, is what the blessed apostle St. Paul termed the doctrine of devils. The very papists themselves, who have not yet put all shamefacedness away, will confess it with us. For if we judge the tree by the fruits, I ask you, what fruits of a single life may we recite? What filthiness, what bawdry, what adulteries, what fornications, what ravishings, what incests and heinous copulations may we recite? Who today lives more unchastely or dishonestly than the rabble of priests and monks do? For as they have no care or regard to obey God's word and his laws, and to glorify God with their holy life in chaste wedlock; even so, through the desire of their hearts, God has given them up to all uncleanness, so that their bodies may be stained with reproach.

But first of all, the holy scripture diligently teaches all men to have a special care, that they contract matrimony devoutly, holily, soberly, wisely, lawfully, and in the fear of God; and that no evil disposition of covetousness, desire for promotion, or fleshly lust, may lead and provoke them; and that wedlock not be entered into other than either the laws of man or of God ² will permit.

And here we must consider of the degrees of consanguinity and affinity, of public honesty, of the reverence of blood, of offence towards others, and that no man takes as his wife a heathen woman, or one of a contrary religion; for we are expressly forbidden to yoke ourselves with unbelievers. ^{2Cor 6.14}

Again, we are taught to enter into the knot of wedlock lawfully, reverently, and holily, with prayer and the receipt of godly blessings in the temple of the Lord, both in the sight and with the prayer of the whole congregation; and to beware, that in any case we not be stained in this point with all profanation of the filthy world. Nor are we ignorant in this case, that men of this world are commonly prone to celebrate their weddings in a way more fitting for the devil than God,³ with rioting, pride, surfeiting, drunkenness, and all kinds of wantonness. Moreover, we are taught to dwell with our wives according to knowledge, moderation, patience, faith, and love; and also to bring up our children virtuously and honestly, and also to place and bestow them in holy wedlock, when time requires it.

But if for adultery, or some other matter more heinous than that, necessity forces us to break wedlock, the church will do nothing unadvisedly in this case. For she has her judges, who will judge ⁴ in matters and causes of matrimony according to right and equity, or rather according to God's laws and the rule of honesty. The holy apostle would not have the faithful contend and stand at law in the court of the unfaithful. Therefore, he exhorted them to take umpires to make friendly agreements between those who were in contention. But in causes and matters of matrimony, there are far greater matters that forbid the parties that sue, or are sued, to come before unbelieving judges. Therefore, the church of God has very well appointed a court to try matters of matrimony. But because we spoke about wedlock in the tenth sermon of the second Decade, and have also presented at one time a book specially concerning it,¹ I have knit up this matter in these few words touching Christian wedlock.

The church of God has WIDOWS in it, but such as the apostle of Christ describes this way, saying: "She that is a widow, and a lone woman indeed, trusts in God, and continues in prayer and supplication night and day. But she that lives in pleasures and delights, is dead even though she is alive." ^{1Tim 5:5-6} Paul would have the younger sort marry, have children, and govern the house, and not give any occasion at all for the enemy to speak evil of them. The place is evident in the first epistle of St. Paul to Timothy, the fifth chapter.

The church also has VIRGINS. These are concerned only for those things that belong to the Lord, and are true virgins, without any deceit or hypocrisy. Paul says: "A virgin cares for what belongs to God, that she may be holy both in body and spirit." ^{1Cor 7:34} There are many who rule and govern their bodies, but not their minds. God requires both, and especially the mind. It is an easy matter to deceive men, but we cannot by any means deceive God. In the first epistle to the Corinthians, seventh chapter, St. Paul sets forth the praise of virginity; and by comparing a virgin to a married wife, he shows how great the goodness of virginity is. Notwithstanding, it is lawful for virgins to marry if they want to, as the apostle plainly shows in the same place.

The testimony of man is also agreeable to this testimony of God. For Cyprian, with his fellow-bishops and elders, answering a question demanded by Pomponius, says:

"Do you desire that we write you what we think of those virgins who, once they determine to continue their state continently and steadfastly, are found to have lain and continued in the same bed with men? Concerning this, because you desire to know our judgment, you should understand that we do not depart from the traditions and ordinances of the gospel and the apostles, or we would so much less strongly and stoutly provide for our brethren and sisters; and ecclesiastical discipline should by all means be kept for their profit and safety."

And it follows:

"But if through faith they have vowed to Christ, and continue chastely and shamefacedly without ceasing, let them steadfastly and stoutly look for the reward of virginity. But if they will not or cannot continue, then it is better that they marry, than fall into the fire of their delights and pleasures." ² And so forth.

St. Augustine, disputing about the words of the apostle, "Having greater damnation, because they broke their first promise and faith," ³ does not ascribe this damnation to the marriage that follows, but to the inconstancy going before. "They are damned," he says, "not because they entered into the bond and promise of wedlock, but because they broke the first promise made by continence and chastity." And a little after that, he adds these words: "Therefore, those who say that such marriages are no marriages indeed, but rather adulteries, it seems to me that they speak foolishly and without consideration." ⁴ And that much he says about it.

I understand that the apostle uses this word "condemnation," or "judgment,"¹ to mean "reprehension," which we Switzers term, "Ein auzrichten oder nachred."² For many speak evil of them for they have broken their first faith, that is to say, they have broken the promise of continence. Therefore, the apostle thinks it much better for young women to match themselves in marriage, than to set themselves such an order of life from which, even though necessity forces them into it, they cannot depart without the reprehension of men. But in that place he does not speak of virgins, but of widows. St. Cyprian speaks simply of virgins.

Monks and nuns were altogether unknown in the primitive church of Christ and the apostles. The latter ages had monks, but not the sort we have now-a-days, who are their own rule and law, whose monasteries abound in all filthiness and uncleanness. Though we should hold our peace, to be true, truth itself and experience will sufficiently declare this. And those who seem to be governed by more severe discipline, are defiled with hypocrisy. I will say nothing else.

Touching the first MONKS, they did not dwell in cities, nor meddle with worldly affairs. We have declared in another place³ how a writer of the middle ages, being made an abbot, requested that he might leave from being a cleric; for no man could well be both a monk and a cleric, since the one is an impediment to the other. They did not live off the common revenues of the church then, but from the work of their own hands, as lay people do. St. Jerome, disputing about the origin of monks, in the life of Paulus, has written thus:

"Among many it has often been asked, Who of the monks first began chiefly to dwell in the wilderness? Some, fetching it from somewhat far astray, begin to reckon from Elijah the holy prophet, and St. John. Of these, Elijah seems to us to have been more than a monk, and St. John began to prophesy before he was born. But others (whose opinion most people agree with) affirm that St. Antony was first to begin that order; this in part is true.⁴ For he was not only the first, but also the motivator of all others. Amathas and Macarius, St. Antony's scholars, the first of whom buried his master's body, now affirm that Paulus Thebius was the first of that way. We also confirm this, not only in name, but also in opinion."

And shortly he adds that Paulus, forsaking the city, and being forced to do that for fear of torments under the persecutors Decius and Valerianus, departed into the wilderness, where he found a cave, and hid in it until he was found by St. Antony.⁵

The emperors Decius and Valerianus governed the empire about the year of the Lord 260; but it is said that St. Antony died when he was a hundred and five years old, in the year of our Lord 360. St. Augustine, who in his 80th epistle to Hesychius witnesses of his own time, that he lived in the year of our Lord 420⁶ (but Eutropius and Bede report that he died in the year of our Lord 430⁷). In the thirty-first chapter of the manners of the catholic church, reciting the manners and institutions of the monks in his time, Augustine reports things that are very far from the orders and institutions of our monks now-a-days. ¹ In the time of Justinian the emperor, who made certain laws concerning monks and monasteries, there lived one Benet, whom many of the monks now-a-days call father, whose life I will recite to you out of Tritthenheimius, ² who died about fifty years ago, with the intent that you may understand what power and dignity they obtained in the process of time, who at the beginning were contemned and of no authority.

"Benet, abbot of Cassina, first founder, beginner, and governor of the monks in the west, wrote in eloquent style and with grave judgment the rule for monks, in one book which begins, 'Give ear, my son, to my precepts,' etc. and it contains seventy-three chapters. He died in the year of our Lord 542. But Marianus Scotus supposes that he died in the year of our Lord 601, in the last year of the emperor Maurice." ³

He also writes about twenty orders of monks who were under Benet's rule. ⁴ Of St. Benet's order, there have been eighteen popes in the see of Rome, over two hundred cardinals, one thousand six hundred archbishops in various churches, almost four thousand bishops, ⁵ fifteen thousand seven hundred famous abbots who excelled in life, doctrine, and writings, fifteen thousand six hundred who are canonized. ⁶ And so that I may not recite many other orders of monks, it is known that the mendicant monks and friars, ⁷ being the faithful, diligent, and valiant Roman champions of the pope and the spiritual monarchy, were confirmed by Honorius about the year of our Lord 1222. ⁸

Hereby I declare only this: that all men should understand that monkery was devised by man's invention. It was not delivered to the church of Christ by the apostles; at first it seemed to be tolerable, but afterward it became altogether intolerable. Experience teaches how unprofitable it is to the commonwealth. And whoever does not know that it is quite repugnant to true religion, knows nothing.

They pretend that it is meritorious before God, and it is the state of perfection. But who does not see how repugnant it is to Christ's merit, and to the sincere doctrine of the gospel? What godliness or necessity is it that moves us, after we have wholly taken ourselves to one God in baptism, to also take ourselves and make our vows to saints, and to bind ourselves by religion of an oath to observe their rules? True religion forbids us to vow ourselves to saints, or by any means to depend on them in the way of religion. True religion forbids us to choose us any other fathers or masters. True religion forbids us to devise new manners of worshipping or new religions, or to receive those that are devised by others. The example of Jeroboam and his fellows makes us afraid. True religion forbids us to swear by the names of other gods.

Religion refers ⁹ us to one God by faith and obedience. Superstition breaks this band, and admits creatures. St. Paul says to the Corinthians: "Every one of you says, I am Paul's, I am Apollo's, I am Cephas', and I am Christ's. Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were you baptized in the name of Paul?" ¹Cor 1.12-13 Behold, Christ is our Redeemer and our Master. The faith of Christ has made us one body. By baptism we are baptized into one body, that we might be called Christians, not Petrines or Paulines. St. Paul would not allow Christians to take their name from the apostles. How much less would he abide that some today should be called Benedictines, some Franciscans, some Dominicans? ¹ We are the Lord's inheritance and possession; it is not lawful for us to bind ourselves to the service of men. Whoever so bind themselves, tear asunder the unity of Christ's body; they profane the cross and the baptism of Christ. The apostle plainly says: "Is Christ divided? was Paul crucified for you? or were you baptized in the name of Paul?" And therefore, even though they are commonly called "spiritual persons," yet are they not spiritual at all. For the apostle says: "When one of you says, I am Paul's, and I am Apollo's, are you not carnal?" To what end is it to invent new rules, after receiving the gospel of Christ Jesus and the doctrine of the apostles, which contain and deliver to us all godliness?

For truly, once these monks had found out certain peculiar laws and means of living, they separated themselves from the common sort of Christians in all outward manner of living, in their behaviour, and in all their apparel, with the intent that by that means they might make evident to all men, that they would live apart from that common, lay, and imperfect church as it were, to live more holily, perfectly, and spiritually. But how well that has framed or now frames them, the whole world speaks of today.

The vows which they vow are most foolish. They vow chastity, which they do not have. Chastity is the gift of God, and it is not incident to all men. And St. Paul says: "Whoever cannot live continently, let him marry: for it is better to marry than to burn." He said "to burn" generally, whether it was in a vow, or out of a vow. Nor is it lawful for a human vow, which was foolishly taken in hand and vowed, to prejudice the law of God. Experience teaches what manner of poverty is in the abbeys. They put off poverty, when they put off their common garments; and with their cowl, they put on great riches — for monks are made princes, which in olden times would have seemed a strange and monstrous thing. The common sort of them live idly, and eat their bread freely and for nothing, against the apostle's rule in the 2nd epistle to the Thessalonians, chap. 3, where it is also accursed. They forsake their parents and kinsfolk, whom they are bound to serve and obey by the law of God; and they take themselves to strange men, by whom they are forced to infinite superstitions. And those who are thus freely set at liberty by their parents, are either set at liberty through superstition, or with the intent that they may have all the days of their life in which to lie and riot in idleness. So it is evident that they put on the cowl for their belly's sake, not for any religion. What obedience is it, which is quite contrary to the obedience revealed by the word of God? When the magistrate commanded ² them to sustain and bear public burdens with the rest of the faithful, they are instead evermore free and exempted.

In olden times, ministers of strange religions, under the kings of Judah, had princely privileges and customs confirmed by prescription of long standing; but because their ministry was not allowed by the word of God, but rather was repugnant to the word of God, they were not ungodly, nor unjustly, nor sacrilegiously, broken and dissolved by holy kings.

Who can well abide to hear their excuse, who being admonished to do penance for the sins which they have committed, they make this exception: that they are bound to their monkish order by virtue of their oath, so that they cannot depart from it with a safe conscience? For it is evident, that the oath which they pretend, is altogether a rash oath; which is not to be performed, as I have declared in the third sermon of the second Decade.¹ What, I beg you, can a bond bind one to, which is made by man without God, indeed, which is rather against the word of God, especially being made unwisely or unadvisedly? ² If the cross of Christ is of so great a virtue, that it has released us from the curse to which we were all subject, then how much more will it deliver us from outward bonds, with which we were entrapped, not by God, but otherwise through the folly or wickedness of men, or the craft of the devil! The apostle St. Paul cries out: "You were bought for a price; do not become the servants of men." But if haply, through the malice of men or our own folly, we become servants, the godly must endeavour that through true faith and obedience, they may be restored to the liberty of the children of God. Truly, the gospel is preached to us with the intent that we should be delivered from all unjust captivity, and serve God in spirit and truth.

Moreover, where some object that it would be good and convenient for all monasteries throughout the whole world to be reformed and brought back to the first simplicity — we answer that in our unhappy age, it would be in vain, indeed, plain folly, to hope for it. They cannot be reduced to their ancient simplicity, nor will the princes and monks allow such a reformation to be made: for they know that then they must part not only with many of their profits, honours, and pleasures, but with all of them together. ³

Yet, they would rather that the whole world were held together by the ears, than they would surrender to God his kingdom, which they have enjoyed up to now. But even if this thing were easy enough to accomplish, who will persuade us that if abbeys were reformed according to the ancient institution, that in our own age they would be as well or better governed than they were in olden times? We see what a beginning they had, how they have gone forward, and how they have increased. We see what hypocrisy, ambition and covetousness, pleasure and idleness could do, and to what point all things have come. Do we think that men's desires today will be more moderate? Do we think that discipline will now be less corrupted by us and our posterity, than it was by our forefathers? Indeed, we are constrained not to hope for the better, but to fear the worse, who every day experience that which is worse than others.

For we live in the dregs of the world and in the very end of all ages, in which the dragon of the bottomless pit, through the malice and ungodliness of men, has gotten for himself great power and force to disturb and corrupt all things that are in the whole world. However, in such great perils this comforts us not a little, which is written in the word of truth, that for the elect's sake those days will be shortened; Mat 24.22 and that he will be loosed for a short time, Rev 20.3 and then shortly be cast into the lake that burns with fire and brimstone. Rev 20.10 Moreover, if we make a just reformation, we must go to the fountains themselves. But in the primitive church we read of nothing set down in the doctrine of Christ and his apostles concerning monkery; ⁴ and thereby we understand that it is not necessary for the church; indeed, we have learned by experience that it is noisome and hurtful to the church. Therefore, true reformation persuades us to altogether abrogate monkery. In the meantime, let us not reject or neglect those who repent, whom the wickedness of the times has made unprofitable both for themselves and others; but gently receive them into the care and alms of the church.

² Rather, either unadvisedly, or knowingly made: vel imprudenter vel scienter, Lat.

³ Rather, that together with their profits, etc., many, no, all things depart.

⁴ Rather, in the primitive church, in the doctrine, etc. we read of nothing set down concerning, etc.

This much up to here concerning monkery, we have said by occasion, and by the way. We declared that it had no place in the primitive church of Christ and his apostles. Let us therefore return to other necessary institutions of the church.

Likewise, the faithful church of Christ uses discipline about the SICK and DYING —those who are departing out of this life. Neighbours and brethren come about them, and every one for his part shows the duties of love and charity. They relieve the needy with their goods, and if the sick are not needy, then they show other duties of good-will. The minister of the church also comes who, in comforting the sick person, prepares him to die, by first making his confession of sins to God. The minister pronounces from the word of God that these are forgiven, if he steadfastly believes. He also requires of him that he forgive, and be in love and charity with all men, and that he keep no old grudge or malice in his heart. After this, some public prayer is made to God by the sick person, and by those who are about the party that is at the point of death. He is also admonished about sundry things; he is confirmed in the faith; he is called to patience; he is instructed according as his goods and everything else requires; and he is taught that, at his departing out of this world, he commend his soul into the hands of God the Father, according to the doctrine and example of our Redeemer, who at the very point of death cried aloud, saying, "Father, into your hands I commend my spirit."

We have learned this discipline from the apostles of our Lord Christ. For the apostle St. James says:

"If any are sick among you, let him send for the elders of the church; and let him pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer which is made in faith will deliver the sick; and the Lord will raise him up again. And if he is in sin, they will be forgiven him. Confess your sins to one another, and pray for one another, that you may be safe; for the hearty prayer of the just is of great force," etc. ^{Jas 5.14-16}

This is the apostolic discipline. But if you say to me, Where is the oil? I answer that in St. James the apostle's time, and in certain ages after, there yet remained in the church the miraculous gift of healing the sick.

We read of this in St. Mark's gospel: "And the disciples, going out, preached the gospel, that they might repent; and they cast out many devils, and they anointed many with oil who were sick, and healed them." ^{Mar 6.12-13} And again in the same place says: "Moreover, these signs shall follow those who believe. In my name they shall cast out devils," etc. ^{Mar 16.17} And shortly he says: "They shall lay their hands upon the sick, and they shall be healed." ^{Mar 16.18} And because this benefit still remained in the church, St. James bids us to use oil,¹ and to use it in the name of the Lord, as the Lord commanded. But this gift has now ceased in the church, and we find by experience that oil does no good for the sick. Thus, according to the times, and as our duty binds us, we do the best we can to assuage and cure the diseases of the sick by medicines that are most convenient for the sickness, being applied in the name of Christ.

I know how, by this testimony of the apostle, the papists go around setting out and commending their extreme unction, or last anointing; but they labour in vain. Let it pass that St. James says nothing about the hallowed oil; and that they do not permit this medicine except in extremity, where St. James commands us to anoint everyone who is sick. I ask you, how can they defend from St. James' words, what the priest demands of the sick person: "Do you believe, that the Lord will hear our prayers for the merits' sake and prayers of the saints?" The sick man answering, "I do believe;" he then says, "Let us therefore pray to God and his saints." Or where, I beseech you, has St. James, or any other apostle of Christ, taught what they say in their anointing? "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, I anoint you with holy oil, that by this anointing you may receive full remission of your sins."

What scripture, I ask you, teaches us that full remission of sins is obtained by that anointing? These things are manifestly done against the principal article of our religion, which teaches that we are purged from all our sins by the blood of Christ alone, and that is most fully. To him alone is the glory due, not to the oil, nor to any creature in the whole world.

Moreover, the church of Christ does not reject the bodies of the dead, as if it were a dead dog. For it acknowledges that their bodies have been the temples of the Holy Ghost, which has dwelt in them; it acknowledges, that they are buried in hope of the resurrection and of the glory of life everlasting. Therefore, the church in a most reverent manner, takes the bodies, winds them in a sheet, and covers them very decently. And being put into the coffin carefully, it carries them to the place of burial, or the church-yard, with near friends, neighbours, and brethren following after, and accompanying the corpse. While the body is set down and laid in the earth, there are public prayers made by those who brought the corpse. For they give thanks to God, for he has called the deceased party out of this world in the true faith; and they also pray, that it may please the Lord to likewise take them to him speedily, being enlightened with the true faith. Moreover, the name of the dead brother or sister is recited in the public assembly of the church with honour; and all the people are put in mind of their own destiny, and to speedily prepare themselves to die. And in this manner, we read in the scriptures that the ancient fathers buried their dead, yea, the most holy of them. We read nothing about canonizing, worshipping relics, or oblations for the dead for months and years, which are offered to the end that the departed should be delivered from the pains of purgatory. There are certain burials described to us in the old Testament, such as the burial of Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph, Aaron, Miriam, Joshua, Samuel, and David, etc.; and in the new Testament of John the Baptist and Stephen — but they were all sparing, and without any manner of superstition.¹

In Joseph's bones being carried out, they were carried in a mystery, that the Israelites might gather from it that they would be brought into the land of promise. To this also belongs the fact that the patriarchs chose a burial in Hebron. ^{Gen 25.9-10} Otherwise, the place avails nothing to purchase better or worse speed for the body buried in it. We must think that, because the bodies of the saints and holy men are buried there, the place is sanctified in a way, or at least called holy: not that the bodies get any holiness or safety by the ground. Therefore, unless it seems otherwise good to the divine providence of God, the saints would gladly lie with their ancestors in the same place of burial. But if it pleases God otherwise, they acknowledge that they are nonetheless received into the same earth without exception; and that they are not separated from their ancestors by distance. Therefore, there is no superstition in the church of God about burials and graves; but no man can declare in a few words how much there was in the time of popery.

These are the necessary institutions of the church of God, and they are religiously observed by the faithful without superstition, to their edification. As for other matters which are only devised by the invention of man, the godly give them no weight. I know what things may be objected here: that truly, the ancient people of the old Testament had sundry and manifold rites and ceremonies instituted of God by his prophets, because being rude,² they needed such instruction; and since the common sort of Christians are also ruder than might be wished, so many sundry and diverse ceremonies were not devised by the ancient fathers without the moving of the Spirit, which

² Rude: lacking in refinement and grace; uneducated.

Christians must also obey. I answer that this is not true nor sound reasoning, from which the weak in faith may receive a benefit. For surely, then, the apostles of Christ would have said something about it. Moreover, experience teaches that the state and condition of the weak and simple is such that the more ceremonies that are left to them, the more their minds are diversely disposed, and less united to Christ, to whom alone all things are to be ascribed.

For it pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell in Christ, and to heap together in him ¹ all things pertaining to our life and salvation. Indeed, the divine wisdom of God has taken away that whole external discipline and instruction, differentiating between us and them. We would therefore proceed to bring Judaism back, if we did not stop multiplying and heaping together rites and ceremonies, according to the manner of the old church. For in olden times, those ceremonies had their use, although they were not infinite, but comprised within a certain number. At present there is no use or place for them in the church. Nor do we lack most grave authority to prove it. The apostles and elders in a great assembly, met together at Jerusalem at a council. There the apostle Peter plainly tells them that they tempt the Lord in laying the yoke of the law upon the free necks of the Christians. There is also a synodal epistle written, ^{Act 15} in which by one consent they testify that it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to them, to lay no other burden on the church of Christ than what they recite in few words. This was with the intent that thereby it might be evident ² that the doctrine of the gospel is sufficient for the church, without the ceremonies of the law. If He would not then have the rites, which were instituted by God in olden times, joined to the gospel, then how much less should we at present couple the inventions of men with it! To this, moreover, is wickedly ascribed either the preparation for the grace and worshipping of God; or else part of our salvation. We may say no less today than St. Paul said long ago:

"After you have known God, how does it happen that you return again to weak and beggarly elements, which you would begin to serve anew? You observe days and months, times and years. I am afraid lest I have taken pains about you in vain." ^{Gal 4.9}

To all these things, this is also to be added: that this instruction about ceremonies, which they speak of, belongs to worshipping God; but we are forbidden to devise for ourselves any strange worshipping. We are also forbidden to add to or take away anything from the institution or word of God.

Therefore, the church of God neither ordains nor receives such constitutions from any others. We have also spoken of this matter somewhat before, where we treated the abrogating of the law and of Christian liberty.³

I trust that in these fifty sermons I have, as shortly and conveniently as possible, comprehended the whole matter of faith, godliness or true religion, and also the church. That which I often repeat in all my sermons and my books, I repeat again in this place; that the learned may with my good-will and thanks, gather and embrace better things out of the scriptures.⁴ To the Lord our God, the everlasting ⁵ Fountain of all goodness, be praise and glory, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

APPENDIX I. Dedication to the Marquis of Dorset

TO THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS PRINCE AND LORD, HENRY GREY, MARQUIS OF DORSET, BARON FERRERS, OF GROBY, HARRINGTON, BONVILLE AND ASTLY;
ONE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL OF HIS MOST SERENE MAJESTY, THE KING, AND OF THE FAMOUS KINGDOM OF ENGLAND;
HENRY BULLINGER WISHES GRACE AND PEACE FROM GOD THE FATHER THROUGH OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST.

Upon no other topic, I suppose, can I more fitly discourse with you, most illustrious prince, than that of the safety of the English church, and so of the maintenance of the weal of the whole noble kingdom: seeing that, in the providence of Almighty God, you have been made part of the most sacred council of the king's serene majesty and of the famous kingdom of England; ³ and on this account, it is your most especial duty to understand and tend the public safety of the kingdom.

Without any controversy, then, he is thoroughly informed of the main point of this safety, who knows from where the destruction of kingdoms proceeds. And certainly there exists no more deadly plague to kingdoms than that which the corruption of true religion engenders; for nowhere do empires find a more splendid good than in pure religion, or in religion reformed after it has been corrupted. And the famous kingdom of England now in part enjoys this good, while in reforming the church, it both calls back and restores the ancient purity of religion, and casts off and takes out of the midst of it those new abuses, errors, and superstitions which we have seen rooted in it during the lapse of several ages. Therefore, whoever places obstacles in the way of your most happy and pious design, will doubtless be a disturber of so great a felicity, and will inflict an unappreciable injury on the whole kingdom.

But a bull ⁴ has come out lately fixing the assembling on the first of May of the so-called General Council at Trent; and as many as are serious in looking for a reformation of the church by its means, there may possibly be found among yourselves also, as indeed are to be met with in all places, those who think that we ought to wait for that reformation, and that meanwhile all attempts at reformation should be stayed. And so this summoning of a council, and this expectation of a reformation, may disturb your happy estate, and delay or impede the work which has been well begun. It will be your part, therefore, most illustrious prince, and that of all the other most sacred nobles of the kingdom, to look diligently, and to be watchful, that no hurt arises from this quarter, as to Christ's holy church, so [also] to your most famous kingdom. While for my part, I will show by valid reasons and even, as it is said, to the eyes of men, that this hope of a reformation ⁵ is the vainest of all vanities.

¹ This dedication is omitted in the English translation of Bullinger's Decades. It formed the preface to the fifth and last Decade. Portions of it had been translated and published in 1566, in a small work entitled: "The judgement of the Reverend Father Master Henry Bullinger, pastor of the church of Zurich, in certeyne matters of religion, beinge in controversy in many countreys, even where as the gospel is taught." These portions have been adopted in this translation by the Editor; and a star marks the beginning and end of them.

⁵ That is, a reformation of the Roman Catholic Church itself, as opposed to the Protestant churches.

The pope has appointed this council for no other object than to prop up ancient error and superstition, and to overturn the reformations begun in Germany, England, Denmark, and other nations of Christendom — in a word, to suppress pure or sincere evangelical truth. And on this detection of its design, all godly persons in the church of Christ will be satisfied that their duty is to go forward, both in the reforms that have been begun, and in all other duties of godliness; and not wait for that reformation, which all the pious will soon find to be either none at all, or if any, certainly no legitimate reformation. For it is indeed no general and free council which these men summon; but the same which was once commenced at Trent,¹ and is now to be continued there, and to be resumed at that point at which it stood before the death of Pope Paul, the third of that name;² all of whose statutes or decrees, put forth in matters of the council, are also confirmed.³ But it is more than once declared expressly in public documents issued under this Paul, that the council was appointed for the extirpation of heresies.⁴ And the same Paul accused and condemned as heretics, all of us who profess the gospel, and demand a reformation that is agreeable with the word of God, and teaches that Christ Jesus, and not the pope — indeed, Christ Jesus alone — is the Head, Pastor, and Chief-priest of the Catholic church.

Therefore, because the council is appointed for the extirpation of heresies (and those who demand and undertake a reformation agreeable with the word of God are accounted heretics), who cannot see that the council is not summoned to reform the churches, but for the extinction of the reformations that have begun?

Besides, called to this council are not learned and pious, prudent and holy men out of every nation under heaven; but only those who are bound by oath to the pope. For so run the words of indiction:

"We call together all out of all places, as well our venerable brethren the patriarchs, archbishops, bishops, and our well-beloved sons the abbots, as well as singular others who have the power conceded to them by the right or privilege of sitting and giving judgment in general councils; commanding them by virtue of the oath they have taken to us and this holy see, and in consideration of holy obedience, that they be present in their own persons."⁵

So it is clear who are called to the council, and who are, as it were, the fathers, assessors, and judges in it. And what can be expected from persons so bound by oath to the pope and the church of Rome, that they can do nothing else but what the former wills, and what pertains to the safety of the latter? For the bishops and heads of the church of Rome bind themselves to the pope by an oath of this form:

"I will be helper to keep and defend the Roman papacy, and royalties of St. Peter, against every man. I will be careful to preserve, defend, increase, and further the rights, honours, privileges, and authority of the church of Rome, of our lord the pope, and of his successors. Neither will I be of any counsel, act, or treaty, which should be devised adverse to our lord or the church of Rome, or to the prejudice of their persons, right, honour, state, and power. And if I know such things to be undertaken by anyone, I will hinder them to the utmost of my ability. I will observe with all my power, the rules of the holy fathers, their decrees, ordinances, judgments, dispositions, reservations, provisions, and apostolic mandates, and cause them to be observed by others. Heretics, schismatics, and rebels against our lord, I will persecute and fight against with all my might." ¹

Thus these men have sworn, I say. And therefore what, I pray, can we hope that those who come to a council bound by such an oath, will pronounce in a point of religion which is in controversy?

We would truly be fools — no, impious — to surrender to the determination of these men, the churches which Christ has redeemed with his blood! For we know already, and as it were, we hold in our hands what they would pronounce: namely, whatever makes for the propagation, vindicating, and upholding of the papacy, and for the subversion of our religion which rests on the word of Christ, the Son of God.

Furthermore, if all the decrees of pope Paul, and whatever he has already defined in matters of the council, ought to be ratified; then those seven sessions,² or the decrees of the sessions that have now been published, must also be confirmed. But these furnish us with manifold proofs that that council was not appointed to search into and illustrate the truth by the scriptures, nor to make a lawful reformation of the church; but to establish the error, abuses, and superstition of the church of Rome; indeed, to hinder right and holy reformations. For to mention only a few out of many things. In Session iv. Decree I. they pronounce this:

"The most sacred, holy, ecumenical and general council of Trent, lawfully assembled in the Holy Spirit, following the examples of the orthodox fathers, receives and reverences with equal affection of piety and veneration, all the books of the old as well as of the new Testament, and also the unwritten traditions pertaining both to faith and manners, as though they had been dictated either from Christ by word of mouth, or from the Holy Spirit, and preserved in the catholic church by continual succession." ³

And then they add to these words a catalogue of the canonical books; among which, notwithstanding, they introduce ecclesiastical writings which are not canonical.⁴ Afterwards they strike with an anathema all who contemn traditions, and who do not receive all those books as canonical; and declare that the council will chiefly use those witnesses and sanctions in establishing doctrines and reforming manners in the church.⁵ In the same session, they reject all other translations and obtrude upon the church, as an authentic book, the received Latin version of the Bible.

And touching the meaning of holy scripture, they openly condemn every exposition that does not agree with the sense which the holy mother church has held and does hold, and with the universal consent of the fathers; for they say that it belongs to the church to judge the true sense and interpretation of [the] scriptures.⁶ But in these matters, I give you warning to mark and diligently examine four things. The first is, that they receive not only the canonical scriptures, by which they may determine the truth and falsehood of religion; but beside the scripture, they also join unwritten things, or traditions that are not written, but are kept in the church by continual succession. The second is, that they mix with canonical books, others that are not canonical; and yet, for all that, they curse those who do not receive them as canonical books. The third is, that they thrust upon the church as an authentic book, the common translation of the Bible in Latin. The fourth is, that they allow no other sense of the scripture except what the mother-church allows. It evidently appears from these things, what they seek in the foresaid council.

If these fathers would have the matters of religion that are in controversy lawfully decided with scripture alone, then why do men need to join traditions that are not written? It is as if to say that the scripture of God was not sufficient to make a perfect ¹ reformation without traditions that are unwritten. But they know well enough that the chief points of popery cannot be proved with any expressed scripture, or with reasons deducted out of the scripture. Therefore they feign unwritten matters, or traditions that were never written, by which they may force and snugly supply,² that which they want in the scripture, and cannot be proved by it. For these traditions being kept safe, even their most foolish absurdities may be kept safe also. For as often as they are disappointed for lack of the authority of scripture, they will run back to the feigned device of their traditions. They would make it a tradition to pray for the dead. Another tradition would be the wifeless state of ministers [of the church]. They would also make a tradition of the mass.

The use of images in temples or churches must also be a tradition. To be short, whatever the old ³ church of Rome has up to now agreeably kept, shall be a tradition, even though it is neither found, nor painted, nor written anywhere in any canonical book; yes, even though it is quite contrary to the scripture. And so whatever they want,⁴ that shall be a tradition.

The Jews also bragged of their traditions in times past, which they called the traditions of the fathers. But Christ said to them: ⁵ "Why do you break the commandment of God for your traditions"? ^{Mat 15.3} And afterward he shows that they are contrary to His, by an example brought out of their traditions, and compared by setting one against another with the word of God. And then he said afterwards: "You have made void the commandment of God for your traditions. Isaiah [the prophet] prophesied well of you, saying, "Hypocrites,⁶ This people draw near to me and honour me with their mouth and lips, but their heart is far from me. But they worship me in vain, teaching doctrines of men." ^{Isa 29.13} Therefore, while we can prove that their traditions which they call living are contrary to the written word [of God], I pray you then, who will deny that they will be refused and condemned by Christ with the traditions of the Jews? Let them set out, therefore, those traditions of theirs, which they receive as reverently as the scripture. For then it will easily appear, by the likeness or by the contrariety, what came from the apostles, and what is privily conveyed under their own names. For this is without any doubt: that the apostles of God delivered nothing by their living word of mouth that was contrary to their writings, which they delivered afterwards to their posterity who came after them. Therefore, that which is contrary to the writings of the apostles cannot be apostolic at all.

The maintainers of unwritten traditions object that the apostles themselves have mentioned in their writings, traditions that are not written. But we say that the apostles did not speak of such traditions as these maintainers intend. St. Luke witnesses that he brought together in his written history of the gospel, those things which those who were eye-witnesses had "delivered:" ^{Luke 1.2} — Look! he says, "delivered." So that what had once been a living tradition of the apostles, is now transferred by St. Luke into letters and writing. Indeed, St. Paul, comprehending the sum and substance of Christian doctrine, says:

"I delivered to you first of all that which I also received, how Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures." ^{1Cor 15:3} Look! the apostle combines living tradition with writing, so that now the writing contains what was his tradition before. The apostle again, in the epistle to the Corinthians, mentioning tradition in the matter of the Lord's Supper, immediately collects in writing and explains what that tradition was. And although he adds just after, "And the rest I will set in order when I come;" ^{1Cor 11:23, 34} yet he then spoke of discipline, and of appointing and keeping up that which was decent in church-assemblies. For indeed, it was not possible that he could deliver anything else about the supper of the Lord, than what he had delivered already, unless he would contradict himself. The same apostle says to the Thessalonians: "Therefore, brethren, stand fast, and hold the traditions which you have been taught." But he adds immediately, by way of explanation, "Whether by word or our epistle." ^{2The 2:15} Consequently, the tradition of the apostles is contained in the word and epistles of Paul. The word of Paul is the lively preaching of the gospel, which he repeated and renewed in his epistles. Furthermore, Paul's word of the gospel is also read and very fully described by the other apostles: for Paul preached no other gospel than did the rest of Christ's apostles.¹

No indeed; and what is more, Paul himself avouches that he preached the gospel of Christ; and in that preaching, he delivered nothing beyond that which the law and the prophets had taught. But who can deny that the writings of Moses and the prophets are fully perfect? Therefore, the canonical scriptures [which are the new Testament and the old] ² are enough for us. And as they contain the lively traditions necessary for godliness, so they are sufficiently furnished to teach, to reprove, or to reform; and finally, to teach how the worshipper of God may be perfected, and made ready for every good work: as Paul himself declares in those very words which I have just recited.³ The fathers of the council of Trent are not content to be referred to the canonical scriptures alone, and to prove or reprove all things by their means. But they mingle traditions with them, and with consummate iniquity (or rather impiety) they place them on an equal footing with the scriptures — that is, equalling human with divine things. Thus they clearly betray what it is they seek by the council which has been called: namely, not to draw forth and affirm the truth in sincerity out of the canonical scriptures, but to defend and confirm long-established errors. This is the object which those feigned traditions marvellously serve to accomplish.

These [things] that I have now written about traditions, are enough for those who know the truth. But, so that provision may be made for those who set too much by traditions, and say that it is most unrighteous to despise generally all the traditions of the fathers, we make a plain difference among the old traditions of the fathers. To begin with, I see that Irenaeus and Tertullian, disputing against heretics, call upon the abridgment or rule of the apostolic doctrine, yes, and also the symbol of the apostles (now called the creed).⁴ Though it was not set out ⁵ in the same words, yet it was in the same sentences of A tradition of the apostles.¹ But who is there that does not know that this tradition was set out from the very midst of the scriptures, and that it may be proved with infinite witnesses of scriptures? Therefore, there is none of us that refuses any such tradition, because there is none of us that despises the authority of the scriptures, teaching us to openly and plenteously believe as that universal tradition has held and taught, against all heresies and heretics.

⁵ Rather, though they do not give it, etc.: reddatum, Lat.

Furthermore, the old fathers have historical traditions in some places; such as that tradition that is written someplace about John the apostle, who fled out of the bath when Cerinthus entered into it.² But when these and ones of the same kind are not contrary to godliness, nor sow any superstition, godly men do not abhor them. Yet, for all that, they do not give them the same authority as they do to the story of the gospel. Furthermore, there are other traditions, not of that universal rule of the faith, nor of the other chapters pertaining to it, which are set out and are not altogether historical. Rather, they are propounded and set forth from opinions, doctrines, and certain rites of whichever order they are — these they repeat among others, that men should pray for those who are departed, and virgins should have veils, or should be consecrated to perpetual virginity, and be shut up in monasteries, etc. But I have sufficiently declared in another place how little these agree with apostolic scripture.³ They also bring forth ⁴ certain other traditions that, by discussing them, it may appear how perilous a thing it is to receive and allow even those traditions which the most ancient writers greatly regarded, and commended highly to the church.

Irenaeus against the Valentinians, the second book, chapter XL, speaks thus about our Lord: "Therefore he was not far," he says, "from 50 years; and therefore they said to him, you are not 50 years old yet, and have you seen Abraham?" ⁵ And in the preceding chapter, Irenaeus establishes this opinion by apostolic traditions. He says: "He declines [now] from the 40th or 50th year, ⁶ during which our Lord taught,⁷ as the gospel and all the old fathers bear witness. They met together with John, the disciple of our Lord, and they say that John delivered that tradition to them. For John lived with them until the time of Trajan, and some of them not only saw him, but also other apostles. And they heard the same things from them, and they bore witness of such a report." ⁸ That old writer left these things, word for word, who is numbered to be among the eldest. But if we receive and allow that tradition, there would follow a marvellous confusion of times, even if I talk of no other matters. For if our Lord was near the fiftieth year of his age (let us grant 48), it would follow that Christ preached 18 years; though it is sufficiently known that he began his preaching about the 15th year of Tiberius Caesar, which was the 30th year of the Lord. Nor do so many as reckon the times of Christ, follow any other account. Therefore, according to the lively tradition of the apostles, which Irenaeus follows very earnestly, Christ should have died, risen again, and ascended into heaven, and sent the Holy Ghost to his disciples the 7th or 8th year of Claudius Caesar. But the order of the story of the gospel is contrary to this reckoning — and also the Acts of the Apostles, which mention Claudius as to where Paul the apostle's matters are entreated, at which time a great dearth and hunger grievously vexed the whole world. Acts 11.28

Therefore, it is out of all doubt that the tradition [of the blessed Irenaeus], which he fathered upon the apostles of Christ the Lord, shamefully beguiles men. [But] after such a foul error is spied, who can then believe those lively traditions, even if they have the witness of the most ancient writers? It is likely that he sought this tradition from Papias of Hieropolis, a disciple of the apostles. For even as Papias greatly regarded lively traditions, which men say he was greatly delighted with, he made Irenaeus, Apollinarius, and certain others ¹ — for the reverence of antiquity — the followers of his error of the Millenarians,² whose first foundation he laid. Meanwhile, the highly learned man, Eusebius, bishop of the church of Caesarea, does not greatly regard Irenaeus' judgment; for in the third book of his Ecclesiastical History, chapter xxxix, he writes in express words that Papias wrote some fables.³ Why should we therefore be blamed, if we either unwillingly, or not at all, receive those lively traditions?

Beside those which I repeated before, this is also to be added: that the notable great strife that arose between the churches of the east and west concerning the keeping of Easter, sprung up from those lively traditions. Therefore, I have [we have] good cause to suspect them. For when the priests of the west judged that the tradition of the apostles Peter and Paul, concerning the keeping of Easter, should not be despised, and the Asians held that they followed the tradition of St. John, a very hot and sharp contention arose between east and west; to such an extent that Victor, a minister of the church of Rome, was not afraid to curse and excommunicate those from Asia; for this, he was [in turn] sharply reproved by the [blessed] martyr Irenaeus. Moreover, a notable historiographer was found, called Socrates, who dared ⁴ to speak openly against both traditions concerning celebrating Easter, both of the east and also the west. For after he brought forth certain places of scripture, he concluded at length that the apostles did not deliver any tradition to the church concerning the celebration of Easter. If anyone requires his words, they are these: "Neither the apostle, nor the gospels, lay any yoke of bondage on those who come to the preaching; but men severally in their own places, celebrated the festival of Easter and other feast-days according to a certain practice, for the remission of labours and the remembrance of the passion which brings salvation, just as it pleased them.

Neither has our Saviour or his apostles ordained this feast by any commandment, to be observed by us; neither do the gospel or the apostles threaten us with any penalty or punishment, as the law of Moses threatened the Jews." And a little after: "It seems to me that, as many other things in various places passed into custom, so likewise did the festival of Easter, because, as I have said, no apostle appointed anything concerning it," etc. ⁵ These words are found in his Histories, lib. v. cap. 22. This writer therefore contradicted traditions openly, and was charged neither with sacrilege nor heresy for it. What then should hinder us from speaking against such traditions that are contrary to the scripture? These [things] being so plain that they cannot be denied even by our enemies, we will not suffer ourselves to be drawn away from the undoubted and sure scripture, to those uncertain [I know not what] traditions. Surely, if those fathers of the council of Trent were sincere, and had a hot zeal to set out the truth clearly and to help the church, doubtless they would allow themselves and all their doings to be judged by that best and greatest God, and by His most true word. But because they refuse to do that, and set out certain fabled traditions, they have openly declared to the whole world what help and strength they trust to maintain their cause [outside of] the holy scripture.

Now, they mix up uncanonical books with the canonical; such as the books of the Maccabees, of Tobit, and others, which are called ecclesiastical by other men, or at least, not canonical; They do this to the same end: that they make traditions equal to the scriptures of God. For they hope to supply out of them that which they see the true canonical books have wanting. For, to say nothing of other particulars; out of the second book of the Maccabees they hope to show that it is a wholesome thing to pray and offer for the dead, to be absolved from sins.¹

They hope to prove that the prayers of saints in heaven are presented to God in behalf of those who are alive on the earth. Though, meanwhile, in the ancient church, among the most faithful and holy ministers of the churches, the second book of the Maccabees and other books of the kind were never accounted among those that are canonical. I am not ignorant indeed that in this instance these men take themselves to the patronage of St. Augustine, who in his treatise De Doct. Christ., book 11. chap. 8, numbers among the canonical books, not only those ecclesiastical books, but also the second book of the Maccabees.² But if we consult histories and the records of the ancients, it will be found that only in the age of Augustine was it received into the number of canonical, or rather of ecclesiastical books.³ This was in the third council of Carthage, which is said to have been held in the consulship of Caesarius and Atticus, when Honorius and Arcadius were emperors, about the year of our Lord 400 or 399.⁴ Nor does St. Augustine conceal this fact: for in his book De Civit. Dei, book xviii. chap. 36,⁵ and in his treatise against the epistle of Gaudentius, book ii. chap. 23,⁶ he states that the books of the Maccabees were not included in the canon by the ancients; although he adds that "it is not without profit that they have been received, provided only that they be read soberly." Look, he says, "Provided they are read soberly." And elsewhere he says that he "holds them canonical because of the great and wonderful sufferings of certain martyrs." Now all this establishes my opinion given above; and chiefly the further saying of the same writer, that not everything set forth in that book is to be allowed, unless it is fully tried and compared with the other scriptures. For in another place also, he teaches that the books which are received by all are to be preferred to those which are not received by some churches.⁷

But we are able to prove that the books of the Maccabees were never received as canonical by the most ancient and distinguished churches of the east. Melito, bishop of Sardis, flourished not many years after the death of the apostles, about the year of our Lord 173, under the emperor Antony Verus,⁸ to whom he also presented a defence of our faith. He recites no other books of the old Testament as canonical except those which Jerome in his prologue, Galeatus,⁹ gives a list of, leaving out all that are called ecclesiastical. He also says that he had travelled as far as the East, where the beginning of our preaching had its rise, and where all things occurred which we read in scripture — that there he might search out with diligence all that related to the truth and certainty of the canonical books; and that he found there that precise number.¹ After Melito, Origen also recounts no more books of the old Testament than twenty-two.² So likewise St. Jerome, not so much in his prologue, Galeatus, as in his epistle to Paulinus concerning all the books of scripture, acknowledges those twenty-two books as canonical; and says that the rest are to be excluded from the canon.³ The same author, in his prologue to the Proverbs of Solomon, having spoken of the book called the Wisdom of Solomon and Ecclesiasticus, adds: "Therefore, just as the church indeed reads the books of Judith and Tobit and the Maccabees, but does not receive them among the canonical scriptures; so likewise she reads these two books for the edification of the people, but not to establish the authority of ecclesiastical doctrines." ⁴

In the same way, we think St. Augustine reckoned the second book of the Maccabees among those which are canonical; meaning that it was an ecclesiastical book, but did not have like authority with those that are truly in the canon, and from of old. Nor could St. Jerome be ignorant of the decree of the council of Carthage, seeing that he is said by many writers to have died about the year of our Lord 422. ⁵ Of the same tendency is the reckoning of Ruffinus of Aquileia, in his Exposition of the Apostles' Creed: for he recounts neither more, nor any other books of the old Testament, than those we have mentioned above. And among other words he says: "These are the books of the old Testament, which, according to the tradition of our elders, are believed to have been inspired by the Holy Spirit himself, and have been handed down to the churches of Christ." And a little after the same author says:

"But it is to be known, that there are other books beside, which have not been called canonical by our ancestors, but ecclesiastical; such as the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, and the books of Tobit, and Judith, and the Maccabees: all of which they were content should be read in the churches, but not brought forward to confirm out of them the authority of the faith." ⁶

So then, it appears that we have on our side the primitive church and all antiquity, which the fathers of the council of Trent strike with their curse because they anathematize us also. For we do not reject the ecclesiastical books; rather, agreeably with the old church, we contend that either the truth or falsity of our religion is to be proved or disproved out of the canonical books alone, and appeal to none but the canonical scriptures. For which — since our adversaries refuse to submit all their doctrines to it, turning their eyes away to other shadowy defences — it is manifest of what sort their cause is, and what it is they seek by a council called together on such conditions as we have described.

But again, no person who is well in his senses, condemns and rejects the Latin vulgate version of the Bible altogether. Rather, we all cry out that in places that are doubtful, or controverted, or obscurely translated, or corrupted, recourse must be had to the Hebrew and Greek originals; because the authentic book is that which is written in either Hebrew or Greek. For neither the prophets nor the apostles wrote in Latin, but the latter wrote in Greek and the former in Hebrew. And in this instance, we demand nothing unjustifiable, and no more than what the papists themselves have previously allowed. For in the Decrees, Distinct. 9, this Canon is read: "The correctness of the old books is to be tried by the Hebrew volumes, as the correctness of the new must be ruled by the Greek language." ¹ These words were borrowed out of an epistle of St. Augustine's, which he wrote to St. Jerome. The same Augustine, in his treatise against Faustus the Manichee, book xi. chap. 2, says:

"If a question turns on the fidelity of copies, as there are diversities of sentences in some — these are few however and well known to students in the scriptures — either our doubt must be resolved by codices in other countries, from which the doctrine itself emanated; or if the codices themselves vary, the more in number must be preferred to the fewer, or the older to the more modern. And if doubtful variations yet remain, the earlier language, and that from which the translation was made, must be consulted," etc. ²

Again, the same writer in his treatise De Doct. Christ., book ii. chap. 11, says:

"The Latins want two other languages also, that they may attain the knowledge of the scriptures of God; namely, the Hebrew and the Greek. That reference may be made to the first texts, whenever the endless variations of the Latin cause a doubt."

Again:

"Those who translated the scriptures out of Hebrew into Greek may be counted up; but not so for those who rendered them into Latin. For in the first times of the faith every man, as he obtained a copy of the Greek text, and seemed to himself to possess some measure of skill in both languages, presumed to make a translation." ³

And in the twelfth chapter of the same book he adds, speaking of the variety of translations: "Which thing indeed has rather assisted than hindered understanding, provided only that readers are not negligent. For the examination of a larger number of copies has often served to clear up some doubtful passages." ⁴ Now when the fathers of the council of Trent with one decree lay all this aside, and against all antiquity and sound reason obtruded upon us the Latin version as an authentic book, we manifestly see again what is to be looked for from them, unless we are struck with blindness. And indeed, the fourth canon (which they have put forth concerning the exposition of scripture) — even if we have learned nothing from those going before — will alone and of itself, be able to fully testify that these men, before they met together, had resolved with consummate wickedness to seize for themselves beforehand, most assured victory and the greatest security: so that they might never seem to change, or in ever so slight a degree to miss their aim. For they condemn all expositions which do not agree with the opinion that holy mother church has held and holds, and which contradict the unanimous interpretation of the fathers. For so long as this decree stands, nothing however plain shall be brought forward out of the scriptures, that is against popish doctrines and superstitious ceremonies. But they will be able to evade it by one word, saying, "The church does not understand it so." Again, however foully they distort and corrupt any passage of scripture, they will instantly be able to apply their salve, saying: "The church understands it so, and some of the fathers have explained it so." Thus, they will bring forth in support of the pope's supremacy, "You are Peter;" and, "Upon this rock I will build my church;" "You shall be called Cephas;" "Feed my lambs." And should anyone desire to sift these passages lawfully, by means of a sober comparison of scripture with scripture, and to search for the genuine sense of them, he will be told immediately, that the church and the fathers expound them of the pope; and therefore he must understand them of the pope, and of his principality (as they call it.). I would produce more instances of this kind, if I thought they were wanted.

But from these extracts that I have made out of the decrees of the council of Trent, I feel sure that it appears clearer than the light, to what end chiefly the pope has called that council.

Namely, not that the truth might be drawn forth and illustrated from the scriptures, but that scripture itself might be degraded, and serve those men's dignity, honours, and wealth, and the maintenance and establishment of superstition — not that churches might be reformed, but that those churches which have begun to emerge, might be reduced to their former condition of deformity.

And therefore, though through God's singular grace the light of Christ has shone upon the famous realm of England, do not turn back your eyes from that light; for whoever follows it, does not walk "in darkness, but has the light of life." ^{John 8.12} Go forward, go forward, under the guidance of Christ, in reforming what needs to be reformed! It will be no sin, even if you never again reconcile yourselves to that late upstart church of Rome. I give place here to no wrong spirit: for I have proved by invincible arguments, in the beginning of this my fifth decade, that we must come out of her altogether, and consecrate ourselves to Christ only and to the true church of Christ.

This decade I inscribe and dedicate to your piety, most illustrious Prince, as to a vigorous maintainer of real godliness; not doubting that you will take upon yourself the faithful patronage of these my studies; especially after you have read them with diligence, and discover that I have advanced nothing without the authority of scripture and contrary to true piety, but everything from the scriptures of God and in defence of the true religion. For I desire that not the smallest weight should be granted to myself and my writings, unless I justify all my statements with express scriptures and solid reasons fetched out of the scripture. And your piety needs none of my teaching, seeing that it is well enough instructed in true religion, and surrounded with most learned and godly men on all sides, of whom master Robert Skinner and master Andrew Wullock,¹ very excellent individuals, are none of the least. Yet I entertain the hope that these labours of mine will be pleasing to you, and that you will take in good part my dedication which has proceeded from a good mind. For truly, I seek in it nothing else than the public weal — that is, that the kingdom of God's Son, which has begun to flourish anew in these our times, when the terrible judgment of the Son of God is close at hand and already knocking at our doors, may spread abroad far and wide, as well among you in the famous realm of England, as everywhere else in the earth.

Other men indeed in their epistles of dedication celebrate his praises, to whom they inscribe their books: but knowing full well that you care for no such applause, and require no such commendations, because your virtue is otherwise sufficiently distinguished, and you also labour day by day to increase it with modesty and humility, I have made it my aim in my epistle to rather exhort your piety, as diligently as I am able, to outdo yourself in the most excellent pursuit and increase of virtues.

"Whatever things are in men worthy to be praised, all are the gifts of our Lord God. The Lord gave you the mind to discern, that while it is justly esteemed a great favour to be sprung from the royal line,² it is a far greater and nobler distinction to be called, and to be truly, a son of God, and a joint-heir with Christ Jesus, God's Son. As then you enjoy, by the grace of God, this highest nobility, see to it that you keep it even to the end, by diligently following after godliness; see to it that you cling constantly to Christ the Redeemer, and further his glory; see to it that, out of the faith which you keep to the King of everlasting glory, you continue to be faithful also to the King's most serene majesty and to the whole of the famous realm of England, your most dear fatherland. Up to now you have been to strangers (whom the Lord has especially commended to our regards) a defence and refuge; and, in one word, the tower and pattern of studious and learned men. Go on to be the same! So shall you obtain, not a perishing but an everlasting glory in this world and in the world to come.

Be pleased, I beseech you, to deliver my commendations to that high-minded champion, lord John Dudley, earl of Warwick,¹ a nobleman every way most eminent; on whom I pray every blessing may descend, and to whom I present all my duty.

The Lord Jesus, the supreme and only Sovereign of the universe, the King of kings and Lord of lords, preserve in safety your most serene king and all the whole famous realm of England; also the counsellors of the realm, most faithful and wise, and yourself also, most gentle prince!

APPENDIX II. Dedication to Masters Gualter, Simler, etc.

GREETINGS ¹ TO THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS MEN: MASTERS RODOLPH GUALTER, PETER SIMLER, JOHN STUMPHIUS, JOHN BLUMEN;² JOHN SEILER, HADRIAN HOSPINIAN;³ NICHOLAS SCHNEIDER;⁴ AND JOHN HUGO, DEANS OR ARCHPRESBYTERS;⁵ AND TO ALL THE MINISTERS OF CHRIST AND OF THE CHURCHES OF THE CLASSES ⁶ OF ZURICH — SEE, FREYAMT, STEIN, WINTERTHUR, ELGG, WERIKON, AND REGENSPERG; IN THE TERRITORY OF ZURICH; HIS REVEREND AND VERY BELOVED FELLOW-MINISTERS AND BRETHREN.

If any other age has furnished a fruitful subject for discourse, this present time of ours furnishes the most fruitful; for what happens and what threatens Christendom today, is too evident to require many words to declare it. The just Lord is angry at our sins, and He punishes them also; indeed, he is preparing far heavier calamities to pour out on the heads of the impenitent. Our duty then, is to watch for the Lord's flock; and on the approach of the sword, to give timely warning to all the sheep committed to our trust, so that the blood of those who perish is not required at our hands. Therefore, I think I will do a profitable work, if I talk with you, reverend fellow-ministers and most dear brethren, of the right discharge of our duty in this dangerous age, and of the sure method by which we may piously appease the anger of God provoked by our sins. I know with whom I speak — even with men, who are perfectly skilled in the things of God. I shall therefore study to be brief.

It is beyond a doubt that the most righteous Lord is angry at the sins of men. And it follows therefore, that to wash away sins is the only way of appeasing the divine wrath. But sins are not washed away without being acknowledged first, and afterward put away by faith and repentance. Therefore, if we desire according to our office, that anger and severe punishments be taken from the Lord's flock, we must of necessity show and accuse the sins of men, and also teach faith and enforce repentance. For the Lord says by Ezekiel:

"Will you judge, son of man, will you judge the bloody city? Show her all her abominations, and say, O city, that sheds blood in the midst of her, that her time may come; and makes idols against herself, to defile herself!

You have become guilty in the blood that you have shed, and have defiled yourself in your idols which you have made; and you have caused your days to draw near. Therefore, I will deliver you to the heathen. Behold your princes, every one used their power to shed blood. In you they have made light of father and mother. They have dealt by reproach with the stranger that is in the midst of you. In you have they vexed the fatherless and the widow. You have despised my holy things, and profaned my sabbaths. In you men of deceit were to shed blood: and in you they eat upon the mountains; and in you they go about the wickedness they have thought upon. In you they have uncovered their father's nakedness; in you they have humbled her that was set apart for pollution; and every one has committed abomination with his neighbour's wife, and every one has lewdly defiled his daughter-in-law; in you every one has humbled his sister, his father's daughter. In you they have taken gifts to shed blood; you have taken usury and increase; and you have greedily gained from your neighbour by extortion, and have forgotten Me, says the Lord God. And behold, I have clapped my hands at your covetousness which you have practised, and at your blood which has been in the midst of you. And can you prevail in the day that I shall arise against you? I will scatter you among the heathen, and disperse you in the countries, and I will make an end of your filthiness which is in you." Eze 22.1-15

Thus far have I quoted word for word, brethren, out of Ezekiel; and all the more freely, because these verses present us with a certain general form not only of reproving sins, but also of judging what sins God most especially hates and would have rebuked very sharply. For again and again we must take heed, lest as blind guides we strain out a gnat and swallow a camel; I mean, lest we tarry on small errors and faults, blaming and chasing them away, and pass by, without once touching them, enormous crimes and wickednesses.

Therefore, this passage of Ezekiel shows, and other places of holy scripture also declare, what crimes are most of all to be abhorred: namely, those which directly tend to subvert the glory of God, to oppress justice and holiness, and to cast aside charity. I am aware that these awful crimes do not reign, God be thanked! Nor are they found in every individual church. Different churches have different disorders. Nor is it beneficial to set before a people these horrible crimes, if they are not found among them. But the part of a wise pastor is to consider diligently what is adapted for each church, what is proper for it, useful, and necessary; and to insist upon that.

But things that are not condemned by the judgment of God in the scriptures, and that do not militate against the points mentioned above, we ought not to attack — for those who condemn as sins what God has not condemned, sin grievously. "Woe to them," says Isaiah, the beloved of God, "who call evil good, and good evil; who put darkness for light, and light for darkness; who put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter." Isa 5.20 In this matter, then, nothing may be done by us according to our own mind, but we must rather judge and according to the commandment of God. Yet must we take heed that we do not, like some persons, palliate ¹ sins; but as the proverb has it, call a spade a spade, and a fig a fig, and speak with plainness, though soberly and modestly. Also, may the gall of bitterness and the depraved affection of the flesh be far from us; far from us be an unruly tongue; far be banter, unclean words, and abusiveness — lest we be thought to transgress the bounds of decency, and to be possessed with the lust of evil-speaking, rather than burn with zeal for God, and truth, and righteousness. Let it appear to impartial hearers, that we reprove with the feeling of a father, and assail sinners of mankind from a desire to save and not to destroy them; that we attack the crime and not the person of the criminal. For in the case of the ministers of God's word, freedom of speech in the church is honesty of heart, and not the ungoverned passion of one possessed and disordered with envy. Not all things are lawful for ministers, nor are all things expedient. And therefore, no good man can approve the wanton boldness and the abusive evil temper of some who think they have not fulfilled their duty, unless they have poured forth and emptied out upon their unfortunate hearers, whole cart-loads of abuse, without any measure and discrimination. The examples of the prophets give no support to such ravings as these — and they are wrongly applied, because the circumstances are overlooked.

Let the rebuke or fault-finding of the ministers of the truth be prudent rather than daring; sober and well-weighed, and not light and loose: let it glow not with passion, but with fervency of spirit; let it be chaste, modest, and holily tempered with a just severity, and come down upon the guilty individual and hold him fast by matter-of-fact plainness, transparency, and majesty, rather than pierce by a profusion of ill words. I mean, wound the guilty conscience by a lively setting forth of sin, and by exposing the foulness or enormity of bad deeds, rather than exasperate it by scoffings and impure quips. And it is certain that men are deeply moved whenever they are brought to understand clearly, that the things they go about are directed against God, and tend to the destruction of their body and the eternal ruin of their soul.

We shall still have attacked sin in vain and fruitlessly, if we do not at the same time urge faith and repentance. When he has been provoked, God is not appeased by a few ceremonies and commonplace acts, which are trifling and brought to us by human tradition. "In vain they worship me," says the Lord, "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men." ^{Mat 15:9} No, the Lord is highly indignant when we persist in seeking reconciliation with Him by some absurd worshipping of God. For he cries by Jeremiah:

"Amend your ways and your doings, and I will cause you to dwell in this place. But behold, you trust in lying words that cannot profit. Will you steal, murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsely, and walk after other gods, and come and stand before me in this house, which is called by my name, and say, We have been delivered to do all these abominations? Has this house, which is called by My name, become a den of robbers in your eyes?" ^{Jer 7:3,8-11}

Therefore, let us lay aside false doctrine, and learn from God's word what kind of conversion pleases him, and what is true repentance and faith.

When sins have been rebuked sharply by the ministers of God's word; then the word of truth requires of godly hearers, that they acknowledge with the heart the sins that have been laid to their charge, and which they have practised against God's law; and confess them to the omniscient and omnipotent God, to whom all hearts are open, and ascribe all glory to God, who is true and righteous, but ascribe to themselves lying, wickedness, and confusion of face. For the apostle and evangelist St. John says: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves; we make God a liar, and the truth is not in us." ^{1Joh 1:8-10} In Jeremiah we read also: "Therefore, do you make your way good, when it is evil? You say, I am innocent: but I will judge you. Is not the blood of the poor found in your skirts?" ^{Jer 2:33-35} And in the gospel the Lord says: "If you were blind, you would have no sin. But now you say, 'We see;' therefore your sin remains." ^{Joh 9:41} Before all things, then, acknowledgment and confession of sins is indispensable. This goes before humiliation in the sight of God.

For whoever acknowledges his sins and confesses them to God from the heart, must humble himself before God. He groans, mourns, indeed, draws sighs even from his breast. He is ashamed, that so often and in such unworthy ways he has offended his most indulgent Father; and he casts himself on that account in the dust at the Lord's feet. In this manner the woman in the city, who was a sinner, came to our Lord as he sat at meal; and Peter, when he had denied his Lord, went out from the palace of the high-priest; and they prostrated themselves before the Lord, and shed tears in great abundance.

David cries: "Your arrows stick fast in me, and your hand presses me sorely. There is no soundness in my flesh, because of your anger; neither is there any rest in my bones, because of my sin. For my iniquities have gone over my head: as a heavy burden they are too heavy for me. I declare my iniquity, and I am sorry for my sin. My soul also is sorely vexed. I am weary with my groaning: all night I make my bed to swim, I water it with my tears." ¹ In these terms he expresses the intense grief which was wrought in him, and which proceeded from the acknowledgment of his sins: and in them he has left to us a true pattern of true repentance.

However, to acknowledge and confess our sins, and to humble ourselves in the sight of the Lord, and to be sorry, will not suffice, unless we also believe that all our sins are forgiven us for Christ's sake. For Judas greatly grieved because he had betrayed Christ; he heartily confessed his sin, saying, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood:" Indeed, he brought back into the temple the price of blood ^{Mat 27:3-5} which he had received from those robbers. But because he had no true faith in the Lord Jesus, his sorrow and confession availed nothing. We must before all things, therefore, teach and enforce faith — I mean, that faith by which penitents believe that their sins are freely forgiven them for Christ's sake. But this is a truth which we must establish and prove by manifest promises of God and undoubted examples. For the apostle witnesses, "Faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." ^{Rom 10:17} Indeed, it is so much more needful to do this, and to prove this point with all diligence, by how much more violently the minds of believers are assaulted on this issue.

I will not allege testimonies out of the law and the prophets (although they exist there in large abundance), but only from the writings of the evangelists and apostles, which teach with one accord that to those who believe, sins are freely forgiven for Christ's sake. The Baptist, our Lord's forerunner, points the finger to the Lord Jesus Christ himself, and cries: "Behold the Lamb of God, which takes away the sin of the world." ^{Joh 1:29} For the apostle John has said: "The blood of the Son of God cleanses us from all sin. For he is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." ^{1Joh 1:7; 2:2} Indeed, the Lord Jesus himself testifies of these things, and says: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whoever believes in him should not perish, but have eternal life." ^{Joh 3:14-15}

The apostle Paul bears witness also, and says: "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." ^{1Tim 1:15} For Peter also said: "To Christ all the prophets give witness, that through his name whoever believes in him shall receive remission of sins." ^{Act 10:43} The scripture, and more especially the gospels, present us with countless examples also of the free forgiveness of sins, and acceptance into favour, for those who believe in Christ, or who are penitent. Of this sort are the cases of Matthew, Zacchaeus, the woman who was a sinner, Peter, Paul, the dying thief on the cross, and many more. These things, therefore, let the faithful minister of Christ enforce in the church without ceasing, that no one may be swallowed up with sorrow, and struck with conscience of sins, and pine away, and despair, and be lost. Let everyone believe that the heavenly Father is appeased toward him for the sake of the death, and righteousness, and redemption that is by Christ. For by faith alone are peace and tranquility thus granted to troubled consciences.

And yet the faith which believes that our heavenly Father is appeased toward us for the sake of Christ, and will not punish us anymore for the sins we have committed — the faith which calms our spirits and tranquilizes our consciences — does not remove all anxiety out of our bosoms, nor introduce a torpid slothfulness, but rather stirs us up to prayers and to all godly duties. Abraham believed God; but he did not cease to pray on that account. Indeed, the more surely he believed that he would receive the divine promises, the more fervently he prayed. David did not doubt in the least that he would have from the Lord the thing he had promised him. Yet notwithstanding, he prayed without ceasing. Therefore, the people must be carefully instructed by us, not to give up pouring out supplications and prayers before the Lord, that he would have mercy upon us for Christ's sake, and turn away his anger from us, and give and increase in us true faith, and ever rule us with his Spirit, and in a word, deliver us from all the evils of both our soul and body, and grant us peace and safety; and that to our princes and magistrates, He would grant wisdom, prudence, courage, justice, and happiness. But in all these prayers, the people must be careful, that they call on none other than God the Father alone, through his well-beloved and only Son, our Lord Jesus Christ; so that they may not pray without faith and charity. For he that wavers in his faith, may not think that he shall receive anything. ^{Jas 1:6-7}

And he that brings his gift to the altar must first be reconciled to his brother, and then let him offer his gift. ^{Mat 5.24} And let all be kept in the practice of prayer by that word of our Lord's in the gospel: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. For every one that asks receives; and he that seeks finds; and to him that knocks it shall be opened. Or what man is there of you, whom if his son asks for bread, will give him a stone? Or if he asks for a fish, will give him a serpent? If you then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to those who ask him!" ^{Mat 7.7-11}

Holy Jeremiah, however, even though he prayed fervently and continually at times for the Lord's people, yet he heard this word from the Lord:

"Do not pray for this people, nor lift up a cry or prayer for them, nor make intercession to me: for I will not hear you. Do you not see what they do in the city and in the field? The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes for the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings to other gods, that they may provoke me to anger." ^{Jer 7.16-18}

This is why no one should think that the wrath of the Lord can be appeased with prayers only, however long or many, if we yet go on to provoke it daily by our iniquities. Let us urge the people committed to our charge, therefore, while they pray earnestly and without ceasing, to amend their evil manners also. That is, to lay aside covetousness, usury, pride, incest, adulteries, fornication, luxury, drunkenness, surfeiting, blasphemies, slandering, idolatry, superstition, ungodliness, anger, envy, wrong and venal judgment, blood-shedding, unjust and mercenary warfare,¹ and oppression and contempt of the poor. And to serve God in Christ with doing good, liberality, humility, modesty, chastity, continence, sobriety, fastings, blessing, thanksgiving, religion, godliness, tenderness, benevolence, judgment and justice, vindicating and care of the poor, faith, hope, charity, love of our country, obedience and heart,² patience, and all other virtues. For most truly has Solomon, the wisest of men, said: "He that turns away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be an abomination." ^{Pro 28.9} Even if we do all that is commanded of us, still let us say, as the Lord taught us in the gospel: "We are unprofitable servants; we have done [only] what it was our duty to do" ^{Luk 17.10} — believing, however, that for the sake of Christ and for the merits of Christ, and not for our own sake or merits, we are pleasant and acceptable to God the Father.

Finally, in addition to all this, we need long-suffering, patience, and a hope that is steadfast and unmoved by all the dangers which come about us, that our faith may not fail, and that we may never waver in our hope, or place our confidence in things that perish. Let that excellent saying of the Lord by Isaiah be before the eyes of us all, therefore: "In sitting still and rest shall you be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength: and you would not. But you said, No; for we will flee upon horses: therefore you shall flee," ^{Isa 30.15-16} and your trust shall perish "as a breach ready to fall." ^{Isa 30.13} Here is the place then, to tear away from men and to break up all the defences on which this world is commonly prone to lean, that they may be stripped and made destitute of everything, and hang upon heaven alone. Still, let them not despise the means and instruments that are allowed, or even commanded, or not forbidden by God — but only this: do not attribute more to them than piety allows, nor trust in them altogether by themselves. For "unless the Lord keeps the city, the watchman wakes but in vain." ^{Psa 127.1} Unless the Lord supplies strength and counsel to the senate, however wise it may otherwise be; or to the army, though it is most strong and well-appointed — it perishes in the twinkling of an eye; it is thrown into confusion, and scattered like dust before the wind. Wonderfully applicable to this subject is the prophecy of

Obadiah: for with remarkable comprehensiveness he shows how little avail those things would be in which the Edomites trusted — places fortified by nature and art, wisdom, riches, treaties, and most experienced soldiers. And also by Jeremiah the Lord says: "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom, neither let the mighty man glory in his might, let not the rich man glory in his riches: but let him that glories glory in this: that he understands and knows me, that I am the Lord, who exercises loving-kindness, judgment, and righteousness in the earth; for in these things I delight, says the Lord." Jer 9.24

And now, to briefly sum up what I have discoursed about with you, reverend and most dear fellow-ministers and brethren: We have learned by all that has been said that God, when he is provoked by our sins, cannot otherwise be appeased than by acknowledging and confessing our sins — every one of us — which the word of God has brought home to us, and which we have committed against God our Father; by our humbling ourselves and sorrowing before our God with all our heart; by not yielding to despair on account of our sins, but believing without doubt that they are done away with entirely and forgiven us — not for our sake or merits, but for the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord, the Saviour of the whole world, upon whom the heavenly Father laid all the sins of the world, for which the Son of God made satisfaction upon the cross.

Finally, by continuing in supplication and prayer without ceasing, and serving the God who has redeemed us, and whose we are altogether — with true repentance and worthy fruits of repentance, with a steadfast hope, with unfeigned love, kindness, benevolence, righteousness, holiness, patience, and innocence.

The scripture of both testaments bears witness in every part, that this is the only way of escaping the evils that hang over our heads; that this the only method of appeasing the wrath of God. God had decreed to overthrow the people of Nineveh, and provided that their overthrow would be proclaimed to the Ninevites by the most illustrious prophet Jonah. He also appointed a space of forty days, after which the city would fall. But when the people of Nineveh believed God, and repented, and cried to the Lord with continual prayer, God spared the penitents and saved them. Indeed, did not the Jews require, with impious and sacrilegious clamours, that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour of the world, should be crucified? And yet Peter cries and teaches that such great wickedness as that, may be done away with true faith and faithful repentance. Act 2.36-38 Let us then not doubt, brethren, concerning a truth which is established by so many and such manifest testimonies.

I know what some persons object against this statement: that it is vain to enforce repentance, for it can profit nothing, because of the sentence which God has pronounced, and because of God's immutable decree, by which he has determined to cut us off for our sins. But if we examine the scripture more closely, that does not speak of God's decree so harshly. For in Jeremiah we read these words: "At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it. If that nation, against whom I have pronounced, turns from its evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do to them." Jer 18.7 And a most apposite example I brought even now out of the prophet Jonah, in the instance of the Ninevites, against whom the sentence of destruction was uttered, but was recalled immediately upon the repentance of the people of Nineveh. For the sentence of overthrow was delivered with this condition, if they remained in impenitence. A like passage is found in Deut. 9. For Moses says: "I fell down before the Lord forty days and forty nights, because the Lord had said he would destroy you. I prayed therefore to the Lord, and His anger was appeased." Deu 9.25-26

Therefore, do not let the decree of God, which he has pronounced against sinners, deter anyone from repentance, or from importunate prayer; for as that decree is immutable against the ungodly, so it does not stand at all in the way of penitents.

But again: should any one find an objection in the sins of our fathers, Ezekiel has replied already in his eighteenth chapter. For he sternly rebukes the parable, which some also in his time cast in the way of repentance, saying; "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." And after a long disputation he concludes at last:

"The soul that sins, shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father; neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son. The righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him; and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him." Eze 18.2, 20

I know all do not repent of the sins they have committed. But shall the repentance of believers be unprofitable on that account? Rather, we read in not a few cases, that many sinners have been spared for the sake of a very few good and righteous persons. Besides, the Lord by Isaiah says expressly: "Say to the righteous, that it shall be well with them; for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe unto the wicked! it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given to him." Isa 3.10-11 Righteous Lot is led by angels out of the city of Sodom, and the wicked city with all its inhabitants is consumed by fire from heaven. Hezekiah, the faithful king, is delivered from the danger that threatened him, and out of the hand of the Assyrians who were about to assault the city; and Shebna, the scribe, perishes shamefully. Isa 22.15-19 King Zedekiah is taken, and led away into captivity; and Jeremiah is saved from death, and receives his liberty. Most truly, therefore, St. Peter said: "The Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust for the day of judgment, to be punished." 2Pet 2.9 Therefore, let us steadfastly cultivate virtues, for our labour shall not be in vain. If the Lord visits the earth with some common calamity on account of sins and flagrant iniquities, he will nevertheless not forget those who fear him and call upon his name, although they may be involved in like evils with the ungodly, and seem to share the same end as the wicked.

But it is certain that a kingdom or commonwealth, which does not repent, and is impious and refractory,¹ cannot long endure. Indeed, even the preaching of the gospel will not profit such despisers of God and of the divine laws. For again the Lord says by Jeremiah: "At the instant I speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom, to build and to plant it; if it does evil in my sight, in that it does not obey my voice, then I will repent of the good with which I said I would benefit them." Jer 18.9-10

Still let no one quickly despair, when he sees a people that is inclined to wickedness, rush on from sin to sin. But if you see many breaking forth in their obstinate love of iniquity, harden your heart also, and all the more oppose yourself to them with zealous desire of that which is just and true. For in such a case, we must remember the words of the apostle, where he says:

"The servant of the Lord must be gentle to all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those who oppose themselves; if God perhaps will give them repentance to acknowledge the truth; and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, those who are taken captive by him at his will." 2Tim 2.24-26

And truly, great are the rewards set before us, brethren, if we are faithful and earnest; as on the other hand horrible punishment with everlasting shame is prepared for the unfaithful and slothful. Let us therefore "watch and pray." Mat 26.41 Let this doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ be always before our eyes:

"Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord has made ruler over his household, to give them food in due season? Blessed is that servant, whom his lord, when he comes, shall find so doing. Truly I say to you, that he shall make him ruler over all his goods. But if that evil servant says in his heart, My lord delays his coming; and begins to strike his fellow-servants, and to eat and drink with the drunken; the lord of that servant will come in a day when he is not looking for him, and in a hour that he is not aware of, and will cut him asunder, and appoint him his portion with the hypocrites: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Mat 24.45-51

Let these things, I say, be ever before our eyes and minds: and let us pray that God will grant us his principal Spirit,¹ and increase it in us day by day; so that by his inspiration and guidance we may discharge the office, which the Lord has assigned us, faithfully and very fruitfully.

These sermons truly I have written, that I might bestow my labours upon you, assist your own studies, or even stimulate each one of you to think and find out more; but not that everyone should use them word for word in the church confided to his care. For selection and judgment is needed, that we may not speak to our own church what is foreign to it, or little profitable and necessary for it. Let the wise pastor consider well, of what kind the morals of the people of his charge are, and what things are most requisite for them, and so set them before them — having regard always to edification — true faith, piety, charity, and innocence.

For we must both teach and admonish, that the church over which it has pleased the Lord to set us, may be godly and holy. Certain forms of sermons, therefore, I put forth, by which I also desire to gratify those who have for many years asked this of me. And in all these, and with regard to all points, I would have that most just rule of the apostle to prevail with all readers: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good." 1The 5.21 Nor am I much affected by the slanders of those who cry out that such sermons make the brethren idle; as was the case formerly when the sermons of Discipulus² and Pelbart³ were read. For I have on my side the example of the greatest luminaries in the church: I mean, the most eminent bishops in the church, who themselves also wrote sermons and homilies to the great profit of the church. The idle are always idle, even though nothing at all is written.

Before these sermons I have placed the oldest creeds (from the most ancient councils in the church, as well as from the most orthodox fathers or bishops) to no other end than to show that our doctrine and faith — which among many today, has a very ill name and is most unjustly accused of heresy — is agreeable with the doctrine of the apostles, and of the primitive church. From the beginning, it delivered nothing to be believed and taught except what we believe and teach in our churches today. Innocent, the third of that name, was the first to presume to add more articles than the ancient creeds of the Christian faith set forth. His creed is found in the Decretals, cap. Firmiter credimus.⁴ He occupied the see of Rome about the year of our Lord 1215; and he published his creed at the Lateran council.

But you, brethren, inasmuch as you know whom you have believed, and that the doctrine of our faith is Christian, apostolic, catholic, orthodox, and true, the ancient and undoubted faith and doctrine, continue steadfast in holding it and teaching it! Truth ever conquers: it may be pressed, but it cannot be oppressed. The truth of the Lord, says the prophet, abides forever. And the Lord in the gospel says: "The gates of hell shall not prevail against it;" Mat 16.18 that is, against the church that is placed on the rock, which Peter confessed when he said. "You are Christ, the Son of the living God."

² John Herolt, of the order of Dominicans, was commonly called Discipulus, because, as he himself says, he compiled his published sermons, "collecti ex diversis sanctorum dictis et ex pluribus libris, non per modum magistri, sed per modum discipuli." They are commended (ed. Nuremb. 1520) as "opus perutile simplicibus curam animarum gerentibus."

And concerning this, Paul disputed and said, "That rock was Christ." "For no other foundation can any man lay than what is laid, which is Christ Jesus." ¹ For the Holy Spirit also foretold by the prophets: "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a corner stone, elect, precious: and he that believes on him shall not be confounded." Isa 28.16 Let us settle the people or churches committed to our charge upon this foundation therefore, Christ Jesus, who elsewhere is called "the foundation of the prophets and apostles;" Eph. 2.20 so that according to the doctrine of St. Peter, the teacher of our church, we also, "as living stones, may be built into a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ our Lord." 1Pet 2.5 If we do this faithfully, the Lord will never leave us: for whether we live or die, the Lord will be our rock, reward, life, and recompense.

Receive these my labours, then, with indulgence, and take them in good part. They come forth under the name of you all, whom I love from my heart, and whom I desire faithfully to serve. Farewell; and be ever mindful of these words of the apostle: "Take heed to the ministry which you have received of the Lord, that you fulfil it." Col 4.17

INDEX OF PRINCIPAL WORKS

His principal works, in the chronological order in which they were written or published, are the following:

1. Vergleichung der uralten und unser zeiten Ketzereyen, zu warnen die einfältigen Christen. ["A comparison of the heresies of ancient and of our times, a caution to plain Christians." This was Bullinger's first printed treatise. It was published, 1526, under the name of Octavius Florence.]
2. Ratio Studiorum, sive De institutione eorum, qui studia literarum sequuntur, etc. 12mo. Tigur. [This treatise was one of those which Bullinger composed at Cappel, in 1527. The MS. was given in 1532, by the author, to his great friend Berthold Haller of Berne, and preserved among his connections until published in 1594, by Ulrich Zwingli, jun.]
3. De Origine Erroris in negotio Eucharistiae ac Missae. 4to. Basileae, &c 1528. [[There is added, "Appendix de Romani Pontificis autoritate, quando, a quibus, quave arte, in tantam imperii gloriam subvectus sit." This treatise also was composed at Cappel by Bullinger, after the model of Lactantius, and is dedicated to Wolfgang Joner, Peter Simler, and Andrew Curian. Oecolampadius saw the treatise on Bullinger's visit to Basle in 1527, and was so pleased with it that he prevailed to have it published. It was printed also in German at Heidelberg. Zanchi (Epist. lib. ii. p. 278. Opp. Tom. viii. Heidelb. 1613) gives a pleasing testimony to the usefulness of this book. The anecdote is quoted by M'Crie, Hist. of Reform. in Italy, p. 320, note, 2 ed. See below, No. 23.]
4. De hebdomadis quae apud Daniele sunt, opusculum. 8vo. Tigur. 1530. [This treatise Bullinger composed at Bremgarten; but afterwards retracted it in his Homilies on Daniel. This book was forbidden in England in 1531. Foxe, Vol. iv. p. 669. Lond. 1837.]
5. Von dem unverschampten etc. leeren der selbegesandten Widertöuffern, 12mo. etc. [This treatise against the Anabaptists was also composed by Bullinger at Bremgarten, in the end of 1530, and published at Zurich 1531. It is written in the form of a dialogue, between Simon, an anabaptist, and Jehoiada, his opponent. Two tracts follow; the former on the lawfulness of interest; the latter, dedicated to his brother John, on tithes. This treatise, enlarged with additions from Zwingli's "in Catabaptistarum Strophas Elenchus," was translated into Latin by Leo Judae, and published in four books, in the year 1535.¹ Of these treatises, Zwingli says in his Annotations on Jeremiah, published March 11, 1531: "Scripsit nunc de ea (re, i.e. usura, etc.) germanice Heinrychus Bullingerus, frater ac conterraneus noster, juvenis acris ac solertis ingenii, qui contra Catabaptistas disputationem, velut δαδα, ex nostris sumpsit manibus. Deo gratia." p. 149. Tig. 1531.]
6. De prophets officio, et quomodo digne administrari possit, oratio. 8vo. Tigur. 1532. [This sermon, which was circulated among the clergy of the canton of Zurich, because the troubled state of the time prevented their assembling to hear it, contains an encomium on Zwingli, and a defence of his death on the field of battle.]
7. Auff Johansen Wyenischen Bischoffs trostbüchlin, etc. Tig. 1532. [An answer to Faber bishop of Vienna, who boasted that the Zurichers had been defeated at Cappel because they had forsaken the true church.]
8. In Epistolam Joannis Apostoli et Evangelistae Canonicam Commentariolus. 8vo. Tig. 1532.
9. Commentarius in Ep. Pauli ad Hebraeos. 8vo. Tig. 1532. [The dedication to Philip, landgrave of Hesse, contains a defence of Zwingli's death and of the reformed religion. In the course of the commentary on chapter x. Bullinger also gives an account of the mode of celebrating the Lord's Supper at Zurich.]
10. Expositio in sanctissimam Pauli ad Romanos epistolam. 8vo. Tig. 1533. [In his dedication to Berthold Haller, Bullinger addresses him as "hujus mei operis maxima causa."]
11. In Acta Apostolorum Commentariorum libri vi. 8vo. Tig. 1533. [This work is dedicated to the senate of Frankfort-on-the-Maine, "qui mox" (Bullinger notes in his diary) "honorificas misere literas ac aureos numeros 12, quos ego senatui obtuli, qui pauperibus in xenodochio legavit." It was republished in fol. with corrections and additions in 1540.]

12. In D. Petri Apostoli Epistolam utranque commentarius. 8vo. Tig. 1534. [Dedicated "omnibus per Germaniam fratribus nomine Christi evangeliique afflictis et exulibus."]

13. In priorem D. Pauli ad Corinthios epistolam commentarius. 8vo. Tig. 1534. [In his notes on chap. xiv, Bullinger describes the public lectures in the church at Zurich since the Reformation.]

14. De Testamento sen foedere Dei unico et aeterno brevis expositio. 8vo. Tig. 1534. [This treatise was appended to the edition of Bollinger's Commentaries on the Epistles, 1537, and translated into German in 1539. (Von dem einigen und ewigen Testament oder Pundt Gottes... kurtzer bericht, etc.) It was composed against those who rejected the authority of the Old Testament among Christians. See Vol. 11. p. 299, note 6.]

15. Utriusque in Christo naturae tam divinae quam humanae, contra varias haereses, pro confessione Christi catholica, assertio orthodoxa. 8vo. Tig. 1534. [Also added in 1537 to the Commentaries on the Epistles. This discourse was delivered in the convocation of the clergy of the canton of Zurich, on the festival of the martyrs, Felix and Regula, (see Decade iii. p. 100,) chiefly in consequence of the Socinian doctrines of Claude of Savoy, who was in Zurich at that time. Mosheim, Vol. iii. p. 555, note 6, ed. Soames.]

16. In posteriorem D. Pauli ad Corinthios Epistolam Commentarius. 8vo. Tig. 1535.

17. In D. Apostoli Pauli ad Galatas, Ephesios, Philippenses et Colossenses epist. Commentarii. 8vo. Tig. 1535.

18. In D. Apostoli Pauli ad Thessalonicenses,¹ Timotheum, Titum, et Philemonem epistolas Commentarii. 8vo. Tig. 1530. [The Commentary on the epistles to Timothy is dedicated to Werner Steiner, to whom Bullinger had promised such a work (he says) ten years before, and who lodged him and his family for some weeks in 1531, when Bullinger came from Cappel to settle in Zurich. — "The Sum or Substance of the Second Epistle of St. Paul to the Thessalonians, by H. Bullinger, translated by R. H," was printed in 8vo, in 1538, by James Nicholson. Ames, Vol. iii. p. 1450.]

19. In Epistolas Divi Jacobi Apostoli, et in secundam et tertiam Joannis Apostoli, et unam Judae, Commentarii. 8vo. Tig. 1537 — [In this same year, 1537, Bullinger published all his Commentaries on the Epistles together in one volume, fol. with a general preface.]

20. Das der Christen gloub von anfang der wält gewart habe, etc. 4to. Basil, 1537 — [This treatise was afterwards published at Zurich in 1539, under the title, "Der alt gloub." — It was composed by Bullinger against the boast of the papists, that the defeat at Cappel had proved theirs to be the true and ancient religion. — Cellarius translated it into Latin, and published it in 1544, with the title "Antiquissima Fides," etc. — Coverdale translated it (as it would seem, from the German original) into English. See Coverdale's Works, ed. P.'s. "The Old Faith." See also Decade in. Serm. viii. Vol. ii. p. 299, note 5.]

21. De Scripture Sanctae autoritate, certitudine, firmitate, et absoluta perfectione; deque Episcoporum, qui verbi Dei ministri sunt, institutione et functione, contra superstitionis tyrannidisque Romano) antistites; ad sereniae. Angliae regem Henrychum VIII. Henrychi Bullingeri libri duo. 4to. Tig. 1538. [These treatises were composed, and dedicated, at the suggestion of some of the Englishmen who were then sojourning in Zurich. — An English translation of the former of these treatises, made by William Gybson, and dedicated to the duke of Somerset, exists in MS. in the British Museum. (Biblioth. Reg. 18. B. xxvii. p. 101.) — See also Orig. Lett. ed. P.'s. pp. 611, 618; and Decades, Vol. ii. p. 15, note 6.]

22. Bericht der krancken. 12mo. Tig. 1538. [Translated into Latin "per studiosum quendam" in 1540, with the title, "Quo modo cum aegrotantibus ac morientibus agendum sit." Bullinger composed this treatise during the prevalence of a plague in Zurich. Hottinger. Schol. Tigur. Append. I. p. 77.]

23. De Origine Erroris, libri duo. 4to. Tig. 1539. [An enlarged edition of the treatise, No. 3. It was translated into French, 1560; and into German, 1574. It was also published in folio, at Zurich, 1568. Of the usefulness of this treatise to Bp. Grindal, see Zurich Letters, A. p. 182, also pp. 207-8.]
24. Orthodoxa et erudita D. Jehoiakimi Vadiani, etc. epistola, etc. Accesserunt huic D. Vigili Martyris et Episcopi Tridentini libri v. 12mo. Tig. 1539. [Bullinger published these treatises on the two natures in Christ, with a preface, life of Vigilius, and summaries of each of his books.]
25. Expositio de omnibus sanctae Scripturae libris, eorumque paestantia et dignitate. 8vo. Tig. 1539. [This treatise Bullinger enlarged, and published in fol. 1543; and prefixed in 1544 to the Biblia Tigurina.]
26. Der Christlich Eestand. 12mo. Tig. 1540. [This treatise was translated into English by Coverdale, under the title, "The Christian state of Matrimony; when, where, how, and of whom it was instituted and ordained; what it is; how it ought to proceed; what are the occasions, fruit, and commodities of it. Contrariwise, how shameful and horrible a thing whoredom and advoutry ¹ is. How one should also choose for himself a fit and convenient spouse, to keep and increase the mutual love, truth, and duty of wedlock; and how married folks should bring up their children in the fear of God." It was printed by John Goughe, 1543, (see Works of Becon, ed. P.'s. Vol. i. p. 29, note 2,) and was among the forbidden books in England in the reign of Henry VIII. Foxe, Vol. IV. p. 679. It was also translated into Latin by John ab Ulmis, and presented to lady Jane Grey; (Orig. Lett. ed. P.'s. pp. 406, 422,) and parts of it were translated by her into Greek, (ibid. p. 427)]
27. In Sacrosanctum Jesu Christi Domini nostri Evangelium secundum Matthaenum Commentariorum libri xii. fol. Tig. 1542. [The treatise on the Resurrection at the end of these Commentaries, (Lib. xii. foll. 267 — 279,) was translated by Frisius into German, with the title, "The Hope of the Faithful," and published August 18, 1544. It is this treatise, and not Wermuller's, which is placed under the same title in Coverdale's Remains, ed. P.'s. p. 135, etc. ² Hence the reference in p. 181, note 1, of that volume, should be to the Commentaries of Bullinger on the Epistles of St. Paul. See also Orig. Lett. ed. P.'s. p. 224. The Commentaries were published in August.]
28. In divinum Jesu Christi Domini nostri Evangelium secundum Joannem Commentariorum libri x. fol. Tig. 1543. [The preface to this Commentary, "De vera hominis Christiani Justificatione," is dated in August. This Commentary was especially commended by Melancthon. Corp. Reform. Tom. v. col. 342.]
29. Ad Joannis Cochlei de canonicae Scripturae et catholicae Ecclesiae autoritate libellum pro solida Scripturae canonicae autoritate tum et absoluta ejus perfectione veraque catholicae Ecclesiae dignitate Heinrychi Bullingeri orthodoxa Responsio. 4to. Tig. 1544. [This was a reply to Cochlaeus' attack on Bullinger's treatise, No. 21. See Orig. Lett. ed. P.'s. p. 244.]
30. Brevis Antiβολη, sive Responsio secunda Heinrychi Bullingeri ad maledicam implicatamque Joannis Cochlei de Scripturae et Ecclesiae autoritate Replicam, una cum expositione de sancti Christi catholica Ecclesia, ad illustrissimum Principem et Dominum D. Ottonem Heinrychum Palatinum Rheni et utriusque Bavariae Ducem, etc. 4to. Tig. Nov. 1544.
31. In sacrosanctum Evangelium Domini nostri Jesu Christi secundum Marcum Commentariorum lib. vi. fol. Tig. 1545. [The preface, "De Jesu Christo pontifice maximo, et rege fidelium summo regnante in ecclesia sanctorum," is dated in August.]
32. Absoluta de Christi Domini et catholicae ejus ecclesiae Sacramentis tractatio. [This treatise was composed in the year 1546; and sent first to Calvin, who approved of it; and then to John-a-Lasco, and published by him at London, "An. 1551. Men. Apri." with a dedication to the princess Elizabeth. This English edition is extremely rare. The Rev. "W. Goode has a copy of it, which he obligingly lent to the editor, and which seems to have been a presentation copy from John-a-Lasco to the bishop of Ely. The substance of this treatise was embodied by Bullinger in his Decad. v. Serm. vi., vii. See also Orig. Lett. ed. Park. Soc. pp. 497, 681. The printing of this treatise Abp. Cranmer encouraged, although he had not read it, saying, that Bullinger's writings needed no examination. Gerdesii Serin. Tom. iv. par. 1. pp. 470-2.]
33. In luculentum et sacrosanctum Evangelium Domini nostri Jesu Christi secundum Lucam Commentariorum lib. ix. fol. Tig. 1546. [The preface, "qua demonstratur, Deum Patrem in Filio suo

34. Series et digestio temporum et rerum descriptorum a beato Luca in Actis Apostolorum. 4to. Tig. 1548.
35. Sermonum Decas prima et secunda. 4to. Tig. 1549. [Published in the beginning of March. See Orig. Lett. p. 266. The ninth sermon of the 2nd Decade was published in English with a dedication to Edward VI. by Walter Lynne, with the title, "A Treatise or Sermon of Henry Bullinger, much fruitful and necessary for this time, concerning magistrates and obedience of subjects, etc. Made in the year of our Lord 1549." A copy of this book is in the British Museum. See Orig. Lett. p. 396, note 1.]
36. Sermonum Decas tertia et quarta. 4to. Tig. 1550. [The second volume of the Decades, of which the former part was dedicated in March, and the latter in August, to Edward VI. See Orig. Lett. pp. 269, 560, 141, 483, 665, 673. The former part was translated into English immediately, by Thomas Cains; Orig. Lett. p. 415.]
37. Sermonum Decas quinta. 4to. Tig. 1551. [This decade was dedicated in March to lord Grey. Orig. Lett. pp. 3, 121, 436, 493, 498, 574. Extracts from this decade, and the dedication, with a few passages from the second Decade, were published in English with the title, "The Judgment of the Reverend Father, Master Henry Bullinger, etc. in certain matters of religion being in controversy in many countries, even where as (where) the gospel is taught." 1566.]

The Decades were published together, in folio, in 1552; and have been translated into German and Dutch, under the name of Hausbuch, (Zurich Lett. Second Series, p. 118), French, and English.

38. Die rechten opffer der Christenheit. 12mo. Tig. 1551. [The true Christian Sacrifice. A sermon from Hebr. xiii. preached by Bullinger, 14 August, at Zurich, and dedicated to Conrad Pellican. Of this sermon, Bullinger has noted: "Hunc sermonem Latinum fecit D. Johannes Parkhurstus, Nordovicensis in Anglia episcopus: sed non est, quod ego sciam, excusus." Hottinger. Schola Tigur. Append. I. p. 79.]
39. Brevis ac pia institutio Christianae religionis ad dispersos in Hungaria ecclesiarum Christi ministros et alios Dei servos scripta. [This treatise was written in 1551, but printed, "Ovarini," in 1559, 8vo.]
40. Antithesis et compendium evangelicae et papisticae doctrinae, etc. 8vo. Tig. 1551. [Composed at the desire of George, count of Wirtemberg; and written also in German.]
41. Perfectio Christianorum, sive de Jesu Christo, Christianorum perfectione unica, demonstratio. 8vo. Tig. 1551. [Written in German also, (Der Christenheit rechte vollkommenheit, etc.) and dedicated in the month of September to Henry II. king of France, when with several of the princes of Germany he sought the liberation of the duke of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse. — Sleidan, Comment. Libb. xxiii. xxiv. See also Orig. Lett. p. 6.]
42. Ecclesias Evangelicas neque haereticas neque schismaticas, sed plane orthodoxas et catholicas esse Jesu Christi ecclesias, Apodixis ad illustrissimum principem et dominum D. Georgium comitem Wirtembergem. et Montis Bellgardi, etc. 8vo. Tig. 1552. [The preface is dated in February. The treatise was also published in German, Das die Evangelischen Kilchen, etc.]
43. Von der verklärung Jesu Christo: et vom waaren Messia. 12mo. Tig. 1552. [Two sermons from Mat 17.1-8, preached at Zurich by Bullinger, in October 1552; but not published till 1556.]
44. Von dem heiligen Nachtmal, etc. Zwo predginen. 12mo. Tig. 1553. [These two sermons were preached by Bullinger at Zurich; and afterwards translated into Latin, and published "a studioso quodam," with the title, "De Sacrosancta Coena Domini nostri Jesu Christi, qua forma, quo ritu, et in quem finem eam instituerit; quomodo item ad ipsam nos praeparari oportet." A translation of this book was made out of a French version in English "by J. T.," and dedicated to "Thomas [Bentham], bishop of Coventry and Lichfield." It was "imprinted at London, near unto the Three Cranes in the Vintry, for William Ponsoby." A copy is in the library of Lambeth Palace: no date. — Ques. Is this treatise the book which Lever mentions, Orig. Lett. Let. lxxix. p. 156?]
45. Dispositio et Perioche historiae Evangelical per iii. Evangelistas contexts, necnon Actorum Apostolorum, Epistolarum quoque Pauli xiiii. et Canonicarum vii. ex commentariis H. Bullingeri petita et in formam Enchiridii redacta. 8vo. Tig. 1553.

46. De gratia Dei justificante nos propter Christum per solam fidem absque operibus bonis, fide interim exuberante in opera bona, libri iiii. ad sereniss. Daniae regem Christianum, etc. large 8vo. Tig. 1554. [This treatise was composed by Bullinger with the object of conciliating in Denmark a greater confidence in the Swiss Reformation. Melancthon was much delighted with this work. — Corp. Reform. Tom. viii. col. 523. See also Orig. Lett. p. 744.]
47. Von dem zytlichen Gut, etc. zwo predigten. 12mo. Tig. 1554. [These two sermons of Bullinger's on the right use of worldly possessions, were composed by him in Latin, and published in this German translation by John Haller.]
48. "A treatise of the cohabitation of the faithful with the unfaithful. To which is added a Sermon made of the confessing of Christ and his Gospel, and of the denying of the same. Anno 1555. Apocal. xviii. 'Come away from her, my people, that you not be partakers of her sins, that you do not receive her plagues.' A Sermon of the true confessing of Christ and the truth of the Gospel; and of the foul denying of the same: made in the convocation of the clergy at Zurich, the 28. day of January, in the year of the Lord 1555, by H. B." [This book has neither place, nor printer's name, nor date. The type is foreign, and the spelling bad. A copy of it is in the British Museum. Ames, Vol. 11. p. 1581.]
49. Das jungste Gericht, etc. 12mo. Tig. [These two sermons on the last Judgment, from Mat 24.31-46, are dedicated by Bullinger to Wolfgang Waydner of Worms, in February 1555, but appear not to have been published at Zurich until 1559.]
50. Von dem heil der gloübigen etc. 12mo. Tig. 1555. [A sermon preached by Bullinger, at Zurich, May 26, 1555, On the setting forth of man's salvation always by the word of God and the sacraments.]
51. Summa Christlicher Religion, etc. 8vo. Tig. 1556. [This treatise was published also in the same year in Latin, with the title, "Compendium Christiana) Religionis x. libris comprehensum." It is a kind of epitome of the Decades. Besides the above works, Bullinger drew up the Confession of the Church of Zurich on the Lord's Supper³ against the misrepresentations of Luther in 1545. (Warhaffte Bekantnuss, etc. Rodolph Gualter translated it into Latin; "Orthodoxa Tigurinae Ecclesiae ministrorum confessio," etc. See Orig. Lett. P.'s. p. 681.) Several of his letters also and admonitions to his son Henry, and grandson Felix Lavater, have been published in Miscell. Tig. Vol. i. par. 3, and in Merkwürdige Züge. H. Bulling. Bern. 1828.⁴ In a letter of Martin Micronius (Orig. Lett. p. 560) Bullinger's Decades on the Kings are mentioned: but no such Decades were published. The Latin must have been

Besides English translations of some of Bullinger's writings mentioned in the foregoing list, there was printed in 1548, in 12mo. "at London, by Robert Stoughton," "Two Epistles: one of H. Bullinger, with the consent of all the learned men of the church of Tigury; another of John Calvin, chief preacher of the church of Geneva: whether it is lawful for a Christian man to communicate or be partaker of the mass of the papists, without offending God and his neighbour or not:" (dated "Tiguri, Feb. 18, 1541,") This probably was among the books alluded to in Orig. Lett. p. 396. Another edition came out in 1549. (Lowndes; and Ames, Vol. ii. p. 750.)

N. B. The Editor cannot close this list of Bullinger's publications without acknowledging his great obligations to M. Horner, the librarian of the Zurich Library, for the great facilities which he afforded him in making needful researches in that invaluable collection of books and documents.

ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF DECADES.

There were three editions of the English translation ¹ of Bullinger's Decades; viz. in the years 1577, 1584, and 1587. The Parker Society has reprinted the latest edition.

Copies of any of the editions are seldom perfect. In most cases the title-pages are facsimiles, extremely well executed, but bearing another date than that of the edition to which they are prefixed; and leaves of different editions are found supplied in one copy. On page 1085 of the old editions also (Vol. iv. page 437 of this reprint) variations in the text of all the copies (whatever the edition) occur, which can be accounted for only on the supposition that, for some unexplained reason, the publisher cancelled former or printed new leaves.

In a copy of the ed. 1587 (as the editor has been informed by the Rev. G. C. Gorham), which is in the possession of Dr. Bayford, there is a remarkable addition in the last lines of the title-page, as follows: "Imprinted at London by Raph Newberie, dwelling in Flete-Street, a little above the Conduit, who has store of these bookes for those that want them, both in Latine ² and English. Cum gratia et privilegio Regiae Majestatis, 1587." The added words are here given in italics, and are not found in other copies of the same year.

On the debated question of the degree of authority which was given to these Decades of Bullinger in the reign of queen Elizabeth in the English church, the Editor deems it most consistent with the principles and practice of the Parker Society, that he should confine himself to facts, and leave conclusions to be drawn from them by others. These facts may most conveniently be presented under the following heads:

1. The earlier registers of the Convocation of the province of Canterbury were destroyed in the great fire of 1666. ³
2. But in archbishop Whitgift's Register, at the archi-episcopal palace of Lambeth,⁴ there are found, "Orders for the better increase of learning in the inferior ministers, and for more diligent preaching and catechising:" which had been introduced, it appears, into the upper house of Convocation on the second day of December, 1586, by the archbishop, and which contain the following directions:

"I. Every minister having cure,⁵ and being under the degrees of master of arts, and bachelors of law, and not licensed to be a public preacher, shall before the second day of February next provide a Bible, and Bullinger's Decades in Latin or English, and a paper book, and shall every day read over one chapter of the holy scriptures, and note the principal contents of it briefly in his paper book, and shall every week read over one sermon in the said Decades, and note likewise the chief matters contained in it, in the said paper; and shall once in every quarter (viz. within a fortnight before or after the end of the quarter) show his said note to some preacher near adjoining to be assigned for that purpose.

"II. Item: The bishop, archdeacons, or other ordinary, being a public preacher, shall appoint certain grave and learned preachers, who shall privately examine the diligence, and view the notes of the said ministers, assigning six or seven ministers, as occasion requires, to every such preacher, that is next adjoining to him, so as the ministers are not driven to travel for the exhibiting of their notes above six or seven miles (if it may be), and the said preacher shall by letters or otherwise, truly certify to the archdeacons, or other ordinaries of the place, themselves being public preachers, and resident within, or near to their jurisdiction, and for lack of that, to the bishop himself, who performs the said exercises, and how they have profited in them, and whoever refuses or neglects to perform the same; the archdeacons and others receiving the said certificates, shall signify the same, once a year, to the bishop and that about Michalmas.¹

"III. Item. Those who refuse to perform the exercises, or are negligent in them, and shall not after admonition by the bishop, archdeacon, or other ordinary aforesaid, reform himself, if he is beneficed, he shall be compelled to it by ecclesiastical censures; if he is a curate, he shall be inhibited to serve within the jurisdiction."

"VIII. It is concluded that the exercises above written, and no other, shall henceforth be publicly or privately used within any parts of this province."

Afterwards, in the seventh session of the same Convocation by prorogation, on March 10th, "the prolocutor" of the lower house "prayed that the articles agreed on by the bishops for the increase of learning in inferior ministers might be read; which was done. And then the archbishop exhorted all the clergy to do their duty." ² And in archbishop Whitgift's register, a letter to the archdeacon of Canterbury ³ (William Redman) is inserted, in which the archbishop, dated March 29, 1587, transmits to him the Orders above mentioned to be observed throughout the whole diocese; and Strype records, in his Life of Bishop Aylmer,⁴ that "the bishop's pious and painful son, Dr. Theophilus Aylmer, now archdeacon of London, the 6th of January ensuing, called for the clergy (as he frequently used to do) intending this meeting chiefly for those ministers who were not preachers, but of the inferior sort: for the bringing forward of which, these particulars were enjoined. ... 2. Every person was to have Bullinger's Decades. 3. Each was to have his paper book, and to write in it the quantity of one sermon every week," etc.

Yet in archbishop Whitgift's Register ⁵ again, a copy of a letter is extant, apparently designed as a circular to the bishops ⁶ of his province, dated Nov. 1, 1588, in which the archbishop writes:

"After my right hearty commendations to your lordship. Where secundo Decembris, when we were assembled in the synod kept in the year 1586, it was thought fit and necessary to me and to the rest of my brethren then present in that synod — although not as a judicial act or conclusion by the authority of the convocation — that the articles of the tenor of the copy herein enclosed, should be put in execution by your lordship and all the rest of my said brethren, the bishops of this province. Forasmuch as it is like, it will be looked for at this next parliament, how the same articles have been accordingly used, and likewise how the canons agreed upon by all our consent in the convocation held the 24th of November, in the year of our Lord 1584, and allowed by the queen's majesty, have been observed; etc." and in the margin of the register this letter is described, "A copy of my lord grace his letters for the exercises:"

— so that the "Articles" which the archbishop mentions here, are the "Orders" quoted above.

3. In her majesty's State Paper Office, also, a contemporary copy of archbishop Whitgift's "Orders" is preserved; and a duplicate copy of them, made for greater security by Sir Joseph Williamson in the reign of Charles II. But these papers are only endorsed, "Orders for the discipline of the Church;" no signature of a Secretary of state, nor any memorandum whatever, is to be traced upon them; and the Editor is informed at the Office, that the preservation of these documents among the State papers is no proof, of itself, that they had received any state or royal sanction.

4. The edition of the Decades of 1587 had on its title-page, "Cum gratia et privilegio Regiae Majestatis;" an inscription, which neither of the former editions presented. But these words only declared a licence to publish; and did not intimate that the book had received any regal sanction and authority.

The "Epistles" of Bullinger "concerning the Apparel of Ministers and other indifferent things,"¹ which were added to the English edition of the Decades, 1587, and which are mentioned in the title-page, are not inserted in this reprint, as they are found among the Zurich Letters, A.
